§ The ministry having, in the course of the preceding year, formed the very laudable design of suppressing the pirates in the West Indies, who, since the close of the war, were become very numerous, and highly insolent, captain Woods Rogers was appointed governor of the Bahama Islands. On the 11th of April he sailed for Providence, which was to be the seat of his government; and after a short and easy passage arriving there, he took possession of the town of Nassau, of the fort belonging to it, and of the whole island, the people receiving him with all imaginable joy, and many of the pirates submitting immediately. He proceeded soon after to form a council, and settling the civil government in those islands, appointing civil and military officers, raising militia, and taking every other step necessary for procuring safety at home, and security from any thing that might be attempted from abroad; in which, by degrees, he succeeded. Some of the pirates, it is true, refused at first all terms, and did a great deal of mischief on the coast of Carolina; but when they saw that governor Rogers had thoroughly settled himself at Providence, and that the inhabitants of the Bahama islands found themselves obliged, through interest, to be honest, they began to doubt of their situation, and thought proper to go and beg that mercy which at first they refused; so that by the first of July, 1719, to which day the king's proclamation had been extended, there were not above three or four of those pirates who continued their trade; and two of them being taken, and their crews executed, the rest dispersed out of fear, and became thereby less terrible. Thus in a short time, and chiefly through the steady and prudent conduct of governor Rogers, this crew of villains were dissolved, who for many years had frightened the West Indies, and the northern colonies, coming at last to be so strong, that few merchantmen were safe, and withal so cruel and barbarous, that slavery amongst the Turks was preferable to falling into their hands. It had been happy for us if the management of the Spanish guarda-costas had been committed to the care of some man of a like spirit, who might have delivered the merchants from being plundered, without involving the nation in a war.

Hanmer, Horatio Walpole, esq. and Robert Walpole, esq. in the house of commons, but without effect; for the address was carried by a great majority, and presented to his majesty. The parliament therein declare their entire satisfaction in those measures which the king had already taken for strengthening the protestant succession, and establishing a lasting tranquility in Europe, particularly in relation to the crown of Spain, and their resolution to enable him, in concurrence with his allies, not only to resent the injuries that crown had already done to our commerce, in breach of the treaties subsisting between the two nations, but to support him in the most effectual manner, in such farther measures as he shall judge necessary to complete the public tranquility in Europe, and to check the growth of that naval power which must otherwise prove dangerous to the trade of this kingdom, and the repose of Europe*.

On the nineteenth the commons voted thirteen thousand five hundred sailors, and twelve thousand four hundred and thirty-five men for the land-service. The whole estimate amounted to two millions two hundred and fifty-seven thousand five hundred and eighty-one pounds, nineteen shillings. The money was raised by a land-tax of three shillings in the pounds, the malt-tax, and a lottery for half a million. The bills for the land and malt-tax were both presented and passed in one day; an instance of dispatch unknown for many years.

On the thirteenth of December earl Stanhope declared in the house of lords, that, in order to unite the hearts of the well affected to the present establishment, he had a bill to offer, under the title of "A bill for strengthening the protestant interest in these kingdoms." It was accordingly read, and appeared to be a bill for repealing the occasional conformity and schism bills, which, towards the end of last reign, had been enacted against the dissenters, as also some clauses in the corporation and test acts. The Tory lords were astonished at this motion, for which they were altogether unprepared. Nevertheless, they made a strenuous opposition, though it proved a fruitless one for the court party. After violent debates, the bill was passed and sent down to the lower house, where it likewise met with a strong opposition; in spite of which it was carried by the majority.

A rupture with Spain had, for some time, been considered as a thing unavoidable; but, on the seventeenth of December, it was put out of all doubt, his majesty on that day sending a message to both houses, intimating, that all his endeavours to procure redress for the injuries done to his subjects by the king of Spain proving ineffectual, he had found it necessary to declare war against that monarch. This message being read, a motion was made for an address to the king, assuring him that the commons would cheerfully support him in the prosecution of the war, till Spain should be obliged to accept of reasonable terms of peace, and agree to such conditions of trade and commerce as the English were entitled to expect. On this occasion many bold things were said as to the expediency of a war with Spain, and especially with regard to the pretensions and intentions of those who made this war; for the ministry insisting strongly that it was made in favour of trade, and upon repeated complaints from the merchants: it was said that the ministers had shewn no great regard for the trade and interest of the nation, since it appeared by the answer given to the marquis de Monteleone's letter, that they would have passed by the violation of the treaties of commerce, provided Spain had accepted the terms of the quadruple alliance; and that his majesty did not seek to aggrandise himself by any new acquisition, but was rather inclined to sacrifice something of his own to procure the general quiet and tranquility: that nobody could yet tell how far that sacrifice was to extend; but certainly it was a very uncommon piece of condescension. This sacrifice was said to be the cession of Gibraltar and Port Mahon, which the regent had offered to the king of Spain, provided he would accede to the quadruple alliance. Mr. Horatio Walpole alleged, that the disposition of Sicily, in favour of the emperor, was a breach of the treaty of Utrecht; and Mr. Robert Walpole exclaimed warmly against the injustice of attacking the Spanish fleet before a declaration of war on either side. They were answered by Mr. Craggs, and sir Joseph Jekyll closed the debate with saying, that when this affair was first mentioned in the house, he had been backward to give his opinion, as not perfectly well understanding the merits of it; but having since had leisure to examine the several steps which had been taken in it, he was now fully convinced, that if there was any injustice, it was on the side of the king of Spain; and that the conduct of his majesty and his ministers was entirely agreeable to the law of nations, and the rules of justice and equity. After these and several other speeches, the address was carried by a majority of one hundred and seventy-eight against one hundred and seven, and presented next day†.

The ministry now continued the pursuit of their scheme, and took such vigorous measures for obliging Spain to accept the terms assigned her by the quadruple alliance, that she lost all patience, and resolved to attempt any thing that might either free her from this necessity, or serve to express her resentment against such as endeavoured to impose it on her. With this view cardinal Alberoni employed all his intrigues, power, and industry, to find the English and French such ample employment at home as should leave them no leisure for disturbing others. The prince de Cellamare, ambassador from Philip V. to the court of Versailles, acted the same part there as count Gyllemberg had done in London, by caballing with the French malcontents, who were numerous and powerful, against the duke of Orleans. A scheme was actually formed for seizing the person of the regent and that of the young king, and entirely change the face of that government; every thing was in readiness for putting this plot into execution, and the conspirators only waited for the last orders, when the whole mystery was discovered. It was to king George that the duke of Orleans owed the first intimation of a conspiracy being formed against his person and government; upon which the regent took such effectual measures for watching the conduct of all suspected persons, that the whole intrigue was brought to light*. The prince de Cellamare was treated in France nearly in the same manner as the Swedish minister had been in England; and Alberoni, the first mover of this machine, had the vexation to find that he had, without any advantage from his project, offended, in the most sensible manner, a power whose resentment could not but prove extremely prejudicial, not only to himself, but even to the whole Spanish monarchy.

At the very time that these things were transacting in France, and that the regent made diligent preparation for demanding, sword in hand, reparation for the insult he had received, the busy cardinal was forming a scheme of a different nature against king George, by making an effort to establish the pretender on his throne. The duke of Ormond repairing to Madrid, held conferences with his eminence, in which it was agreed to give the chevalier an invitation to come to Madrid, to put himself at the head of a large body of auxiliary forces which his Catholic majesty proposed to lend him, in order to assert with success his pretensions to the British crown. The chevalier did not suffer himself to be long intreated: he quitted the papal dominions (where he had lately taken refuge) by stealth, and got safely to Madrid, where he was received with great cordiality by the king of Spain, and treated as king of Great Britain. The earl of Stair, who was then our minister at the court of France, dispatched the first certain intelligence of the designs of Spain, which were, to have sent an armament of ten ships of war and transports, having on board six thousand regular troops, with arms for twelve thousand men, to be landed in the west of England, under the command of the duke of Ormond, with the title of captain-general of his most Catholic majesty. He was provided with declarations in the name of that king, importing, that for many good reasons he had sent part of his troops, as auxiliaries to king James, to act for his interest in England and Scotland, and use their utmost endeavours for his restoration; and that the fear of ill success might not deter any person from openly espousing his interest, his most Catholic majesty promised a safe retreat in his dominions to all such as should be obliged to leave their country, on account of the share they might bear in this undertaking†.

Upon advice of these designs, the most effectual methods were taken here for defeating them. A fleet was immediately ordered to be got ready to put to sea; a proclamation issued for apprehending James Butler, late duke of Ormond, with a promise of five thousand pounds to the person that should seize him; and an embargo was also laid on all shipping. On the tenth of March, 1719, his majesty acquainted the parliament, that he had received certain intelligence of an invasion, intended from Spain, in favour of the pretender. Both houses hereupon concurred in an address, promising to support him against all his enemies: they desired him to augment his forces by sea and land, assuring him they would make good the extraordinary expence‡. Upon this, orders were given for hastening the fleet, which was fitted out with so much expedition, that on the fifth of April sir John Norris sailed from Spithead to the Westward with nine men of war, and on the twenty-ninth the earl of Berkley sailed from St. Helen's with seven other ships to join him. The government likewise took some other very salutary measures to oppose this intended invasion of the Spaniards. The troops in the west of England, where it was conjectured they designed to land, were reinforced by several regiments quartered in other parts of the kingdom; four battalions were brought over from Ireland. About the middle of April two Swiss battalions arrived in the river of Thames, and three Dutch battalions arrived in the north of England. Besides this, the French regent and the emperor ordered bodies of troops to march, so as to be in readiness to be transported to England upon occasion. These preparations made by our king and his allies would have of themselves been sufficient to have defeated the invasion, had it been actually carried into execution; but the elements fought the cause of the house of Hanover, and rendered ineffectual the designs of its enemies: for the Spanish fleet designed for this expedition, consisting of five ships of war, and about forty transports, having on board the duke of Ormond, and upwards of five thousand men, a great quantity of ammunition, spare arms, and one million of pieces of eight, which sailed from Cadiz on the twenty-third of February, O. S. being, on the twenty-eighth of that month, about fifty leagues to the westward of Cape Finisterre, met with a violent storm which lasted forty-eight hours, and entirely dispersed them. What loss they sustained is uncertain; but several of their vessels returned to the ports of Spain in a very shattered condition: a very small part, however, of this embarkation, had somewhat a different fortune; for the earls Marschal and Seaforth, and the marquis of Tullibardine, with about four hundred men, mostly Spaniards, on board three frigates and five transports, landed in the shire of Ross in Scotland, where they were joined by fifteen or sixteen hundred Scots, and had instructions to wait the duke Ormond's orders, and the account of his being landed in England, before they put themselves in motion. The whole design, however, being quashed by the dispersion of the Spanish fleet; and general Wightman being sent with a body of regular troops from Inverness, fell upon these insurgents at the pass of Glenshiel,

* The discovery, however, was partly owing to accident: the prince de Cellamare intrusted his dispatches, for the greater security, to the abbé Portocarrero, and to a son of the marquis de Monteleone. They set out from Paris in a post-chaise, and were overturned on the road. The postilion observed, that Portocarrero was extremely anxious for the safety of his portmanteau, and heard him say he would not have lost it for an hundred thousand pistoles. The man, at his return to Paris, informed the government of these circumstances. The Spaniards being pursued, were overtaken and seized at Poitiers, with the portmanteau, in which the duke of Orleans found two letters that made him acquainted with the whole conspiracy. The prince de Cellamare was immediately conducted to the frontiers of the kingdom: the duke and duchess of Maine, the marquis de Pompadour, the cardinal de Polignac, and many other persons of distinction, were committed to different prisons.

which they had made themselves masters of, and entirely defeated them, the Spaniards surrendering themselves prisoners of war. Mareschall, Seaforth, and Tullibardine, with some other officers, retired to one of the western isles, and from thence found means to make their escape to the continent*.

During these transactions the regent of France declared war against Spain; and though marshal Villars, and some other officers of great rank, refused to command an army against a grandson of France; yet the duke of Berwick, who, by the victory of Almanza, had fixed Philip V. upon his throne, accepted the command of these troops, which were appointed to invade his territories, in order to force him to such conditions as were thought necessary for establishing the general tranquility of Europe. It was the opinion of some shrewd politicians on this side the water, that this would be a war of parade only; but the event proved them to be greatly deceived; for the marquis de Cilly advanced, in the month of April, as far as Port Passage, where he found six men of war just finished, upon the stocks; all which he burned, together with timber, masts, and naval stores, to the value of half a million sterling, which was a greater real loss to the Spaniards than what they had sustained by our beating their fleet in the Mediterranean. Soon after the duke of Berwick besieged Fontarabia; both which actions shewed that the French were in earnest†.

In the month of February this year, the Whig party brought into the house of lords "A bill for limiting the peerage;" by which it was proposed that the number of English peers should not be enlarged beyond the present number, which, upon failure of male-issue, might be supplied by new creations; and that, instead of the sixteen elective peers from Scotland, twenty-five should be made hereditary, on the part of that kingdom; and that this number, upon failure of heirs-male, should be supplied from the other members of the Scottish peerage.

Although this bill carried with it some restraint upon the prerogative of the crown; yet it was so far favoured by the court, that earl Stanhope delivered a message from the king during its dependence in the house, importing, that as they had under consideration the state of the British peerage, his majesty had so much at heart the settling it upon such a foundation as might secure the freedom and constitution of parliaments in all future ages, that he was willing his prerogative should not stand in the way of so great and necessary a work.

Long and violent were the debates on this bill: this measure having alarmed the generality of the Scottish peers, as well as the more distinguished of the English commoners, who found themselves precluded from the hopes of ever arriving at dignity and title, they did not fail to exclaim against it as a violent encroachment upon the constitution of the kingdom. In short, the clamour became so universal, that earl Stanhope observed in the house, that as the bill had raised strange apprehensions, he thought it advisable to delay the farther consideration of it till a more proper opportunity. It was accordingly dropped, and the parliament prorogued on the eighteenth day of April, when his majesty made a speech to both houses, in which he thanked them for the zeal and affection they had shewn to his person and government during the late projected invasion‡. About the same time the duke of Argyll was created duke of Greenwich; the earl of Manchester, duke of Manchester; the earl of Carnarvon, duke of Chandos; and lieutenant-general Carpenter, baron Carpenter. Soon after, viz. on May 11, his majesty having appointed lords-justices to govern in his absence, set out for his German dominions, where he concluded a peace with Sweden. Charles XII. was now no more: the princess Ulrica, his sister, had succeeded him on the throne, and entertained very different views from those of that ambitious monarch: she saw her kingdom exhausted of men and money; unable to support a war, she ardently wished for a good peace. The Swedish council having consented to make the cession of Bremen and Verden to the elector of Hanover, all the difficulties which had hitherto retarded a pacification were removed: the duke of Orleans acted the part of mediator on this occasion, being, as well as his Britannic majesty, desirous to restore the general tranquility of Europe. With this view king George, during his stay abroad, offered his mediation to bring about a peace between Sweden, the Danes, the Russians, and the Poles. The czar, however, rejected his mediation, and resolved to prosecute his schemes of conquest. He sent his fleet to the Scheuron, or Batles, of Sweden, where his troops landed, to the number of fifteen thousand men, and committed the most shocking cruelties. To protect our new friends the Swedes against these destroyers, sir John Norris was ordered into the Baltic with a large squadron, which joined the Swedish fleet in the beginning of September. This junction of the English and Swedes broke all the measures of czar Peter the Great, who, dreading lest his fleet should experience the same fate with that of Spain in the Straights of Messina, thought proper to recall his ships; and the winter season coming on, sir John Norris returned home, and arrived safe in England about the latter end of November.

While the Spaniards were amusing themselves with chimerical notions of invasions they were incapable of effecting against us, sir George Byng, our admiral in the Mediterranean, was distressing them effectually; for having early in the spring sailed from Port Mahon (where he had wintered) to Naples, he there adjusted every thing for the reduction of Sicily; in which he acted with such zeal, and met with so great success, that not only the imperial army was transported into that island, and so well supplied with all things necessary from our fleet (which at the same time attended and disturbed all the motions of the enemy's army) that it may truly be said the success of that expedition was as much owing to the English admiral as to count de Mercy, the German general; and that the English fleet did no less service than the army. To enter into all the particulars of this Sicilian expedition would take up much more room than I have to spare. The reader may inform himself fully as to these circumstances, by perusing Corbet's Account of the Expedition to Sicily, which is a very ample history of that memorable war which embarrassed us so much while it continued, and which has been buried in oblivion ever since. There is, however, one circumstance which deserves relation. The Imperialists having taken Messina, on the eighth of August, 1719, the admiral landed a body of English grenadiers, who very quickly made themselves masters of the tower of Faro; by which, having opened a free passage for their ships, he came to an anchor in Paradise Road; and this being observed by the commander of the Spanish men of war in the mole (the remains of the fleet which had escaped from the sea-fight) he began to despair of getting out to sea, and therefore unbent his sails and unrigged the ships, and resolved to wait their fate, which he knew must be the same with that of the citadel. This gave great satisfaction to our admiral, who now found himself at liberty to employ his ships in other services, which had been for a long time employed in blocking up that port. But, while all things were in this prosperous condition, a dispute arose among the allies about the disposition of these ships, when taken. The admiral, in order to prevent all animosity, proposed to count de Mercy to erect a battery, and destroy them as they lay in the basin. The count at first seemed unwilling to assent to this proposal; but the admiral insisted on it with so much firmness, that a battery was raised, which in a little time sunk and destroyed the ships, and thereby completed the ruin of the naval power of Spain. In a word, our admiral continued to exert his activity and talents in the Mediterranean, until he had seen the islands of Sicily and Sardinia evacuated by the Spaniards, and the mutual cessions executed between the emperor and the duke of Savoy; in consequence of which, four battalions of Piedmontese troops were transported from Palermo to Sardinia, and took possession of Cagliari in the name of their master*. On his return to England, the latter end of this year, he was, in reward for his services, appointed treasurer of the navy, and rear-admiral of Great Britain. In a little time he was ennobled by the title of viscount Torrington, declared a privy-counsellor, and afterwards made a knight of the Bath, on the revival of that order.

The more effectually to humble Spain, and at the same time to convince the whole world that we could not only contrive, but execute an invasion, the ministry proposed the conquest of Corunna, and of Peru in South America. Four thousand men, commanded by lord Cobham, were embarked at the Isle of Wight, and sailed on the twenty-first day of September, under the convoy of five ships of war, commanded by captain Mighels, who was to be joined by captain Johnson, then cruising off Fontarabia. When the squadron arrived on the coast of Galicia, it kept cruising three days, in the station appointed for Johnson to join them; but he not appearing, and the danger of lying on the coast at this season of the year with transports, rendering it necessary to take some measures of acting without him; and the wind offering fair for Vigo, his lordship took the resolution to attempt the reduction of that place, in which he succeeded with very little difficulty, the citadel capitulating on honourable terms the fifth day after he appeared before it. This conquest is said to have cost us but two officers, and there or four men killed. There were in the town about sixty pieces of large iron cannon which the enemy abandoned, and these they nailed and damaged as much as their time would give them leave; and in the citadel were forty-three pieces, of which fifteen were brass, and two large mortars, besides above two thousand barrels of powder, and several chests of arms, amounting to eight thousand musquets; all of which stores and brass ordnance were lodged there from on board the ships that were to have visited Great Britain in the succeeding spring; and the very troops that gave up Vigo were also part of those which were to have been employed in that expedition: seven ships were seized in the harbour, three of which were fitting up for privateers, one to carry twenty-four guns; the rest were trading vessels †.

Vigo being thus taken, lord Cobham ordered major-general Wade to embark with a thousand men on board four transports, and to sail to the upper end of the bay of Vigo, which he accordingly did; and having landed his men, marched to Ponta Vedra, which place surrendered without opposition. Here was also found a great quantity of brass artillery, small arms, and military stores, which had been intended for the invasion of England. Major-general Wade returned with his booty and troops to Vigo on the twenty-third of October. The next day lord Cobham, finding it would be impossible for him to maintain his ground any longer in Spain, ordered the forces to be embarked, as likewise the cannon, &c. which being done by the twenty-seventh, he sailed that day for England, where he arrived about the middle of November, having lost in the whole expedition about three hundred men only, killed, dead, or deserted. The expedition to the West Indies was long delayed by contrary winds, and at last prevented by the conclusion of the peace.

Spain was now obliged to drain the cup of humiliation to the very dregs, her enemies being not only too powerful for her to subdue, but even to think of resisting. The French had made themselves masters of Fontarabia and Roses, two of the principal keys to the kingdom, and threatened to carry their victorious arms into its very bowels, while Philip V. had no longer a fleet to send to sea, and saw his armies destroyed, the trade of the nation ruined, and his subjects desponding and ripe for revolt. In this situation, he had recourse to peace, as the only means to secure him the possession of a throne which shook under him; and sent orders to the duke de Borette Landi, his minister at the Hague, to accede to the quadruple alliance. To complete his humiliation, he was obliged to dismiss cardinal Alberoni from his service, and even banish him the kingdom. The king of England and the regent of France, to whom that minister had rendered himself personally disagreeable, refusing to hearken to any proposals while he continued in office. The war with Spain, though drawn out to a greater length than is here specified, it was thought proper to comprehend it in one general view, that the reader might be able to form an idea of the whole, and might not have his attention distracted by foreign affairs, while pursuing the course of the English history *.

On the fourteenth day of November the king returned to England, and on the twenty-third opened the session of parliament with a speech; in which he told them, that all Europe, as well as Great Britain, was on the point of being delivered from the calamities of war, by the influence of British arms and councils. He exhorted the commons to concert proper means for lessening the debts of the nation. The addresses of both houses were as warm as he could desire: they in particular thanked him for having interposed in favour of the protestants of Hungary, Poland, and Germany, who had been oppressed by the practices of the popish clergy, and presented to him a memorial containing the detail of their grievances.

The peerage-bill was now revived by the duke of Buckingham; and, notwithstanding the vigorous opposition made by several members, passed through the upper house with great dispatch; but when it was sent down to the commons, Mr. Robert Walpole attacked it with great vehemence; it was also opposed by a considerable number of Whig members, and, after warm debates, rejected by a large majority. The next object that engrossed the attention of the parliament, was a bill for better securing the dependency of Ireland upon the crown of Great Britain. This bill took its rise from an appeal to the house of peers in England, by Maurice Annesley, against a decree of the house of peers in Ireland, which the British house of peers received, and ordered the barons of the Exchequer in Ireland to put Mr. Annesley in possession of certain lands he had lost by the decree in that kingdom. The barons obeyed this order, and the Irish house of peers passed a vote against them, as having acted in derogation to the king's prerogative in his high court of parliament in Ireland, as also of the rights and privileges of that kingdom and of the parliament thereof: they likewise ordered them to be taken into custody of the usher of the black-rod. They transmitted a long representation to the king, demonstrating their right to the final judicature of causes; and the duke of Leeds, in the upper house, urged fifteen reasons to support the claim of the Irish peers. Notwithstanding these arguments the house of lords in England resolved, "That the barons of the Exchequer in Ireland had acted with great courage, according to law, in support of his majesty's prerogative, and with fidelity to the crown of Great Britain. They addressed the king to confer on them some marks of his royal favour, as a recompence for the ill usage they had undergone. Finally, they prepared the bill, by which the Irish house of lords was deprived of all right to pass sentence, affirm or reserve any judgment or decree, given or made in any court within that kingdom. The bill was carried by a considerable majority, and received the royal assent†.

The king had, in his speech, earnestly recommended the consideration of all proper means for lessening the debts of the nation: accordingly a scheme was laid to reduce all the public funds into one, for discharging that debt. The scheme was projected by sir John Blount, who had been bred a scrivener, and was possessed of all the cunning, plausibility, and boldness, requisite for such an undertaking. He communicated his plan to Mr. Aislaby, chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as to one of the secretaries of state, and the project was adopted.

In the month of January, 1720, the South Sea Company, of which Blount was one of the directors, proposed to the house of commons to give three millions five hundred thousand pounds, for the privilege of taking in all the irredeemable debts (amounting in all to very near eight hundred thousand pounds per annum), and also the redeemable debts then at the Exchequer and Bank (mostly bearing five per cent.) either by purchase from the proprietors, or by subscriptions into their capital stock. This project exciting the jealousy of the Bank of England, the directors of the latter company, on the very same day, offered above five millions for the same privilege. This rivalry proved, in effect, the bane of the whole plan; for a second proposal of the South Sea Company amounted to no less than seven millions and an half, in case those debts should be subscribed, and in that proportion for any part of them; and also farther proposed to pay to the use of the public one year's purchase of all such of the long irredeemable annuities as should not be brought into their capital. The Bank made a second proposal still more advantageous to the public in sundry respects, and therein obliged themselves to give seventeen hundred pounds Bank stock for every hundred pounds irredeemable long annuities. But the South Sea Company being resolved, at any rate, to obtain the liberty of taking in the public debts, and flushed with their late success in taking in the greatest part of the annuities of the lottery of 1710, carried their aims so far as to offer to incorporate all the funds of the Bank, East India Company, and the Exchequer, into their own capital: but although that was not relished, the very rumour of such a scheme raised their stock to one hundred and twenty-six per cent. Let any person of common understanding consider one moment how it could be possible for either company to effect what they now proposed (so as not to be losers themselves), without egregiously deceiving and injuring the proprietors of these debts; was it not therefore most unaccountable in a British parliament and ministry, to give encouragement to a proposal of so obviously pernicious a nature? Such, however, was the case; and while this affair of the South Sea Company was debating in the house of commons, the stock of that company rose gradually from one hundred and twenty-six, to above three hundred, and advanced to near four hundred; but,

* The celebrated Joseph Addison, esq. some time secretary of state, well known for his fine genius, displayed in the Spectators and other elegant writings, died in June this year, 1719; and not long before, that eminent physician sir Samuel Garth departed this life, famous, as well for his knowledge in the art of poetry, as for his skill in his profession: he was physician general to the army.

† In November, John Matthews, a printer in Little Britain, was executed at Tyburn, for printing and publishing a treasonable libel, intitled Vox Populi Vox Dei, in which the pretender's right to the crown of these realms was asserted, in breach of the statute of the fourth of queen Anne, which makes the asserting any such thing in writing or printing, high treason.

after some fluctuation settled at about three hundred and thirty, in which state, with little variation, it continued to the end of March. This great rise was chiefly owing to the rejection of a motion for a clause in the South Sea bill, to fix what share in the capital stock of the company the proprietors of the annuities should have, who would voluntarily subscribe; or how many years purchase in money they should receive upon subscribing; at the choice of the proprietors. In conclusion, the South Sea company's last proposal was accepted in parliament, and a bill brought in, on the second of April, 1720, "for enabling that company to increase their present capital stock by redeeming such public debts and incumbrances as are therein mentioned; and for raising money to be applied for lessening several of the public debts and incumbrances; and for calling in the present Exchequer-bills remaining uncanceled, and for making forth new bills in lieu thereof, to be circulated and exchanged upon demand, at or near the Exchequer."

This bill passed the commons by a very great majority (one hundred and seventy-two against fifty-five), and was sent to the lords for their concurrence, where it occasioned a long debate, being vigorously opposed by the lord North and Grey, the earl Cowper, the dukes of Wharton, Buckingham, and other peers. They urged what afterwards proved but too true: "That it was calculated for the enriching of a few, and the ruin of many: that it countenanced the pernicious practice of stock-jobbing, thereby diverting the proper genius of the people from trade and industry: that the artificial raising of South Sea stock so high as its then price, while the bill was depending [viz. 319] per cent.] was a dangerous bait for decoying the unwary to their ruin, by a false proposal of gain, to part with what they had gotten with labour and industry, for imaginary wealth: that it would give foreigners an opportunity of perhaps trebling the great sums they already possessed in our funds, and it would thereby drain the kingdom of its treasure, when they should realize their stock: that a national bargain should wisely be made, with more advantage to the public than to individuals; but this scheme was quite the reverse, since, if the South Sea stock should be kept up at three hundred per cent. its old members would gain above thirty millions, whilst the public was only to avail themselves of but a quarter of that sum: that although neither of the proposals of the two rival companies were fit to be received, yet that of the Bank was fairer, as they declared plainly what they would give the long annuitants in their stock: but if, nevertheless, the South Sea company's proposals should be accepted, the rise of their stock should be limited, for preventing the pernicious effects of stock-jobbing in so high a degree as was like to happen."

To all which, and much more said against the scheme, the earl of Sunderland, and others of the ministerial advocates, answered, by declaring, that those who encouraged the scheme of the South Sea company, had nothing in view but the easing the nation of part of the heavy load of debts under which it laboured; that the managers for that company had undoubtedly a prospect of gain, either to themselves or to their corporation; but that when the scheme was accepted, neither the ministry nor the company could foresee this great rise of their stock; that if it had continued as it was when the bargain was struck, viz. at one hundred and thirty-seven per cent. the public would have been the greater gainer; and lastly, that it was but reasonable that the South Sea company should enjoy the profits procured to it by the wise management and industry of the directors, which would enable it to make large dividends, and thereby accomplish the purpose of the scheme. After these and some other speeches, the bill passed without amendment, and on the seventh of April received the royal assent*.

By this act the company was declared willing, and was accordingly authorized, to take in, by purchase or subscription, the irredeemable debts of the nations, stated at sixteen millions five hundred forty-six thousand four hundred and eighty-two pounds, seven shillings, and one penny farthing, at such times as they should find convenient, before the first day of March of the ensuing year, without any compulsion of any of the proprietors, at such rates and prices as should be agreed upon between the company and respective proprietors.

For the liberty of taking in the national debts, and increasing their capital stock accordingly, the company consented that their present and to be increased annuity should be continued at the rate of five per cent. till midsummer, 1727; and from thence to be reduced to four per cent. and to be redeemable by parliament. In consideration of this and other advantages, expressed in the act, the company declared themselves willing to make such payments into the receipt of the Exchequer as were therein specified, for the use of the public, to be applied to the discharge of the public debts incurred before Christmas, 1716.

The sum they were obliged to pay for the liberty of taking in the redeemable debts, four years and a half purchase for all the long and short annuities that should be subscribed, and one year's purchase for such long annuities as should not be subscribed, amounted, on the execution of the act, to about seven millions. For enabling the company to raise this sum, they were empowered to make calls for money from their members, to open books of subscription, to grant annuities redeemable by the company, to borrow money upon any contract or bill, under their common seal, or on the credit of their capital stock; without, however, making any addition to the company's annuities.

It was enacted, that out of the first moneys arising from the sums paid by the company into the Exchequer, such public debts carrying interest at five per cent. incurred before the twenty-fifth of November, 1716, founded upon any former act of parliament, as were now redeemable, or might be redeemed before the twenty-fifth day of December, 1722, should be discharged in the first place; and that all the remainder should be applied towards paying off so much of the capital stock of the company as should then carry interest at five per cent. It was likewise provided, that after Midsummer, 1722, the company should not be paid off in any sum less than one million at a time†.

Such was the nature of the South Sea scheme; which, however promising in appearance, was afterwards productive of so much mischief to the nation.

† See Stat. 6 George I. cap. iii.

The year 1720 is remarkable beyond any other which can be pitch upon by historians, for extraordinary and romantic projects, proposals and undertakings, both private and national, and which therefore might be recorded as a perpetual memento to all legislators and ministers of our own nation, never to leave it in the power of any set of designing men hereafter to put in practice so shameful and baneful an imposition on the credulity of the people, thereby diverted from their lawful industry.

Among the several projects set on foot at this period, the two principal were for establishing the two companies of the Royal Assurance, headed by lord Onslow, and of the London Assurance, by the lord Chetwynd; who hearing that the civil list was considerably in arrear, they offered to the ministry sixty thousand pounds, towards the discharge of those incumbrances, provided they might obtain the king's charter, with a parliamentary sanction, for the establishment of their respective companies. The proposal was accepted, and the king imparted it to the house of commons, desiring their concurrence. A bill was immediately framed, and passed, enabling his majesty to grant letters of incorporation to the two companies; which soon obtained the royal assent*.

On the eleventh of June the king put an end to the session with a speech, in which he signified his intention of visiting his German dominions; for which he actually set out some few days after the prorogation of the parliament. But before his departure from Great Britain he was reconciled to the prince of Wales, chiefly through the mediation of the duke of Devonshire and Mr. Robert Walpole, who, with lord Cowper, lord Townshend, Mr. Merhuen, and Mr. Pulteney, were received into favour, and re-associated with the ministry. The earls of Dorset and Bridgewater were advanced to the title of dukes, the lord viscount Castleton was made an earl, Hugh Boscawen was created lord viscount Falmouth, John Wallop viscount Ly-mington, Matthew Ducie Morton, and John Barrington of Becket, were both of them promoted to the dignity of barons.

While the king was employed abroad in reconciling the respective interests of the different states of Europe, the South-sea scheme produced a kind of national phrenzy in England, and nothing was now minded but the business of stock-jobbing. Exchange-alley, where these affairs were transacted, was in a continual hurry, where crowds of all ranks and qualities daily resorted, on a report being propagated that Gibraltar and Mahon would be given up to the Spaniards for some places in Peru, by which means the English trade to the South-sea would be protected and enlarged. This rumour, diffused with great industry, inspired the people with such extravagant hopes, that in five days after passing the bill, no less than two millions of original stock was subscribed. It would be altogether inconsistent with the design of a general history, and afford very little entertainment to the reader, should I enter into a detail of the proceedings, or explain the various or unwarrantable acts that were practised to enhance the value of the stocks: suffice it to say, that by the promise of larger dividends, and other illegal acts, Blount, the first projector (who, with very moderate talents, led all the other directors) raised the stock of the company to above 1000 l. per cent. The desperate, who ventured first, were generally gainers, while the wiser and more sedate, who came in later, were many of them great sufferers; and so the Wrongheads (as was then the term) had the better of the Longheads.

“ This, of all others (to use the words of a modern author †) is the most unfavourable æra for an historian: a reader of any sentiment and imagination cannot be entertained or interested by a dry detail of such transactions as admit of no warmth, no colouring, nor embellishment; a detail of which serves only to exhibit an inanimated picture of tasteless vice, and mean degeneracy.” This was the æra of interested projects, inspired by a venal spirit of adventure, and deservedly called Bubbles, which grew up from the corruption of the great-bubble, or South-sea stock. They were near one hundred in number, and it was reckoned that almost a million and a half was won or lost in them. In short, the nation was so transported with a spirit of gaming, that people became a prey to the most impudent impostors; and this infatuation continued to prevail till the eighth of September, when the stock began to fall faster than it had rose, having nothing but an imaginary foundation to support it, till by Michaelmas day it sunk to 150. Some of the leading men of the nation, who were deeply concerned in these fraudulent practices, seeing the price of stocks sinking daily, employed all their interest with the Bank to support the South-sea; that corporation agreed, or, more properly speaking, it was reported that it had agreed, to take a quantity of the South-sea stock at 400 per cent. in payment for three millions seven hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds, redeemable debt, which the company was to repay on Lady-day and Michaelmas of the ensuing year. This was afterwards called the Bank-contract, the very surmise of which had run up South-sea stock prodigiously, which however fell soon after as fast, when it was found that the said supposed contract was no reality, but a mere temporary and very unjust expedient, to quiet the clamours of the people; for the directors of the Bank finding their property in danger of being swept away by the portentous tide of ruin, which now bore down every thing before it, renounced their agreement, which they were not obliged to perform; and the South-sea company being deprived of this support, soon sunk under its own weight; in consequence of which, many ancient and good families were impoverished or ruined, whilst a few upstarts got thousands. Public credit received a terrible shock: the nation was thrown into a dangerous ferment, and nothing was heard but the ravings of grief, disappointment, and despair. Suc-

* This was the original rise of the present two very useful and flourishing insurance corporations, who are also empowered to lend money on bottomree; and each of them afterwards obtained charters for insuring from loss by fire: yet neither of them are, by the before-mentioned statute, nor by their consequent charters, exclusive in any respect relating to private persons, who may and still do enjoy and practise insurance on ships and merchandize as formerly; but with respect to all other corporations they are both exclusive, excepting however the East India and South Sea companies, both which continue to advance money (says the statute) by bottomree on their own ships.

cessive expressés were dispatched to Hanover, representing to the king the state of affairs, and earnestly pressing him to hasten his return. He accordingly shortened his stay in Germany, and arrived in England in the month of November.

The parliament being re-assembled on the eighth day of December, his majesty made a speech to both houses, acquainting them, that during his absence from England, the face of our affairs abroad had become more favourable: the peace in the South, he said, wanted only the form of a congress, and that in the North was brought much nearer to a conclusion: he promised to lay before them, at a proper time, the several treaties he had entered into, by which they would perceive the success of his endeavours to establish a peace throughout Europe, and to secure and support the protestant religion: he expressed his concern for the unhappy turn of affairs, which had so deeply affected the public credit at home; and he earnestly desired the house of commons to consider of the most effectual and speedy methods to restore the national credit, and fix it upon a lasting foundation.

The lower house was too much interested in the calamity to postpone the consideration of that subject: the members seemed to lay aside all party-distinction, and vie with each other in promoting an enquiry: they ordered the directors to produce an account of all their proceedings. Sir Joseph Jekyll moved that a select committee should be appointed to examine the particulars of these transactions. In the course of the debate, Mr. Walpole told the house he had formed a scheme for restoring public credit, which was, to ingraft nine millions of the South-sea stock into the Bank of England, and the like sum into the East India company, on certain conditions. This scheme was approved of, and a bill for that purpose was prepared, passed through both houses, and received the royal assent. Another bill was enacted into a law for restraining the sub-governor, deputy-governor, directors, treasurer, under-treasurer, cashier, secretary, and accountants, from quitting the kingdom for the space of one year; and for discovering their estates and effects, so as to prevent them from being transported or alienated; a committee of secrecy was chosen by ballot to examine all books, papers, and proceedings, relating to the execution of the South-sea act.

The lords shewed an equal earnestness with the commons to prosecute the enquiry into this iniquitous transaction, though divers members in both houses were deeply involved in the guilt of it. The sub-governor, the deputy-governor, the directors and officers of the South-sea company, were examined at the bar of the house, when all of them were declared criminal, and severely reprimanded for their illegal conduct. Soon after, a bill was brought in to disable them from enjoying any office in that company, or in the East India company, or in the Bank of England. Three brokers were examined, and made great discoveries. Mr. Knight, the treasurer of the South-sea company, who had been intrusted with the secrets of the whole affair, thought proper to withdraw himself from the kingdom. A proclamation was issued for apprehending him, and another for preventing any of the directors from escaping as he had done. About the same time, at the desire of the committee of secrecy, the books and papers of Knight, Surman, and Turner, were ordered to be secured, and their bodies (those of the two last) taken into custody, together with those of sir George Caswell, sir John Blount, sir John Lambert, sir John Fellows, and Mr. Grigsby; sir Theodore Janssen, sir Robert Chaplain, Mr. Sawbridge, and Mr. Eyles, members of the lower house, were expelled from their seats, and imprisoned. Mr. Aislaby resigned his employments of chancellor of the Exchequer and lord of the Treasury; and orders were given to remove all directors of the South-sea company from any places they might enjoy under the government *.

In the beginning of February, 1721, the lords proposed to have examined sir John Blount, the principal projector of the South-sea scheme, in hopes that his evidence would give them great lights into that mysterious transaction; but Blount effectually disappointed them, by refusing even to be sworn to such interrogatories as should be put to him, alleging, that he had already been examined before the secret committee of the house of commons, and that concerning such a variety of affairs, that unless he had a copy of his examination he could not remember every particular; and as no man was obliged to accuse himself, he would not run the risk of being guilty of prevarication. The lords were provoked at this frivolous excuse; but having had intimation that Blount's design was to engage the two houses in a quarrel, they thought proper to sacrifice their resentment to the preservation of that unity which was necessary between the two houses during the settling of this great and national concern. In the debate how they should proceed in this unprecedented case, the duke of Wharton made such severe reflections on the ministry, that earl Stanhope, considering himself personally levelled at, replied with such vehemence as produced a violent head-ach, and obliged him to quit the house and retire home. He was bled and cupped that night, and the next morning was pretty well recovered; but in the evening of the same day he fell into a drowsiness, which was succeeded by a suffocation, in which he instantly expired. The king deeply regretted the loss of a subject, who at all times, and on all occasions, had distinguished himself by his zeal for the house of Hanover. Lord viscount Townshend was appointed to fill his place of secretary. Two days after the death of earl Stanhope, Mr. James Craggs, the other secretary, was seized with the small-pox, of which he died the next day, viz. the sixteenth of February. Thus in the space of eleven days England lost two secretaries of state. The lord Carteret succeeded Mr. Craggs in his place. Knight, the cashier of the South-sea company, being seized at Tirlmont, by the vigilance of Mr. Gandot, secretary to Mr. Leathes, the British resident at Brussels, was confined in the citadel of Antwerp; but the states of Antwerp insisting upon their privilege, called the Joyful Entry, granted by the emperor Charles V. and solemnly recognized by all his successors, that no person apprehended for any crime in Brabant should be tried in any other country, refused to deliver him up to the messenger sent over from hence by the government: and while expresses were passing to and fro on this occasion, Mr. Knight found means to make his escape from his prison in Antwerp. Several members of the house of commons were very loud in their invectives against the pusillanimity and little influence of our ministry abroad, who were to be satisfied with such a frivolous excuse, as they called it, and had not peremptorily insisted on Knight's being immediately sent over. On this occasion we have a remarkable instance how party animosity and national pride will sometimes blind the most able and discerning. How else are we to account for the proceedings of the house of commons on this occasion? Is it not surprising that a nation, which had spilt seas of blood in defence of its own liberties, should yet represent the preservation of liberty in another state as a frivolous pretence, and censure a ministry for not insisting upon the violation of it? The English had foolishly suffered themselves to be despised and ruined, with their eyes open; and therefore, to save them from the effects of their folly, or rather to give them an opportunity of punishing the person who had taken advantage of that folly, the Brabantines must be deprived of their liberties! The truth however seems to be, that it was never the design or wish of many of the leading men at home, that Knight should ever be compelled to revisit his native country; they were sensible he knew enough to make them tremble.

A sufficient discovery was, however, made by the secret committee, to convince the world that there had been transacted a scene of the deepest villainy and fraud that hell ever contrived to ruin a nation (these are the very words of one of that committee in the house of commons.) In some of the books false and fictitious entries had been made; in others, entries with blanks; and some entries with razures and alterations; in others, leaves had been torn out. It appeared also that, before any subscription could be made, a fictitious stock of five hundred and seventy-four thousand pounds had been disposed of by the directors, to facilitate the passing the bill. Great part of this was distributed among the earl of Sunderland, Mr. Craggs, senior, the duchess of Kendal, the countess of Platen and her two nieces, Mr. secretary Craggs, and Mr. Aislaby, chancellor of the Exchequer. In consequence of the commons report, the house came to several severe, though just resolutions, against the directors and officers of the South-sea company; and a bill was prepared for the relief of the unhappy sufferers, out of the estates of the delinquents. The earl of Sunderland and Mr. Stanhope, one of the secretaries of the Treasury, who was likewise charged with fraudulent practices on this occasion, had the good fortune to obtain a majority in their favour, and so were acquitted, though Sunderland thought proper to resign his place of first commissioner of the Treasury, in which Mr. Robert Walpole was reinstated; but Mr. Aislaby did not escape so easily: the evidences against him were so strong, that he was expelled the house, committed to the Tower, and almost the whole of his estate sequestered. Sir John Blount, the projector of this destructive scheme, had fled the land about the same time with Knight. Mr. Craggs, senior, died before his affair came before the house: however, they resolved that he was a notorious accomplice with Robert Knight, and some of the directors, in carrying on their scandalous practices; and therefore, that all the estate of which he was possessed, from the first day of December, 1719, should be applied towards the relief of the unhappy sufferers in the South-sea company. The sum of two millions fourteen thousand pounds was confiscated out of the joint estates of the several directors, towards making good the damage sustained by the company, after a certain allowance had been deducted from each, according to their conduct and circumstances*. This was done by an act of parliament, which received the royal assent on July 29, 1721; and on August 10 his majesty passed the bill for restoring public credit.

By these wise and vigorous resolutions of the parliament, the South-sea company was soon in a condition to fulfil their engagements with the public, and the calamities of the people, which had been carried to the most outrageous height, were in great measure appeased, and tranquility restored to the nation. Mr. Robert Walpole had shewed himself particularly assiduous in settling this distracted affair, and restoring the credit of the nation, which endeared him greatly to his sovereign, who now took him into full favour. Besides being appointed chancellor of the Exchequer and first lord of the Treasury, he was about two years after honoured with the order of the Bath, then of the Garter, and continued prime minister to the end of this reign, and fifteen years after.

The supplies in this session were voted very late; nor even at length were they granted with the usual cheerfulness and alacrity: in order therefore to quicken their proceedings, his majesty thought proper, on the sixteenth day of June, to acquaint the commons that he had agreed to pay a subsidy to Sweden, and hoped they would enable him to make good his engagements. This intimation produced a violent debate: the leaders of the opposition desired to know whether this subsidy, amounting to seventy-two thousand pounds, was to be paid to Sweden, exclusive of the expence of maintaining a strong fleet in the Baltic? They alleged, that most of our treaties made with that crown had been inconsistent and contradictory: they acknowledged that hemp was a very necessary commodity; but then they thought it might be had from our American colonies, by giving a proper encouragement to the culture of it there, at a cheaper rate than we were now furnished with it either from Sweden or Norway. These and several other objections were answered by the court-party, who having the majority in the house, they carried the subsidy in the affirmative.

In less than three weeks after this demand, the patience of the commons was put to a second trial, by another message from the king, informing them that the debts of the civil list amounted to five hundred and fifty thousand pounds; and that his majesty hoped they would empower him to raise this sum upon the revenue, as he proposed it should be replaced on the civil list, and reimbursed by a deduction from the salaries and wages of all officers, and the pensions and other payments from the crown. The Tory members were greatly alarmed at this second message, which they considered as a very new and unusual method of acting, not only in regard to the manner in which it was done, but also the time, when, by reason of the advanced season of the year, so many members had retired into the country, on the conviction that no farther business of consequence remained to be transacted. Mr. Shippen, who on every occasion distinguished himself by his opposition to the measures of the court (sometimes with justice and reason on his side, but not unfrequently from the mere motives of rancour and animosity) remarked, that the ways and means of raising supplies had always been left to the direction of the commons; but that in this juncture, not only the sum, but the manner of raising it, was prescribed to them, which was reducing the house to the level of a parliament of Paris. All his arguments, or those of his party, however, though supported with all the power of rhetoric and popularity, were rendered of no effect by the decisive sentence of a MAJORITY: the king's request was granted, and at the same time an act passed for a general pardon; and on the tenth day of August his majesty closed the session with a speech, in which he declared, that he entertained a most sincere concern for the sufferings of the innocent, and a just indignation against the guilty, in the affair of the South-sea scheme: that he had readily given his assent to such bills as they had presented to him for punishing the authors of the late misfortunes, and for obtaining restitution and satisfaction to those who had been injured by them in such a notorious manner: that they could not fail to have observed the discontents occasioned by this unhappy event, which had been industriously fomented and inflamed by wicked and seditious libels; but he doubted not but by their prudent conduct in their several counties, all the enemies of this government, who flattered themselves with the prospect of blowing up the present complaints into popular disaffection, would be finally disappointed in their designs and expectations.

These professions were judged necessary at this time, to obviate the ill effects that had been produced in the minds of the people, by the insinuations of the discontented party, who had industriously whispered about that the king himself was not free from connections with the projectors of the South-sea scheme: that it was at his desire the demand of Knight's being surrendered had been rejected; and that he secretly favoured the directors and their accomplices. From the strictest review of the character of his majesty, however, it is but justice to acknowledge, that if ever he seemed

Some alterations were afterwards made in these allowances; Mr. Astell had 10,000 l. instead of 5,000 l. Sir John Blount, 5,000 l. instead of 1,000 l. Sir Lambert Blackwell, 15,000 l. instead of 10,000 l. and Mr. Hawes, 5,000 l. instead of 31 l. 2 d. A motion was made to reduce Sir Theodore Janssen's allowance to 30,000 l. but it was rejected. Tindal.

† The whole capital stock at the end of the year 1720, amounted to about thirty-seven millions eight hundred thousand pounds. The stock allotted to all the proprietors did not exceed twenty-four millions five hundred thousand pounds: the remaining capital stock belonged to the company in their corporate capacity. It was the profit arising from the execution of the South-sea scheme; and out of this the bill enacted that seven millions should be paid to the public. The present act likewise directed several additions to be made to the stock of the proprietors, out of that possessed by the company in their own right: it made a particular distribution of stock, amounting to two millions two hundred thousand pounds; and upon remitting five millions of the seven to be paid to the public, annihilated two millions of their capital. It was enacted, that after these distributions, the remaining capital stock should be divided amongst all the proprietors: this dividend amounted to thirty-three pounds six shillings and eight-pence per cent. and deprived the company of eight millions nine hundred thousand pounds. They had lent above eleven millions on stock unredeemed, of which the par discharged all the debtors upon their paying ten per cent. Upon this article the company's loss exceeded six millions nine hundred thousand pounds; for many debtors refused to make any payment. The proprietors of the stock loudly complained of their being deprived of two millions, and the parliament in the sequel revived that sum, which had been annihilated.

to deviate from the principles of government, it ought to be attributed to the suggestions of a venal and corrupt ministry.

I must not forget to mention, that in the course of this session a remarkable bill was debated in the house of lords, for the more effectual suppressing of blasphemy and prophaneness. There was certainly too much occasion for such a bill, the rapid circulation of money, the sudden elevation of persons of the meanest rank, and the almost total dissolution of property, occasioned by the infamous South-sea scheme having introduced a surprising profligacy of life and manners: but as the bill chiefly tended to set up a sort of inquisition on mens consciences, with regard to some speculative points wherein good and sober Christians differ, it met with such a rational opposition that it came to nothing.

Besides the lords Townshend and Carteret being appointed secretaries of state, the earl of Ilay was constituted keeper of the privy-seal of Scotland, and the earl of Bute admitted a lord of the bed-chamber. On the fifteenth of April this year, the princess of Wales was happily delivered of a prince named William Augustus, the late illustrious duke of Cumberland. I shall observe here once for all, that his royal highness the prince of Wales had afterwards in this reign two daughters, the princess Mary and Louisa. In the course of this year pope Clement XI. died. A dreadful plague raging at Marseilles, a proclamation was published, forbidding any person to come into England from any part of France, between the Bay of Biscay and Dunkirk, without certificates of health.

In June the treaty of peace between Great Britain and Spain was signed at Madrid. At the same time a defensive alliance was concluded between Great Britain, France, and Spain. Peace was also restored to the North by a treaty concluded between Russia and Sweden. To conclude, king George made a treaty this year with the Moors of Africa, which gave great umbrage to the Spaniards*.

The French having for a considerable time formed a project to join their colony of Canada to that of Louisiana, and also to obtain a port in the Ocean, they for those ends began very early after the treaty of Utrecht to extend their limits on that continent; and although the fifteenth article of that treaty had absolutely excluded them from molesting or encroaching on the five Indian nations of the Iroquois, as being particularly subject to the British crown; yet in this year they seized on the most important pass of Niagara, and fortified the same, whereby they were the better able to command the lakes, and to form the plan of extending their power to the river Ohio, and to carry their chain of forts and settlements from thence to the Mississippi. This fort they held till the year 1759. In the mean time, they had, by a thousand arts, debauched these five Indian nations so far, that they were brought to murder great numbers of our people who had settled amongst them.

Nothing more material passed either at home or abroad, in respect to English affairs, this summer. The parliament being assembled again on the nineteenth day of October, continued sitting till the month of March, when the supplies being granted, and the business of the session dispatched as the court was pleased to dictate, it was dissolved, and another convoked by proclamation. The most remarkable transaction of this session was, the resolving, on account of the great abuse that had been made of the liberty of protesting, that such lords as might enter protestations, with reasons, should do it before two o'clock the next day, and sign them before the house rises. It was the earl of Sunderland who made the motion that led to this resolution. Thus ended the first septennial parliament, and which had, during its existence, set a strong example of implicit submission to the will of a court. In the election of members for the ensuing parliament, the Whigs, by their superior interest, gained an incontestible majority, and consequently the same dispositions prevailed in this assembly as in the preceding one.

On the nineteenth of April, 1722, died Charles Spencer, earl of Sunderland, groom of the stole to his majesty, and who had been secretary of state, president of the council, and held other high offices under the government. He quitted life under the load of popular odium, from his supposed connexions with the directors of the South Sea company. He was a minister of abilities, but violent, impetuous, and headstrong. His death was soon followed by that of his father-in-law the great duke of Marlborough, whose faculties had been for some time greatly impaired: he was interred in Westminster abbey, with such profusion of funeral pomp as evinced the pride and ostentation, much more than the taste and concern of those who directed his obsequies. He was succeeded as master of the ordnance and colonel of the first regiment of foot-guards by the earl of Cadogan.

In the beginning of May the nation was alarmed with the report of a new conspiracy formed against his majesty's person and government. It was said that the king had received the first information of it from the duke of Orleans, regent of France. These general reports were adjudged sufficient to spread the certainty of a plot universally. The troops were assembled, augmented, and encamped in several parts of the kingdom: a fleet was fitted out with the greatest diligence: lieutenant-general M^cCartney was dispatched to Ireland, to bring over some troops from that kingdom; some suspected persons were apprehended in Scotland; the States of Holland were desired to have their auxiliary or guaranty troops in readiness to be embarked; and colonel Churchill was sent to the court of France with a private commission. The lord Townshend wrote a letter to the mayor of London, by the king's command, signifying his majesty's having received unquestionable advices, that several of his subjects had entered into a wicked conspiracy, in concert with traitors abroad, for raising a rebellion in favour of a popish pretender; but that he was firmly assured the authors of it neither were, or would be supported by any foreign power. This letter was immediately answered by an affectionate address from the court of aldermen: the example of London was followed by many other cities and boroughs. The king had determined to visit Hanover, and actually settled the regency, in which the prince of Wales was not included: but now this intended journey was laid aside; the court was removed to Kensington, and the prince retired to Richmond. In a word, such precautions were taken, as if the utmost danger threatened the state, and the pretender, at the head of an innumerable armed force, had already set foot in the kingdom.

In order to stamp the appearance of reality upon this imaginary conspiracy, and to justify the measures that had occasioned such a consternation, it was necessary to produce a number of persons as agents or promoters of it. The two first persons taken up on suspicion were Mr. Christopher Layer, a young counsellor of the Temple, and Dr. Atterbury, bishop of Rochester. This prelate could not boast of an illustrious descent; but this defect, if it may be allowed so to call it, was amply compensated by the eminent virtues and shining qualities which adorned his character. To his merit alone he was indebted for the high rank he held in the church: he was a consummate divine, an eloquent preacher, and endowed with the most accomplished and refined talents; he was an admirer and patron of polite literature, which he ever encouraged in those who cultivated it. To these qualifications he joined an inflexible honesty, which no circumstances of time or interest could alter, by which he had justly acquired the love and esteem of the most respectable personages in the kingdom: but he was unfortunate enough to have incurred the hatred of the ministry by being at the head of the rigid Tories. His sentiments with regard to monarchical power and the high-church had first displayed themselves under the preceding reign; he was one of the most zealous advocates for Dr. Sacheverel, in that grand affair which proved the downfall of Marlborough and the Whig faction. In a word, his high rank, and the great influence he had over the Tory party, seems to have been his principal crime; and by all that can be gathered from the accounts of this period, it was in order effectually to remove him out of their way that the Whigs invented a plot, which made so great a noise at the time of its pretended discovery, and which, by the event, seems to have existed only in the minds of those who claimed the merit of its detection; for the persons said to be concerned in it, must have been infatuated to a degree of frenzy, since they were charged with having made application to the regent of France, who was well known to be intimately connected with the king of Great Britain. It is by no means improbable, that the party who first set this pretended plot on foot, might have provided such letters for the inspection of his majesty, as might induce him to give credit to the report, and have occasioned his expressing himself in the manner he did, as well in his letter to the city, as afterwards to the two houses on the assembling of the new parliament.

However this might be, the bishop of Rochester was, immediately on his being apprehended, committed to the Tower for high-treason, and was soon after followed by the earl of Orrery, the lord North and Grey, Mr. Cochran, and Mr. Smith, from Scotland: Mr. George Kelly an Irish clergyman, Mr. Robert Cotton of Huntingdonshire, Mr. Bingley, Mr. Fleetwood, Neynoe, an Irish priest, and several other persons, were also taken into custody; and Mr. Shippen, the perpetual arraigner of ministerial measures, had his house searched. Loud and universal were the complaints of all moderate persons, and those who had a true regard for our happy constitution, at seeing measures pursued that favoured rather of despotic power, than the regular proceedings of justice in a free country. These clamours, however, were industriously kept from the ears of the sovereign, who, doubtless, conscious of the rectitude of his own conduct, passed the summer of this year in pleasurable progresses through the kingdom, in which he was attended by the prince of Wales.

The new parliament assembling on the ninth of October, his majesty laid before them the nature of the conspiracy: he said, the conspirators had, by their emissaries, made the strongest instances for succours from foreign powers, but were disappointed in their expectations: nevertheless, confiding in their numbers, they resolved once more, upon their own strength, to attempt the subversion of his government: he said, they had provided considerable sums of money, engaged great numbers of officers abroad, secured large quantities of arms and ammunition; and had not the plot been timely discovered, the whole nation, and particularly the city of London, would have been involved in blood and confusion: he expatiated upon the mildness and integrity of his government, and inveighed against the ingratitude, the implacability, and madness, of the disaffected; concluding with an assurance, that he would steadily adhere to the constitution in church and state, and continue to make the laws of the realm the rule and measure of all his actions.

When we repeat that the ministry had procured an undoubted majority in the house of commons, it may be supposed that the address on this occasion was such as those in power thought proper to dictate; and, as a finishing stroke, a bill was brought into the house for suspending the Habeas Corpus act for one whole year. Complaisant as the parliament were, they were by no means unanimous in agreeing to such an unusual length of time, which was, in effect, arming the ministers with an unlimited power, during that period, over the liberties of the people. The house of commons in particular shewed themselves so much averse to such an unconstitutional measure, that Mr. Walpole, now the fast friend of the ministry, had recourse to state tricks to alarm their apprehensions; and a dreadful story was coined of a design to seize the Bank and the Exchequer, and then proclaim the pretender in the Royal Exchange. Absurd as such a notion must appear to every man of common understanding, it had its effect: the bill was passed, and, we may readily suppose, did not wait long for the royal assent. New attachments, in consequence of fresh informations, were now issued forth against several persons of rank and distinction: the duke of Norfolk was brought from Bath under custody of a king's messenger, examined before the council, and committed to the Tower on suspicion of high-treason.

As a further proof of the plot, the original and printed copy of a declaration signed by the pretender, was sent to the house of peers; a production that seemed rather the effect of a distempered brain, than the mature or serious proposal of a person who had been taught to look upon himself as an injured prince, and would have been most properly properly replied to by silent contempt. The lords, however, thought proper to give it a serious perusal, and to pass a solemn resolve, importing, that it was a false, scandalous, and traitorous libel, and ordered it to be burnt at the Royal Exchange. The commons too concurred in this resolve, and joined the lords in an address, signifying their astonishment and indignation at the insolence of the pretender, and assuring his majesty that they were determined to support his title to the crown with their lives and fortunes. Let us, however, peruse this doughty performance, which was judged worthy the animadversions of the most respectable assembly in the universe. It was dated at Lucca, on the 20th day of September 1722, and appeared to be a proposal addressed to the subjects of Great Britain and Ireland, as well as to all foreign princes and states. In this paper the pretender, who thought proper to assume the title of James Rex, affected to talk of the late violations of the freedom of elections; conspiracies invented to give a colour to new oppressions; infamous informers; and the state of proscription, in which he supposed every honest man to be. He then very gravely proposed, that, if king George would resign to him the throne of Great Britain, he would, in return, bestow upon him the title of king in his native dominions, and invite all other states to confirm it. He likewise promised to leave to king George his succession in the British dominions secure, whenever, in due course, his natural right should take place.

On the twenty-first of November, Laver, one of those who had been confined as accomplices in the plot now under consideration, was brought to his trial at the bar of the King's Bench. His indictment set forth, "That he had been employed in forming a most traitorous and horrid plot and conspiracy against his majesty and his government, by enlisting men for the pretender's service, in order to stir up a rebellion; and also that he had held correspondence with the pretender, by carrying letters and treasonable papers to him beyond seas, and from him to the disaffected in this kingdom." After a trial of seventeen hours he was brought in guilty by the jury, and received sentence of death. He was reprieved from time to time, in hopes of his making discoveries; but he either could not or would not satisfy these expectations, and was at length drawn on a sledge to Tyburn, and there hanged and quartered, his head being afterwards fixed up at Temple-Bar.

Bills were now brought in for inflicting pains and penalties against John Plunket and George Kelly, who were by these acts to be kept in close custody during his majesty's pleasure, in any prison in Great Britain; and that they should not attempt to escape, on pain of death, to be inflicted upon them and their assistants.

Mr. Yonge made a motion in the house of commons for a bill of the same nature against the bishop of Rochester, of whose guilt there was no other evidence but conjectures and hearsay; all the proofs that could be brought against that prelate being reduced to two copies of letters in cyphers, directed to him, to which his prosecutors gave such turn as best suited their views. The bishop, finding how matters were likely to go in the lower house, sent a letter to the speaker (Mr. speaker Compton) importing, that he should decline giving the house any trouble, contenting himself with the opportunity of making his defence before another, of which he had the honour to be a member. Counsel being then heard upon the bill, it was committed to a grand committee, on the sixth day of April, 1723, when most of the Tory members having absented themselves from the house, as not chusing to give a sanction by their presence to measures they thought unjust, and knew they could not over-rule; it was then moved that the bishop should be deprived of his office and benefice, banished the kingdom, and be guilty of felony if he returned; and that it should not be in the king's power to pardon him, without the consent of parliament; but that he, nevertheless, should not forfeit his goods and chattels.

The bill being passed, was sent up to the lords: the bishop was brought to his trial before them on the ninth of May, when, after he had been heard by himself and counsel, the house, resolving itself into a grand committee, went through the bill, and on the fifteenth had the third reading, when a motion being made for passing it, there arose a very long and warm debate. The bill was supported by the duke of Argyll, the earl of Seafield, and the lord Lechmere, who used every argument they could devise to shew the guilt of the bishop, and prove the sufficiency of the evidence brought to support the charge. On the other hand, earl Cowper, lord Bathurst, the duke of Wharton, and lord Gower, defended him with no less energy. They demonstrated the danger and injustice of swerving in such an extraordinary manner as was now done, from the fixed rules of evidence: that such a practice would for ever sully the lustre and glory of that illustrious house: that the admitting of the precarious and uncertain evidence of the clerks of the Post-office, was a very dangerous precedent, especially as in this case it was taken for granted that those clerks might carry the similitudes of hands four months in their minds. They desired to know from whom these clerks had received the authority to intercept and open letters, especially those of a lord of parliament; and whether the clerks who copied these letters had themselves intercepted the originals? and whether they had received them from any other person? They applauded the bishop for his noble firmness in refusing to answer before the house of commons, whose proceedings (said earl Cowper) in this unprecedented manner against a peer of the realm, is such an incroachment on the prerogative of the peerage, that if this house submits to it by passing the bill, we may be termed the last of British peers, for giving up our privileges*. Notwithstanding these and many other reasons, equally obvious and forcible, the bill was passed by a majority, and afterwards received the royal assent. Doctor Freind, the celebrated physician, who was a member of the lower house, and had exerted himself in a distinguished manner in defence of the persecuted bishop, was, soon after the trial, taken into custody, on suspicion of treasonable practices.

* Proceedings of the House of Lords. Debates in Parliament.

Two other affairs, which made a great talk, was brought before the parliament this session; the one was the Harburgh lottery, and the other the Ostend East India company. The lottery took its name from the place where it was to be drawn, the town and port of Harburgh, on the river Elbe, within the king's German dominions, where the projector was to settle a trade for the woollen-manufacture between England and Germany. The house of commons having appointed a committee to examine into this, and other lotteries then carrying on in London, found that this latter was an infamous fraudulent undertaking, set on foot with a design to ensnare the unwary, many of whom had been drawn in, to their great loss; whereupon a bill was brought into the lower house, and passed, to suppress this lottery, and to oblige the managers of it to refund to the contributors the sum they had deluded them of. At the same time that house resolved to expel from amongst them the lord viscount Barrington, of the kingdom of Ireland, for having been concerned in carrying on that fraudulent undertaking*.

The affair of the Ostend company was as follows: The emperor Charles VI. desirous to get over the inconvenience he was put to in time of war, for raising the necessary sums to carry it on, turned his attention towards commerce, and took such measures as he thought most likely to establish it in his dominion. Ostend, a sea-port town of the Austrian Netherlands, offered him all the advantages that could favour such a design, by the beauty and commodiousness of its harbour. The emperor therefore fixed upon it to be the center of that commerce he had proposed, and began to establish an East India company there, offering to those who became contributors, such advantages as were most likely to allure persons of a mercantile disposition. There was indeed one obstacle to the establishment of this company which the imperial council had not foreseen, or at least thought proper to take no notice of; this was, that by the treaty of Munster the inhabitants of the Netherlands, then under the dominion of the crown of Spain, were expressly excluded from all right of trading to the East Indies. This clause had been inserted at the positive instances of the Dutch, who were apprehensive, that if their neighbours were allowed to trade directly to the Indies, they would in time bring into their ports all the riches which had hitherto centered in those of Holland. The English also thought themselves equally interested to oppose such a trade; and therefore, upon the emperor's first erecting this company in 1716, both they and the Dutch made loud complaints at the court of Vienna, but without receiving any redress; and the Ostenders still continuing their trade to the East Indies under the emperor's protection and commission, the parliament taking into consideration the great detriment the English East India company had already received, and was likely farther to receive, by this Ostend company, an act was passed this session, entitled, "An act for the better securing the lawful trade of his majesty's subjects to and from the East Indies, and for the more effectual preventing all his majesty's subjects from trading thither under foreign commissions;" by which any subject subscribing, or being concerned in encouraging any subscription to promote the East India company in the Austrian Netherlands, was declared guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor†. Notwithstanding this prohibition, many merchants of England engaged in the scheme, and the company was actually established, to the great damage of the English, French, and Dutch companies.

About the same time an act passed, by which the two millions of the South-sea company which had been annihilated, were revived, added to the capital, and divided among the proprietors. A third law was made, for the more effectual execution of justice in that part of Southwark called the Mint, where a great number of debtors had taken sanctuary, on pretence of its being a privileged place. On the twenty-seventh day of May the king closed the session with a speech, in which he thanked the parliament for the repeated instances they had given of their zeal and affection for his person and government, and of their inviolable attachment to the interest and welfare of their country‡.

His majesty having been detained in England all the last year by the affair of the plot, set out for his German dominions the very instant the parliament broke up. Lords-justices were appointed to govern in his absence; but the prince, though now in his forty-first year, was still excluded from the regency; a sufficient proof that the supposed reconciliation in the royal family existed only in outward appearance. It is remarkable, that the lord Harcourt, formerly so strictly united with the earl of Ostend and queen Anne's other ministers, and who had defended them with so much zeal, was one of the lords justices. Before the king left England, he was pleased to raise the son of Mr. Robert Walpole to the peerage, an honour the father had refused. Several church-promotions were also made; and those who were in confinement on account of the plot, were either released or admitted to bail. A man of war was appointed to convoy the bishop of Rochester over to France, the place he had pitched upon for his asylum during his exile; and the royal pardon was granted to lord Bolingbroke, who owed this indulgence to the earnest solicitation of the lord Harcourt, though it was vehemently opposed at the council-board by Mr. Walpole. On the third day of June his majesty embarked for Holland, and after staying two days with his brother the bishop of Osnabrug, he arrived in perfect health at his palace of Herenhausen in Hanover, on the eleventh of the same month§.

The king was attended to Hanover by the secretaries of state, the lords Townshend and Carteret, who were esteemed able negotiators. Affairs now seemed to take a new turn on the continent. A congress had been held at Cambray, and another at Brunswick, in order to settle the interests of the several princes of Europe; but matters had been drawn out to such a tedious length, that these princes entered into separate negotiations to attain their several purposes.

§ Hist. Reg. Annals Geo. I. Tindal.

The czar and the court of Sweden were on the point of concluding a treaty that seemed to threaten the loss of Bremen and Verden, lately annexed to the electorate of Hanover: the regent of France, and Philip V. king of Spain, had adjusted all their differences, and their reconciliation was cemented by a double marriage, mademoiselle de Montpelier, second daughter to the duke of Orleans, being betrothed to the prince of Asturias, and another daughter to Don Carlos, eldest son of Philip V. by his second wife. These two princes offered new treaties to England, more advantageous than those already subsisting; but at the same time peremptorily demanded the restitution of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon; and also desired that his Britannic majesty would openly declare against the Ostend company. King George was not a little embarrassed how to act amidst such jarring interests: he was fearful that if he disgusted the emperor, he might join the czar and the court of Sweden, and promote the designs they had formed in favour of the duke of Holstein's pretensions to Sleswick, which our king had guaranteed to his Danish majesty. All Italy at this time exclaimed against the treaty of London. Memorials were sent against the proceedings of the congress of Cambray from the pope, the king of Sardinia, the dukes of Tuscany, Parma, and Modena, whose claims upon the house of Austria were now supported by France: in fine, every thing presaged a sudden and ruinous war. In this critical dilemma, king George acquitted himself in a manner that was the surprize and admiration of all Europe: by his artful and prudent negotiations, he prevented the disagreeing powers from breaking out into an open rupture: he could not indeed prevail on the court of Vienna to relax in its disputes with Spain, nor to give up the Ostend Company; but the emperor promised faithfully to observe the treaties which he had concluded. His majesty made a journey to the court of Berlin, while the two British secretaries of state who attended him had frequent conferences with the king of Prussia's ministers, in order to conclude an alliance, to prevent the designs of the czar in favour of the duke of Holstein; but this never took effect*.

While his majesty continued abroad, he received advice of the death of Philip duke of Orleans, regent of France; an event which gave the king no little concern, as a mutual esteem had long prevailed between them, owing in a great measure to their circumstances and interests being a good deal alike. His majesty, apprehensive that the death of the duke might occasion an alteration in the sentiments of the French court not altogether for his interest, determined to return as soon as possible to England; but being detained some time in Holland by contrary winds, he had, during his abode there, the satisfaction to receive the strongest assurances from France of the good disposition of that court to cultivate, and even improve, the union established by the late duke of Orleans between the two crowns.

During the king's absence, the nation lost a worthy nobleman by the death of earl Cowper, who had twice discharged the high office of lord-chancellor with equal discernment and integrity.

He was profoundly skilled in the laws of his country, was blessed with a great and penetrating apprehension, and distinguished by the clearness and precision of his judgment.

The king arrived in England on the nineteenth day of December, and on the ninth of January, 1724, his majesty opened the session of parliament with a speech, in which he recommends to the commons the care of the public debts, and expresses his satisfaction at seeing the sinking fund improved and augmented so as to put the debt of the nation into a method of being speedily and gradually discharged. We may here, not improperly, take notice of the increase of the famous sinking fund, erected by act in the parliament in the year 1717, named the Sinking Fund; which increase proceeded from the surplusses of the other three already described funds, either by paying off part of their capital or principal debt, or else by a reduction of the rate of their interest, payable by the public. The said Sinking Fund therefore, we may observe, was now encreased to six hundred and fifty-three thousand pounds, and was still more considerably augmented afterwards. And now the commons, in compliance with his majesty's intimation in his speech, proceeded to take into consideration the public debts of the kingdom, and a bill was brought in for lessening the same; by which it was provided, that the annuities of five per cent. charged on the general fund by a former act, except such as had been subscribed into the South-sea, together with the unsubscribed blanks of the lottery in the year 1714, should be paid off at Lady-day 1724, with the money arising from the Sinking Fund. The supplies next engrossed the attention of the commons, who acquitted themselves therein to the entire satisfaction of the court. They voted ten thousand seamen at four pounds per month each, and the army was continued on the same footing as last year. This latter affair, however, was not determined without occasioning great altercations, several worthy patriots opposing, with all their might, the keeping up so large a force in time of peace; yet it was carried against them, as indeed almost every other measure now was, by the venal retainers of the ministry; and it was resolved that the number of effectual men for the year 1724 (including one thousand eight hundred and fifteen invalids) should be eighteen thousand two hundred and sixty-four: the expence of the year was provided for by the land-tax and malt-tax.

There had been for some time very loud complaints made, by the trading part of the nation, of the abuse of protections granted by foreign ministers, peers, and members of parliament, under which profligate persons used to screen themselves from the prosecution of their legal creditors. It was therefore resolved by the lower house, on taking this matter into their serious consideration, that all protections granted by members of that house should be declared void, and immediately withdrawn; that none should be granted for the future; and that if any member should presume to contravene this order, he should make satisfaction to the party injured, and be liable to the censure of the house. The lords made a declaration to the same purpose, with an exception of menial servants, and those necessarily employed about the estates of peers.

No matter of importance now remaining to be discussed by the great assembly of the nation, his majesty, on the twenty-fourth of April, came to the house of peers, and, after a short speech to both houses, in which he particularly thanked the commons for the care and pains they had taken towards augmenting the Sinking Fund, and improving the public revenues, by putting them under a stricter management, the parliament was prorogued †.

A little before the close of the session, his majesty was pleased to make some alterations in the great offices, by appointing the duke of Newcastle to be secretary of state, in the room of the lord Carteret, who was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the duke of Grafton was appointed lord-chamberlain; the lord Falmouth and Mr. Edgcombe, vice-treasurers of Ireland; Mr. Yonge, a commissioner of the Treasury; and Mr. Pelham, secretary at war. Sir Robert Raymond was made a judge of the court of King's Bench, and was succeeded in his former post of attorney-general by sir Philip Yorke (afterwards earl of Hardwick, and lord-chancellor of England); and sir Clement Wearg was made solicitor general, in the room of sir Philip Yorke. About the same time, Mr. Horatio Walpole, brother to Mr. Robert Walpole, was sent to the court of France with the character of ambassador-extraordinary ‡.

I should think myself inexcusable, did I pass over unnoticed the striking proof his majesty gave at this time of his royal regard for the encouragement and promotion of learning, in his circular letter of May 16 this year, (1724) sent to the two universities; wherein, having taken notice that no provision had hitherto been made in either for the study of Modern Languages and Modern History, and of the inconveniencies arising from that defect, he says, "In order to remedy these and the like inconveniencies, we have determined to appoint two persons, of sober conversation and prudent conduct, of the degree of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Laws, or of some higher degree in one of the said universities, skilled in modern history, and in the knowledge of modern languages, to be nominated by us, to be our professors of modern history, one in the university of Cambridge, and the other for that of Oxford, who shall be obliged to read lectures in the public schools at such times as shall be appointed. And we have farther determined, That each of the said professors shall have a stipend of four hundred pounds per annum each, and out of the said stipend shall be obliged to maintain, with sufficient salaries, in the university, persons at least well qualified to teach and instruct in writing and speaking the said languages; which said teachers shall be under the direction of the professors respectively, and be obliged to instruct gratis, in the modern languages, twenty scholars in each university, to be nominated by us; and each scholar so nominated shall be obliged to learn two at least of the said languages, &c." Accordingly, Mr. Gregory of Christ-church, Oxford, and Mr. Samuel Harris, Fellow of Peter-house, Cambridge, were nominated and appointed the two first professors. For a farther encouragement to the universities, the king was pleased to order that his lord-almoner should chuse, out of the members of Oxford and Cambridge, twenty-four preachers, to officiate alternately in the chapel at Whitehall, with a salary of thirty pounds per annum each.

On the twenty-first of May this year died Robert Harley, earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer, who had been a munificent patron of genius and literature; and the month following the famous Dr. Henry Sacheverel, who had made so great a noise during the last reign, departed this life, after having bequeathed a legacy of five hundred pounds to his friend and patron Dr. Atterbury, the deprived bishop of Rochester.

As to foreign affairs, one of the most remarkable events this year, was the abdication of Philip V. of Spain, who, retiring with his queen to the monastery of St. Ildeonso, sent the marquis de Grimaldi, his principal secretary of state, to his son don Lewis, prince of Asturias, with a solemn renunciation of the crown, and a letter of advice, in which we can discern nothing remarkable, either in the style or sentiments. Amongst other instructions, he says, "Preserve ever a great devotion for the most holy Virgin, and put yourself, as well as your kingdom, under her protection, seeing you cannot by any other means better obtain what may be needful for you and for them." We conceive that this will be a sufficient specimen to our readers, of the abilities and good sense of this monarch. The renunciation was published throughout the whole Spanish monarchy, and the council resolved, that Lewis, as acknowledged prince of Spain, might assume the reins of government without assembling the cortes, or estates of the kingdom *.

This year a most bloody edict was published in France against the protestants residing in that kingdom, ordering, "that whoever performed any exercise of the reformed religion, if a man, should be sent to the gallies; if a woman, should be shaved and committed to prison; that the protestant preachers and teachers should be put to death; and all who held communication directly or indirectly with them, be condemned to the gallies. Our government interesting itself in the sufferings of their persecuted brethren, sent orders to Mr. Horace Walpole, to make pressing instances to the French court in behalf of the protestants: all the answer he could obtain, however, was, "that the king's edicts must be obeyed."

Great Britain at this period enjoyed profound tranquility. The government had triumphed over all opposition, and, notwithstanding the heavy load of taxes under which the people laboured, yet, such is the spirit and genius of the British nation for commerce, it was observed still to be constantly flourishing ¶.

* Polit. Stat. Tindal.

¶ Erasmus Philips, esq. an author of good credit, gives us an instance thereof in his pamphlet, published in the year 1726, entitled, "The state of the nation in respect to her common debts and money;" wherein he acquaints us, that from the year 1701, to the year 1723, the amount of the British customs was so considerable, that the neat money paid into the Exchequer, on an average, for the said twenty-three years, was one million four hundred forty-six thousand twenty-two pounds per annum, even exclusive of seizures; and with seizures it amounted to one million four hundred sixty-seven thousand five hundred and ninety-three pounds neat money per annum.

This year being barren of such events as deserve a place in history, we shall therefore only mention the parliament, which met on the twelfth of November, and seemed to be assembled for no other purpose than that of establishing funds for the expence of the ensuing year; though the session was distinguished by one remarkable incident, namely, the trial of the earl of Macclesfield, who, on the resignation of the earl Cowper, in 1718, had been made lord high-chancellor. There having been great complaints concerning some abuses in relation to the masters in chancery, which, though practised before, were now grown to an enormous height, the earl of Macclesfield, who had incurred the general reproach of the nation on account of his connivance at certain venal practices touching the sale of places and the money of suitors deposited in the court of Chancery, found it necessary to resign the great-seal in the beginning of January, 1725. He was afterwards impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors; and being found guilty, on trial, of the above mal-practices, he was fined thirty thousand pounds, and committed to the Tower till he should pay the sum, which he did at the end of six weeks, and was then discharged. Sir Peter King, created baron of Oakham, succeeded him in the office of chancellor; and an act was passed for the relief of the suitors in the court of Chancery.

Whilst the earl of Macclesfield's affair was under consideration, the famous act was passed "for regulating elections in the city of London, and for preserving the peace, good order, and government of the city." In this law, which is now the rule for all the elections in the city, there is a clause, by which the right of election of aldermen and common-council men belongs to freemen being householders, paying scot and lot to the amount of thirty shillings, provided they have inhabited houses of ten pounds per annum rent, twelve calendar months. This, and some other particulars, occasioned a petition of the freemen of London against the bill, while it was depending; and when passed into an act, it gave great offence to the citizens, who proceeded so riotously on the occasion, that the government thought proper to double the guards at St. James's, Leicester and Somerset-houses; and such other precautions were taken, as reduced all things to their former state of tranquillity. In this same session Henry St. John, lord viscount Bolingbroke (who, having made his peace with his majesty, was come over to England) was, upon his humble petition, after some debate, admitted to enjoy his estates, and an act passed for that purpose, though he was never restored to his title.

On the eighth of April, his majesty sent a message to the house of commons by Mr. Robert Walpole, importing, "that having been engaged in some extraordinary expences, he hoped he should be enabled to raise a sum of money by making use of the funds lately established for the payment of the civil list annuities, in order to discharge the debts contracted in the civil government." This message occasioned very warm debates in the house. Mr. William Pulteney (afterwards so very famous for his opposition to the Walpolian administration, and subsequent degeneracy), who was then cofferer of the household, and began to be dissatisfied with the measures of the ministry, moved for an address, "That an account should be laid before the house, of all moneys paid for secret service, pensions, and bounties, from the twenty-fifth of March, 1701, to the twenty-fifth of the same month in the present year." His motion was agreed to; the address was voted; and it was then moved to consider the king's message; but Mr. Pulteney urged, that this consideration should be postponed until the house should have examined the papers that were the subject of the address. "He could not (he said) without surprize hear of a debt of above five hundred thousand pounds being contracted in three years: but there was no room to wonder (he continued) at the earnestness some persons shewed to make good the deficiencies of the civil list, the revenues of which were in a manner shared between them and their friends." He concluded with expressing his desire of being informed, whether this sum of half a million was all that was due? These sarcasms were evidently aimed at Walpole, who, with unembarrassed composure (which he ever opposed to all the darts levelled at him by his opponents) took upon him to answer Mr. Pulteney's objections. The result of this debate was, that the majority passed a bill, enabling his majesty to raise a sum not exceeding one million, by exchequer bills, loans, or otherwise, on the credit of the deductions of six pence per pound, directed by an act of parliament of the seventh year of his majesty, and of the civil-list revenues, at an interest not exceeding three pounds per cent. till payment of the principal.

An act being passed for disarming the Scottish Highlanders, that for the elections of the city of London, a third for reducing the interest of several Bank annuities from five to four per cent. with some other bills of a private nature, the parliament was prorogued in May, after the king had, in a speech to both houses, thanked them, in the most cordial manner, for the repeated instances they had given of their duty and affection to him, and their zeal for the honour and interest of their country. Then, having appointed lords-justices to rule the nation in his absence, he set out, on the third of June, for his German dominions*.

Immediately after this session of parliament, the king revived the order of knights of the Bath, of which prince William (the late duke of Cumberland) was the first, and the duke of Montague was appointed grand-master. Among the knights were Mr. Robert Walpole, and his son lord Walpole. The whole number was thirty-eight, including the sovereign. Several promotions were likewise made: Mr. Methuen was appointed treasurer of the household, and the earl of Lincoln cofferer in the room of Mr. Pulteney, who resigned that place in disgust. Soon after sir Robert Walpole was honoured by his majesty with the order of the Garter.

The state of affairs on the continent had by this time undergone a considerable change. Lewis the young king of Spain, dying soon after his advancement to the throne, his father Philip resumed the sovereign rule, which he had quitted, and now resigned himself entirely to the hands of the queen, a princess of deep intrigue and unbounded ambition. Britain and France at the congress of Cambray, for compromising the differences between the emperor and the king of Spain, coming to nothing, by the Spanish court's being extremely irritated at the French king, Lewis XV. for sending back the infanta of Spain, to whom he had been espoused; and king George declining to act without France; the queen of Spain, disappointed in this quarter, proposed a private negotiation to the court of Vienna, which readily accepted the offer. The conferences were immediately opened, and conducted under the direction of the baron de Riperda, a native of Holland, who had renounced the protestant religion, and engaged in the service of his catholic majesty. The first treaty of Vienna, as it is called, was quickly concluded, and signed the thirteenth of April, 1725, and the next day a treaty of commerce was also signed.

By the treaty of peace, the emperor acknowledged Philip as king of Spain and the Indies, and promised not to molest him in the possession of those dominions that were secured to him by the treaty of Utrecht. Philip renounced all pretensions to the dominions in Italy and the Netherlands, adjudged to the emperor by the treaty of London, 1722. Charles granted the investiture of the dukedoms of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, to the eldest son of the queen of Spain, failing heirs in the present possessors, as masculine heirs of the empire. Spain guaranteed the Austrian succession, according to the pragmatic sanction, by which the dominions of that house were settled on the emperor's heirs of either sex, and declared to be a perpetual, indivisible, and inseparable fief to the primogeniture.

None of the powers of Europe had any reason to take umbrage at this treaty; but the case was very different with the treaty of commerce, which was deemed highly prejudicial to the interest of Great Britain, as the Ostend company, which the emperor had established, was to be supported by it; and the restitution of Gibraltar and Port Mahon to the Spaniards seemed to be the consequence thereof; and it was even said, that there were secret articles in favour of the pretender. However that might be, all Europe was astonished to see Philip V. and Charles VI. formerly irreconcilable enemies, now united in the strongest bonds of friendship; and affairs deviated from their natural course to such a degree, that the ministry of Madrid governed the court of Vienna for a whole year.

By the treaty concluded at Vienna, already related, we have seen, that the imperial court, whose intention had constantly been to exclude the French branch which reigned over Spain, from all access to Italy, so far lost sight of its first views, as to admit a son of Philip V. (duke of Anjou) and Elizabeth of Parma, his second wife, into that very country, from which they formerly laboured to exclude every Frenchman and every Spaniard. Though the succession of Parma and the grand-duchy of Tuscany was not made public, don Carlos was introduced with six thousand Spaniards, and it cost Spain only twenty thousand pistoles, which were paid at Vienna. The imperial forces were now augmented to a considerable number, and other powers were solicited to engage in this alliance, to which the czar actually acceded*.

This imprudent step of the emperor's council was by no means one of those, which, in some instances, are productive of happy consequences: it cost Charles very dear in the sequel. In the mean time the king of Great Britain took the alarm, and, in order to counteract the designs of these new allies, he projected a defensive treaty between England, France, and Prussia, known by the name of the treaty of Hanover. This alliance, limited to the term of fifteen years, was signed at Hanover, while his majesty was there, on the third of September, 1725. It contained a mutual guaranty of the dominions possessed by the contracting parties, their rights and privileges, those of commerce in particular, with an agreement to procure satisfaction to the protestants of Thorn, in Poland, who had been oppressed by the papists, contrary to the treaty of Oliva. Nothing can be more clear, than that the apprehension of the emperor's making some attempts upon king George's German dominions, had been the principal motive for concluding the treaty of Hanover; though, in order to make it go down with the English at home, and secure the approbation of the British parliament, the ministry represented it as an engagement that had been contracted purely for the advantage and glory of England.

His majesty having taken these necessary precautions at Hanover, set out on his return to England in the middle of December, and came to Helvoetsluys, where sir John Norris waited with the convoy and yachts, and where his majesty embarked in the Carolina yacht on New-year's day, about one in the afternoon. Towards seven that evening there arose a most violent tempest, which continued so high, and the sea so boisterous for thirty-six hours, that the whole fleet was in the utmost danger; at length, however, his majesty with great difficulty landed at Rye, on the fourth day, from whence he proceeded by land to London.

In the course of this year was erected Guy's hospital, at the sole expence of Thomas Guy, formerly a bookseller in London, afterwards member of parliament for Tamworth, who left a benefaction of two hundred thousand pounds for the support of that charitable establishment.

The duke of Wharton having ruined his fortune by riot and debauchery, repaired this year to the court of Vienna, from whence he proceeded to Rome, and offered his service to the pretender, where he received the order of the Garter, and the title of duke of Northumberland. He was sent by the pretender, with credentials, to the court of Madrid, where king George was no sooner informed of his arrival, than he dispatched a messenger with a letter under the privy-seal, commanding him, upon his allegiance, to return immediately to England. This letter being delivered to him, as he rode through the streets in a coach, he loudly exclaimed against the insolence of a British officer of justice in executing a summons upon him within sight of his Catholic majesty's palace; he even threatened to present a memorial on the subject to the court of Spain, and demand justice against the English messenger; but Philip, being privately acquainted with the matter, absolutely refused to interpose his authority. The duke afterwards abjured the Protestant religion, married a lady of the queen of Spain's bed-chamber, and obtained the rank and appointments of a lieutenant-colonel in the Spanish service*.

On the twentieth of January, 1726, the parliament met, when his majesty, in his speech, gave them to understand, "That the distressed condition of some of their protestant brethren abroad, and the negociations and engagements contracted by some foreign powers, which seem to have laid the foundation of new troubles and disturbances in Europe, and to threaten his subjects with the loss of several of the most advantageous branches of their trade, had obliged him to concert with other powers such measures as might give a check to the ambitious views of those who were endeavouring to render themselves formidable, and put a stop to the farther progress of such dangerous designs. He told them, that the enemies to his government were already very busy by their instruments and emissaries in those courts, whose measures seemed most to favour their purposes, in soliciting and promoting the cause of the pretender; but he persuaded himself, notwithstanding the countenance and encouragement they might either have received, or expected to receive, that the provision made by his parliament for the safety and defence of his kingdoms, would effectually secure them from all danger of foreign invasion, or domestic insurrection: that, when the world should see, that they would not suffer the British crown and nation to be insulted with impunity, those, who most envied the tranquility and happiness of this kingdom, and were endeavouring to make it subservient to their ambitious projects, would have some regard to their own interest and circumstances, before they presumed to make any attempt upon so brave a people, strengthened and supported by powerful alliances, and, however desirous of peace, able and ready to defend themselves against all aggressors: that such resolutions, and such measures, if timely taken, would, he was satisfied, be the most effectual means of preventing a war, and preserving to his people the blessings of peace and prosperity†".

Addresses suitable to this speech were presented by both houses; and the commons proceeded to consider of the supply, when, in spite of all the opposition made by Pulteney, who now began to set himself up to thwart every measure of the court, the same number of land-forces, and the same provision for them, were voted. Mr. Pulteney then endeavoured to get a committee appointed for taking the state of the public debts; but in this he was likewise baffled, most of the Tories then in the house being against it.

The treaties of Hanover and Vienna being laid before the commons, they were debated in a very full house, no less than four hundred and twenty members being present. The debate was opened by Mr. Horace Walpole, ambassador at the court of France, who, in a long and studied speech, entered into a detail of the affairs of Europe since the treaty of Utrecht. He recapitulated the substance of the barrier-treaty; the defensive alliance with the emperor; another with the most Christian king and the States-general; a subsequent convention; the quadruple alliance; the congress of Cambray; the treaty of Vienna, and that of Hanover: he explained the motive of each agreement. The treaty of commerce between the emperor and Spain had been entered into, he said, chiefly with a design to countenance and support the East India company established at Ostend, which interfered so essentially with the East India companies of England and Holland, and was directly contrary to several solemn treaties in force. He expatiated on the dangers to which the ballance of power would be exposed, should the issue male of the projected marriage between the emperor's eldest daughter and don Carlos, the infant of Spain, ever possess the imperial dignity and the kingdom of Spain together. He finished with saying, "That it had been in order to prevent the farther progress and final execution of these dangerous and destructive designs, that the king had concluded the treaty of Hanover, the nature of which had been already laid before them; and that from a candid comparison of all circumstances, he believed he might safely infer, that his majesty had discovered the most consummate wisdom in all the measures he had taken." One cannot without some degree of indignation reflect, that this very man, who now expressed such apprehension at the prospect of the power of the house of Austria and Spain being immediately united in one person, had been the most violent in exclaiming against that article of the treaty of Utrecht, which prevented the union of those two crowns. For this and other instances of versatility, this gentleman became afterwards to be ludicrously termed the Balance Master.

This speech, however, occasioned a great debate: it was alleged by the members in the opposition, that the treaty of Hanover would engage the British nation in a war for the defence of the king's German dominions, contrary to an express provision in the act of limitation. To this it was replied by the other side, that the true meaning and intent of that limitation, was not wholly and forever to deprive his majesty's foreign dominions of any assistance from this nation, but only to restrain the sovereign for the future from engaging the nation in a war for the defence of any dominions not belonging to the crown of Great Britain, without the consent of parliament. Mr. Pelham said, that, for his own part, he was of opinion, that if, in the present juncture of affairs, his majesty's foreign dominions should be attacked or insulted, this nation ought to stand by and support his majesty against all his enemies; he therefore moved for an address to his majesty, approving the alliance he had concluded at Hanover, in order to obviate and disappoint the dangerous views and consequences of the treaty of peace between the emperor and the king of Spain, and promising to support his majesty against all insults and attacks that should be made upon any of his territories, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain‡.

In vain did Mr. Shippen, and others of the Tory members, exhaust all their eloquence to impress on the minds of the assembly a sense of the dangerous consequences to this kingdom that must attend our having a connexion with the concerns of the continent; the opposition was so considerable, that the address was voted by a majority of two hundred and eighty-five against one hundred and seven, and was presented on the nineteenth of February, to which his majesty returned the following answer :

“ Gentlemen,

“ I return you my thanks for this particular mark of your duty, affection, and confidence in me: your assurances, not to suffer my foreign dominions to be exposed or insulted, on account of the measures I have taken for the interest of these kingdoms, will, I hope, be a means to preserve the tranquility of Europe. I have no views of ambition to gratify; I have no thought of aggrandizing myself, or extending any part of my dominions at the expence of the other; and as my honour is the common cause and concern of my subjects, their particular interest shall, upon all occasions, be my constant care.”

There was a pretty warm debate in the house of lords about the treaty of Hanover, but as the court party was all-powerful, they carried an address, to much the same purport as that of the commons, which was presented at the same time, and received the like answer from the throne*.

The extension of the malt-tax to Scotland was productive of great disturbances in that kingdom, the people absolutely refusing to pay it. At Glasgow, in particular, the populace rose, and in a riotous manner broke into and rifled the house of Mr. Daniel Campbell, their representative in parliament, who had voted for the bill, and maltreated some excisemen who had attempted to visit the houses of the maltsters. Upon this the commissioners had recourse to general Wade, commander in chief of the British forces in Scotland, who ordered captain Bushel, with two companies of foot, to march to Glasgow, in order to appease this disturbance. The captain obeyed his orders; but the rabble assembling in a prodigious multitude, and arming themselves with such offensive weapons as they could pick up, attacked this small detachment with the utmost fury. The captain, conscious of his own inability to resist such a numerous and enraged multitude, thought proper to retreat to Dunbarton, where he got in safety, though pursued by the mob to the distance of six miles.

No sooner was general Wade informed of this transaction, than, assembling a good body of forces, and being accompanied by Duncan Forbes, lord-advocate, he marched into and took possession of Glasgow, when, being informed that the magistrates had been most shamefully remiss in their duty, on occasion of the late riot, he thought proper to have them apprehended and conveyed prisoners to Edinburgh castle: they were, however, soon released from their confinement by the lords justiciaries, who having taken cognizance of the affair, declared them innocent. Some of the rabble however, were punished for the riot, and four of them sentenced to be scourged and transported ||.

This disturbance had happened towards the close of the last summer; and Mr. Daniel Campbell having petitioned the house of commons this session, that he might be indemnified for the damage he had sustained from the mob, a bill passed in his favour, granting him a certain sum, to be raised by an imposition of two pennies Scots upon all beer and ale brewed within the city of Glasgow.

A bill was also brought in, empowering the commissioners of the Treasury to compound with Mr. Richard Hampden, late treasurer of the navy, for a debt he owed to the crown, amounting to forty-eight thousand pounds. This deficiency was occasioned by his engaging in the South sea scheme. The king recommended his petition; and the house complied with his request, in consideration of his great-grandfather, the famous John Hampden, who made such a noble stand against the arbitrary imposition of ship money in the commencement of the civil war §.

On the twenty-fourth day of March the king sent a message to the house by sir Paul Methuen, desiring the assistance of his parliament, by an extraordinary supply, to enable him to increase his naval force, and to take such other measures as should be found necessary in the present critical conjuncture of affairs. This message occasioned a debate of six hours, but it was at last resolved, by a very great majority, to comply with his majesty's demand †: but as this demand had not been communicated to the lords, though the king mentioned “ the assistance of the parliament,” it gave great umbrage to many of the peers.

The earl of Strafford in particular insisted that the message was unprecedented, and struck at the ancient privileges of the peers, who are the great standing council of the sovereign, the hereditary guardians of the liberties and properties of the people, and, next to their sovereign, the principal part of the legislature; therefore ought to be consulted in all matters of public concern. His lordship therefore moved that an address should be presented to his majesty, to know who advised him to send such a message to the commons, without at the same time communicating it to the peers.

Lord Bathurst also observed, that the appellation of parliament being given to the commons exclusively of the lords, was certainly a new and unprecedented stile, and very different from the language of former times. If the lords, he said, suffered themselves to be overlooked and neglected in this instance, they might come at last to be voted useless, as had formerly been the case; and therefore, lest any consequence of this kind should ensue, he was for the address. These efforts of the opposite party, however, were very little regarded by the ministry: the affair was dropt; and the supplies ordinary and extraordinary being granted, with every thing else which the court thought proper to ask, his majesty dismissed the parliament on the twenty-fourth of May 1726 ‡.

I shall now take a short view of the state of affairs abroad.

As soon as the courts of Vienna and Madrid apprehended that their views were crossed, and the ends proposed by their conjunction utterly disappointed, by the counter-alliance at Hanover, they immediately resolved to have recourse to ulterior negotiations, in order to increase the number of their allies; and when they should find themselves sufficiently powerful, to resort to open force. To render this scheme more effectual, the emperor began to execute projects in the North, in which he met at first with some extraordinary success. Peter the Great, czar of Muscovy, was now dead †, and his empress Catherine had succeeded him on the throne. This princess had conceived a distaste to the British court, and had, by some Scottish people about her, been drawn to believe it might prove no difficult matter to set up the son of the late king James II. and so overturn the government in Britain. The same scheme had been proposed and countenanced at the imperial court by some of the ministers. The Spanish court readily adopted that or any other expedient which might procure them Gibraltar, and facilitate their acquisitions in Italy, then, and still, the great objects of their policy. Thus the Hanover alliance, originally contrived for the securing that electorate, proved the means of bringing it into some degree of danger. It has generally been said, and I believe with truth, that the secretary of state, then abroad with his majesty, was the sole, or at least the principal, adviser in that affair, which gave a new turn to our politics, and engaged us in a scheme for humbling the house of Austria, which we had so long, and even so lately, supported.

However this might be, the English ministry, who had now all things in their own power, and were at full liberty to act as they thought fit, resolved to support the Hanoverian alliance; and therefore, as soon as they were informed of the schemes planning by the allies of Vienna, they exerted their utmost efforts to disappoint them; and, without trusting to their good allies the French, or to their slow assistance, they chose the shortest and most expeditious method possible of asserting themselves. With this view it was resolved to send a strong fleet into the Baltic, to awe the czarina, to bring round Denmark, and to keep steady Sweden. It was likewise thought requisite to have another strong squadron on the coast of Spain, to intimidate his Catholic majesty, and render any efforts he might make for the recovery of Gibraltar ineffectual: and, to sum up all, as they very well knew that money was not only the sinews of war, but the great bond of friendship among princes, they determined to send a considerable force to the Indies, in order to block up the galleons, as the shortest means of dissolving the union between their Imperial and Catholic majesties; being satisfied, if the former could not receive his subsidies, the latter could never rely on his assistance §. Such were the plans on both sides at this critical juncture. We come now to see how these were carried into execution.

The command of the fleet intended for the Baltic was given to sir Charles Wager, vice-admiral of the red, who had under him sir George Walton, rear-admiral of the blue. The squadron they were to command consisted of twenty ships of the line, one frigate, and two fire-ships. Sir Charles having received his final instructions, set sail from the Nore on the seventeenth of April, and on the twenty-third of the same month the fleet came to an anchor in the road of Copenhagen. The next day sir Charles presented to the king of Denmark a letter, with which he was charged by king George; and soon after quitting Copenhagen, he anchored with his fleet near Stockholm. Having had an audience of his Swedish majesty, by whom he was most graciously received, he sailed with his squadron to the island of Narginan, within a few leagues of Revel. About the same time a squadron of Dutch men of war sailed from Copenhagen for the island of Bornholm, in order to join the British squadron.

Sir Charles Wager took the first opportunity of sending a letter he had been charged with to the czarina, inclosed to her admiral Apraxin, who was then lying in the road of Cronstot with sixteen Russian men of war, besides a great number of galleys. Our king, in his letter to the czarina, expostulated very freely with her majesty on the subject of the armaments by sea and land which she had been for some time preparing, as also on the intrigues which her ministers had lately entered into with the agents of the pretender. The Russian court was not a little nettled at this appearance of a British fleet upon their coasts, and was inclined to have come to extremities rather than endure it: but maturer reflection convincing them that the Russian fleet was in no condition to venture an engagement with that of Great Britain, it was resolved in council to order the ships and galleys to be laid up; and the empress wrote a letter to king George, by way of answer to that which she had received from him. In this letter she expressed her surprize that she had not received his majesty's letter until his fleet was at anchor in one of her ports, since it would have been more agreeable to the custom established among sovereigns, and to the amity which had so long subsisted between her kingdoms and the crown of Great Britain, to expostulate with her on her armaments, and expect her answers, before he had proceeded to such an offensive measure. She assured him that nothing was farther from her thoughts than any design to trouble the peace of the North; and with regard to the pretender, it was, she said, a frivolous and stale accusation, which had been frequently used as a pretext to cover all the unkind steps taken against the Russian empire.

This letter was dated the fifteenth of June, 1726; and our fleet being soon after joined by the Danish squadron, they both remained before Revel till the twenty-eighth of September, when admiral Wager, having received certain intelligence that the Russians would not be able to attempt any thing that year, sailed for Copenhagen, and from thence home, arriving safely at the Nore on the first of November ¶.

The fleet that was sent to the coast of Spain was commanded by sir John Jennings, and consisted of nine large ships of war, which were afterwards joined in the Mediterranean by several ships that were cruising there. The admiral sailed on the twentieth of July from St. Helen's with a good body of land-forces on board, and on the third of August entered the bay of St. Antonio; then he visited Lisbon, from whence he directed his course to the bay of Bulls, near Cadiz, and cruized off Cape St. Mary's, so as to alarm the coast of Spain, and fill Madrid with consternation.

¶ Hist. Reg. Annal. Tindal.

It would be tedious, and little interesting, was I to enter into a minute detail of the motions of this squadron, which returned to Spithead soon after. It is sufficient to observe, that it answered perfectly the ends proposed by it, by alarming the court of Spain to such a degree as to make them disavow the engagements they had entered into with the court of Vienna, to the prejudice of Great Britain, and abandon the designs they had formed in favour of the pretender, at the instigation of the dukes of Ormond and Wharton, and the earl Marischal, who were then at Madrid. Philip even dismissed from his service the duke de Ripperda, who had been lately prime minister, and was the person who had negotiated the treaty of Vienna, and by whose intrigues the Spanish court and ours had been embroiled. The duke dreading the resentment of his enemies, took shelter, at the time of his disgrace, in the house of colonel Stanhope, (afterwards earl of Harrington) then our ambassador at Madrid; and though he was taken from thence by force, yet the terror of a British squadron upon the coast prevailed on the Spanish court to lay aside all thoughts of proceeding against him capitally, which they before intended, for having betrayed to the British ministry those very designs which had occasioned the sending of this fleet; and he soon after made his escape from the castle of Segovia, and took refuge in England*. Such were the events that attended the expedition of sir John Jennings on the coast of Spain. Let us proceed to the transactions in the West Indies.

The command of the squadron destined for this service was conferred upon rear-admiral Hosier, an excellent officer. He sailed from Plymouth on the ninth of April; and though he had a very quick passage, yet the Spaniards had previous notice of his design, by an advice-boat from Cadiz; so that before he reached the Bastimentos, the treasure which had been on board the galleons, amounting to about six millions and an half sterling, and which he had been sent to intercept, or at least to prevent their sailing for Europe, was unladen and carried back to Panama, on the other side the Isthmus. However, the admiral, who arrived at Porto-Bello in the beginning of June, continued there six months, till his squadron, which had been the terror, became the jest of the Spaniards. A little before Christmas he weighed, and sailed for Jamaica, after having lost the greatest part of his men†.

In the mean time our court complained loudly of the violation of the law of nations, in taking by force, out of the house of the British ambassador, the duke de Ripperda, who had fled for shelter thither. This act the Spanish ministers attempted to excuse. Memorials and letters passed between the two courts, and every thing seemed to portend an immediate rupture. The king of Spain purchased ships of war, began to make preparations for some important undertaking, and assembled an army of twenty thousand men at St. Roch, on pretence of rebuilding the castle of Old Gibraltar, which is on the opposite side of the bay to the garrison of that name in our possession. In the month of August this year the States-general acceded to the treaty of Hanover; but the king of Prussia, though his majesty's son-in-law, suffered himself to be detached from the alliance by the emperor, who promised to support his pretensions to the duchies of Bergues and Juliers‡.

Such was the situation of affairs abroad, when the parliament of Great Britain met on the seventeenth day of January, 1727. The king opened the session with a long energetic speech, highly reflecting upon the princes of whom mention was made. He observed, that the proceedings and transactions of the emperor and the king of Spain, and the secret offensive alliances concluded between them, had laid the foundations of a most exorbitant and formidable power: that they were directly levelled against the most valuable and darling interests and privileges of the English nation, which must either give up Gibraltar to Spain, and acquiesce in the emperor's usurped exercise of commerce, or resolve vigorously to defend their undoubted rights against those reciprocal engagements, contracted in defiance and violation of all national faith, and the most solemn treaties. He assured them that one of these secret articles was the placing the pretender on the throne of Great Britain; and another, the reduction of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon. These fatal combinations, he said, were not confined to those parts of the world alone, but had also extended themselves to Russia; and that nothing but the timely appearance of the English fleet had prevented the execution of such designs as would have opened a way to the invasion of these kingdoms. He exhorted the commons to grant such supplies as should be necessary for the defence of their country, and for enabling him to make good his engagements with his allies, after acquainting them that the king of Spain had ordered his minister residing in England to quit the kingdom, and that he had left a memorial little short of a declaration, in which he insisted upon the restitution of Gibraltar. Then addressing himself to both houses, he concluded his speech thus: "If preserving a due balance of power in Europe; if defending the possessions of the crown of Great Britain, of infinite advantage to her trade and commerce, against dangerous and unlawful encroachments; and if the present establishment, the religion, liberties, and properties of a protestant people, are any longer worthy the care and attention of a British parliament, I need say no more to incite my loyal and faithful houses of parliament to exert themselves in defence of all that is dear and valuable to them."

The most warm and affectionate addresses flowed in from both houses in return to this speech, so well calculated to touch the strings which moved their passions: they expressed the highest resentment at the insolent designs of his majesty's enemies, and the most entire approbation of the measures he had taken, in order to defeat and disappoint them. The commons voted twenty thousand seamen, and twenty-six thousand three hundred and eighty-three men for the land-service; and to defray the expence of these armaments, a tax of four shillings in the pound was granted§.

§ Proceedings of the House of Commons. Tindal.

The most interesting debates during this session were agitated in the house of lords, and arose from that house calling for and examining the letters and memorials between the ministers of Great Britain, France, and Spain, and the papers relating to the treaty of Hanover. When these papers were perused by the house, the lord Bathurst observed, that the States-general had acted with remarkable caution and circumspection in this whole affair; that they had not fully and entirely acceded to the treaty of Hanover, since they had formally and expressly excused themselves from the general guaranty of the treaties of Westphalia and Oliva, in which they said they were never engaged; that in effect the Dutch having engaged themselves to nothing, what they had done did not deserve the name of accession; and the rather because they had made it an express condition, that their act of accession should be approved and ratified by the king of Great Britain, the Most Christian king, and the king of Prussia; that though this last potentate was one of the principal contractors in the treaty of Hanover, yet as no mention had been made of him, he could not tell what to say to that particular. This however was certain, that the minister of his Prussian majesty had refused to sign the act of accession, which was therefore of no effect; and if the court of France should for the same reason think itself disengaged from the Hanover alliance, Britain alone would be obliged to bear the burthen of an expensive war against two of the greatest potentates of Europe. He declared he could not see any just cause for a rupture with Spain: at all events, methods of accommodation ought to be tried for adjusting the differences between the two crowns before the kingdom was plunged into a war, which must be attended with dangerous consequences: he therefore desired their lordships to consider the matter before them, which was of the last importance to the whole nation, since, he said, nothing could be gained by the war, should it succeed even to the best of their wishes; and if it proved unprosperous, every thing would be lost.

Lord Townshend replied to this speech. He affirmed that his majesty had received positive and certain information with respect to the secret articles of alliance between the courts of Vienna and Madrid, in favour of the pretender; but that the safety of the state would not permit him to lay these advices before the parliament. His lordship also affirmed, that his majesty never had made any promise to restore Gibraltar, although the marquis de Puzzo Bueno had, in a memorial he had left behind him, made mention of such a promise, and that it had been a good deal commented upon by the noble lord who spoke last. He then recapitulated the several steps the Imperial and Spanish courts had taken in prejudice to his majesty and this kingdom; and concluded with saying, that from all these circumstances he hoped it would evidently appear, that his majesty was under an absolute necessity of adopting the vigorous resolutions which he had already embraced.

After these and several other speeches, their lordships resolved, that the measures which his majesty had thought fit to take, were honourable, just, and necessary, for preventing the execution of the dangerous engagements entered into in favour of the pretender; for preserving the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain by solemn treaties, particularly of Gibraltar and the island of Minorca; and for maintaining to his people their most valuable rights and privileges of commerce, and the peace and tranquillity of Europe. Several lords entered a protest against this resolution*.

The opposition in the lower house consisted chiefly in making motions for addresses on several subjects; in particular, one for desiring the engagements which his majesty was said to have entered into with Spain, concerning the restitution of Gibraltar, might be laid before the house; for although lord Townshend had affirmed in the house of peers that no such promise had been made, sir Robert Walpole, it seems, owned such a promise in the house of commons, though he qualified it by saying, that he was sure that promise was upon certain conditions, which not having been performed within the limited time, it was thereby become invalid: he however strongly opposed the address moved for, as the communication desired was, he said, altogether impracticable and unprecedented, the private letters of princes being as sacred as their persons. After a debate, the motion was rejected. After this the lord Morpeth moved "for an address for copies of all such memorials or representations to his majesty, from the crowns of Sweden and Denmark, as did induce him to send the squadron last year into the Baltic." This motion was opposed by Mr. Horace Walpole, and it was finally rejected. In the account of the money granted for the service of the last year, there was an article of one hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds charged in general terms, as issued out for other engagements and expences, over and above such as were specified. Mr. William Pulteney moved for an address on this subject, but the motion was rejected without a division; and the majority concurred in an address to his majesty, much to the same purport with that of the lords, with the promise of supporting his majesty in all such further measures as he should find necessary and expedient for preventing a rupture, and for the honour and advancement of these kingdoms†.

If the king's speech gave rise to some disputes at home, it excited the highest degree of indignation and resentment in the breasts of those powers who were reflected upon in it. The court of Vienna in particular was so exasperated at the manner in which it found itself there treated, that the emperor commanded M. Palms, his resident at London, to present a memorial to his Britannic majesty, expressed in the boldest terms. The king was therein charged with having declared from the throne, as certain and undoubted facts, several things, some of which were wrested to a wrong sense; some entirely distant from the intentions of his Catholic majesty; and lastly (which, adds the memorialist, affect much more sensibly than all the rest) some things absolutely void of all foundation. The memorialist then proceeds to affirm that the treaty of Vienna was built on the quadruple alliance, and therefore could not with any reason give umbrage to the king or people of Great Britain: that the treaty of commerce was calculated to promote the mutual and lawful advantages of both parties, agreeable to the laws of nations, and in no respect prejudicial to Great Britain. He insists that there was no alliance concluded between the two crowns; and that the supposed secret article in favour of the pretender was a downright falshood. He said, the hostilities committed in the West Indies, and elsewhere, against the king of Spain, in violation of treaties, seemed to furnish a very just pretence for that prince's undertaking the siege of Gibraltar; but, with regard to the insinuation, as if his master (the emperor) had agreed to assist his Catholic majesty in the reduction of that place, it was absolutely without the least foundation, the emperor having made no other engagements with the king of Spain than what were specified in the treaty communicated to the king of Great Britain. The memorialist concludes as follows: "Which things being thus, the injury offered to truth, the honour and dignity of his Sacred, Imperial, and Catholic majesty, require that they should be exposed to your majesty, to the kingdom of Great Britain, and to the whole world; and his Sacred Imperial majesty demands that reparation which is due to him by all manner of right, for the great injuries which have been done by those many imputations."

The emperor, not thinking it enough that his minister should present this bold memorial to the king, ordered him to publish it to the whole nation, as an appeal to the people against their sovereign. Our court, which might naturally be expected, were highly incensed at this last step: the two houses of parliament, then sitting, joined in an address, expressing their indignation at the affront offered to his majesty by the memorial of M. Palms, and at his insolence of dispersing the same throughout the kingdom. "The endeavouring," said they in their address, "to instil into the minds of any of your majesty's faithful subjects, the least distrust or diffidence of your majesty's most sacred royal word, or to make a distinction between your majesty and your people, is an attempt as vain, as it is presumptuous. If time has not effaced the memory of the glorious exploits confessed to have been performed by Britons in support of the emperor, gratitude, esteem, and affection for this nation, will be best manifested by doing honour to the king, whom the people honour, and justice to the people whose rights and privileges the best of kings is now defending against the invasions and incroachments that have been made upon them."

M. Palms was immediately ordered to depart the kingdom: the most bitter remonstrances were presented by the ministers of the emperor and the king of Great Britain to the diet of the empire at Ratisbon; and the resentment of the two potentates was such as seemed to exclude all hopes of a reconciliation.

Apprehensive that he had now raised a storm which might burst big with ruin upon his hereditary dominions, George sought to strengthen himself, by contracting more strict engagements with his good ally Lewis XV. and the king of Sweden, to the latter of whom he agreed to pay fifty thousand pounds per annum, on condition of his holding in readiness a body of ten thousand troops for the occasions of the alliance. He also concluded a fresh treaty with the king of Denmark, who engaged to furnish a certain number of auxiliaries, on account of a large subsidy granted by the king of France. On the other hand, his Britannic majesty engaged for twenty-four thousand men, and a strong squadron to be sent to the Baltic. He made a convention with the prince of Hesse-Cassel, who undertook to provide eight thousand foot and four thousand horse, in consideration of seventy-four thousand pounds to be paid by Great Britain immediately, and fifty thousand pounds more in case the troops should be required, besides their pay and subsistence.

All these treaties could not be concluded without bringing a heavy charge upon England; but the attachment the people were known to have for their religion, rights, and liberties, so happily secured to them by the accession of the illustrious house of Hanover, was a pleasing earnest of their ready concurrence in furnishing the supplies necessary to support these mercenaries, who were to defend the new countries to which this kingdom was now wedded. Accordingly, Mr. Scroope, secretary of the Treasury, moved in the house of commons, by the direction of the ministry, that in the malt-tax bill they should insert a clause of appropriation, empowering the king to apply such sums as should be necessary for defraying the expences and engagements which had been or should be made before the twenty-fifth of December following, in concerting such measures as he should think most conducive to the security of trade and navigation, and restoring the peace of Europe.

This motion gave birth to a violent debate. It was alleged on the one hand, that his majesty was so unwilling to put his subjects to any extraordinary expence, that he had asked no more supplies in this session than what he judged necessary for the service of the year; but in the present posture of affairs, some unforeseen accidents might require a further expence, for which no estimate could now be made; because some treaties which his majesty had thought fit to conclude were not fully completed; that therefore the house ought to enable his majesty to answer such contingencies; that they had frequently reposed in him such a confidence, which he had never abused; and that what was now demanded was limited to a very short time.

To this, those on the opposite side of the question answered, that it was altogether unparliamentary to ask or to grant supplies without the proper estimates being first made out and laid before the house; and that as to the clause now proposed, it was inconsistent with that part of the bill which forbade the issuing the supplies to any other purposes than those specified; and precluded that appropriation of the public money, which every parliament had so cautiously guarded against, in order to prevent misapplication, which they said was, in this case, the more to be feared, as the legislature had made no provision for bringing to account any person in regard to the disposal of the money granted by this clause. It was urged that the parliament had already granted very great sums, such as were amply sufficient, so far as appeared to them at present, to answer all contingencies; and if any unexpected emergency should supervene which might call for an extra supply, that house, upon such a case being laid before them, could be at no loss to provide for it in the usual manner, without leaving any thing to the arbitrary disposition of a ministry, which seemed to consult their own ends rather than the true interests of the nation: that this parliament had already given so many instances of their zeal and affection for his majesty, that they had left no room to doubt of their readiness to make good whatever he should expend in concerting such measures as he should think most conducive to the interest and advantage of his people; but that they could not answer to that duty they owed their constituents, to grant such an unlimited and absolute power as this clause conferred, but in cases of absolute necessity, when the very being of the state was in danger. Powerful as these objections were, the majority over-ruled them; the motion was carried; and the bill being sent up to the lords, made its way thro' that house likewise, though not without a vigorous opposition.

Two days after sir William Yonge moved, that towards the supply granted to the king, the sum of thirty-seven thousand pounds should be raised by loans on Exchequer-bills, to be charged on the surplus of the duties on coal and culm, which was reserved for the disposition of parliament. This motion was strenuously opposed by Mr. Pulteney and sir Joseph Jekyll, who represented, that by several acts and votes of parliament, all the exceedings or surplusses of public funds were to be applied towards discharging the public debts, or increasing the Sinking Fund. This disposition, they alleged, could not be altered without injuring public credit, which was already extremely low, since the taking off any part of the mortgage could not but weaken the security of the debt. It was somewhat strange, it was said, that such a motion should come from the ministry, of all other persons, since it was hardly possible they could have forgotten what his majesty had so strongly recommended from the throne at the opening of the session; namely, that the produce of the Sinking Fund might be immediately applied to the uses for which it was so wisely contrived, and to which it stood at present appropriated; and, finally, that this motion was still more surprising, after the large and unlimited power which the parliament had lately conferred upon his majesty. These objections were answered in the usual way by the ministry, namely, by insisting upon the question; which being put, the majority were for the motion, and it passed*.

The parliament having now dispatched all the business before them, his majesty put an end to the session on the fifteenth day of May, 1727, with this his last speech to both houses:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

and the peace and liberties of Europe. I am now to return you my thanks for the zeal and dispatch with which you have proceeded upon the several points I then recommended to your care; for the confidence you have reposed in me; and for the assurances you have given me of your support and assistance, in vindication of my honour, and in the maintenance and defence of the undoubted rights and privileges of this nation, so openly and notoriously invaded and attacked.

“ The siege of Gibraltar proves, beyond all dispute, the end and design of the engagements entered into by the emperor and the king of Spain; but the preparations I had made for the defence of that place, and the bravery of my troops, will, I doubt not, convince them of the rashness and folly of that undertaking. However, the love of peace has hitherto prevailed upon me, even under this high provocation, to suspend in some measure my resentments; and, instead of having immediate recourse to arms, and demanding of my allies that assistance which they are engaged and ready to give me, I have concurred with the most Christian king and the States-general in making such overtures of accommodation as must convince all the world of the uprightness of our intentions, and of our sincere disposition to peace, and demonstrate to whose ambition and thirst of power the calamities of a war are to be imputed, if these just and reasonable propositions are rejected. In the mean time, I have the pleasure to acquaint you, that the crown of Sweden has acceded to the treaty of Hanover; and the convention between me, his most Christian majesty, and the king of Denmark, is actually signed.

“ Gentlemen of the house of commons,

“ The vigour and chearfulness you have shewn in raising so effectually, and upon such easy terms, the necessary supplies for the service of the current year, are not only instances of your zeal and affection to me, but demonstrate the established credit, power, and strength of this kingdom.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ It would have been a great satisfaction to me, if, before your separation, I had been able to speak to you more positively, and with greater certainty, upon the present posture of affairs. But, as you have now dispatched the public business, and as the season of the year requires your going into your respective counties, I chuse rather to put an end to the session, than to keep you any longer together unnecessarily. The provisions you have made, and the perfect union and harmony between me and my allies, will, I hope, enable me, by the Divine assistance, either to withstand and defeat the designs of our enemies, if their conduct should bring upon us the necessity of a war; or to improve the blessings of peace, if peace can, with any justice, honour, and security, be obtained.”

We may perceive from this speech, that notwithstanding the preparations for war, made as well on the side of the Hanover allies as those of Vienna, that the contending powers were respectively desirous of peace; and that some overtures had actually been made towards a mutual accommodation, each of them having declared that the preservation of the tranquility of Europe was the sole end of their proceedings.

The Spaniard, in order to show that he was not intimidated by the mighty naval armaments of the English, proceeded in the scheme he had formed of attacking the important fortress of Gibraltar; and on the 11th of February, 1727, the trenches were actually opened before that place by the Conde de las Torres, captain-general of his Catholic majesty's forces in Andalusia, at the head of twenty thousand men, well provided with all sorts of artillery and warlike ammunition proportioned to the strength of the place, from which the Spaniards expected a stout resistance. Our ministry at home having had previous intelligence of this design, had ordered a squadron to be got ready at Portsmouth; the command of which was given to sir Charles Wager. The earl of Portmore, governor of Gibraltar, notwithstanding his advanced age, having been a colonel near forty years, resolved to repair in person to his government, and embarked on board this fleet; which sailing in the month of March, arrived at Gibraltar in the beginning of April, when the troops which had been sent over from England were landed, with a great quantity of ammunition, warlike stores, and twenty-four pieces of cannon. At the same time five hundred men arrived from Minorca; so that the garrison now amounted to six thousand effective men, who being plentifully supplied with fresh provisions from the coast of Barbary, set all the efforts of the besiegers at defiance*.

The first use made of the extraordinary supplies granted by the parliament, was to send once more a fleet up the Baltic, where it was said the czarina was preparing to attack the Swedes, and afterwards to proceed to the execution of other designs prejudicial to the interest of Great Britain and her allies. The command of this fleet was bestowed upon sir John Norris, who had under him two new made admirals, Maurice and Hughes; the one rear-admiral of the white, the other rear-admiral of the blue. Sir John arrived at Elsinour in the beginning of May, where he was joined by a Danish squadron; but the czarina dying on the seventeenth of the same month, the court of Petersburg thought proper to lay aside their armament†.

About the same time the court of Vienna having shewn a disposition to make some attempts upon the barrier of the States-general in the Netherlands, these latter applied to our court to hold in readiness, in case of necessity, the ten thousand auxiliaries which England was obliged by treaty to send to their assistance. Hereupon the forces of Great Britain were augmented with thirty new-raised companies.

Notwithstanding all these hostile appearances, the treaty of Hanover being merely defensive, left the powers engaged therein at full liberty to use their utmost endeavours to bring about an amicable accommodation. Accordingly, Lewis XV.

king of France, first undertook this friendly office, which was conducted by the duke de Richelieu, his ambassador at Vienna, who, in concert with the British and Dutch ministers, drew up twelve preliminary articles, which were signed on the twentieth of May at Paris by the ministers of the allies, and afterwards at Vienna by the Imperial and Spanish ambassadors. They imported; that hostilities should immediately cease; that the charter of the Ostend company should be suspended for seven years; and that a congress should in four months be opened at Aix la Chapelle, for adjusting all differences; and establishing the peace of Europe.

This congress was afterwards transferred to Soissons, for the conveniency of the French minister, whose presence was necessary at his own court. The siege of Gibraltar was raised, after it had lasted four months, during which above one half of the Spanish army had perished either by slaughter or sickness; while the English, who defended the place, did not lose above five hundred men. The court of Madrid, however, starting new difficulties, and refusing to restore the Prince Frederic, the English South-sea ship which had been detained at La Vera Cruz in the West Indies, Sir Charles Wager continued to cruize on the coast of Spain, after the raising the siege of Gibraltar. At length, after many cavils and delays, these obstructions were removed.

Two years had now elapsed since king George had visited his German dominions; so that he resolved to embrace the present opportunity of enjoying that pleasure. Accordingly, having appointed a regency, he embarked at Greenwich on the third day of June, and landing in Holland on the seventh, set out on his journey to Hanover. On the road his majesty was suddenly seized with a paralytic disorder, which terminating in a lethargy, he was carried in a state of insensibility to Onabrug, where he expired at his brother's palace, on Sunday the eleventh day of June, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign over these kingdoms, and was interred at Hanover among his ancestors.

We have, in the beginning of this reign, given a sketch of the character of George I. at the time he acceded to the British throne. As to his conduct after that accession, we must repeat, that his ministers were entirely accountable for it, he having constantly signified his intention to govern according to the laws of the country over which he was called to rule, and with a view solely to the good of his people. George I. was plain in his person, and simple in his address: though generally grave and composed in his public deportment, in his hours of relaxation he was easy, familiar, and even facetious.

We think we cannot conclude this reign more pleasingly than with a short account of the state of literature in this kingdom, from the death of Charles II. to this period, as given us by a modern writer †.

“ Dr. Atterbury (afterwards bishop of Rochester) and Dr. Clarke distinguished themselves in divinity; Mr. Whiston wrote in defence of Arianism; John Locke shone forth the great restorer of human reason; Cudworth traced the whole labyrinth of metaphysical argumentation; the earl of Shaftesbury raised an elegant, though feeble, system of moral philosophy; Berkeley, afterwards bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, surpassed all his contemporaries in subtlety and variety of metaphysical arguments, as well as in the art of deduction; lord Bolingbroke's talents as a metaphysician have been questioned since his posthumous works appeared; great progress was made in mathematics and astronomy by Wallis, Halley, and Flamsteed; the art of medicine owed some valuable improvements to the classical Dr. Freind and the elegant Dr. Mead.”

[It is with some degree of surprize that we find the name of the great sir Isaac Newton omitted by this author in his list of the improvers of astronomy and mathematics, since he was probably the greatest philosopher, and undoubtedly the greatest mathematician in Europe. We are far from pretending to draw his character entire: suffice it to say, in one word, that he has not left his equal perhaps on the face of the whole earth, having, even by the learned of foreign nations, been allowed the pre-eminence, and to be the unrivalled glory of the British name and nation!]

“ Among the poets of this æra we number John Philips, author of a didactic poem called Cyder; a performance of real merit: he lived and died in obscurity. William Congreve, celebrated for his comedies, which are not so famous for strength of character and power of humour, as for wit, elegance, and regularity: Vanbrugh, who wrote with more nature and fire, though with less art and precision: Steele, who in his comedies successfully engrafted modern characters on the antient drama: Farquhar, who drew his pictures from fancy rather than from nature, and whose chief merit consists in the agreeable pertness and vivacity of his dialogue: Addison, whose fame as a poet greatly exceeded his genius, which was cold and enervate, though he yielded to none in the character of an essayist, either for style or matter: Swift, whose muse seems to have been mere misanthropy; he was a cynic rather than a poet, and his natural dryness and sarcastic severity would have been unpleasant, had he not qualified them by adopting the extravagant humour of Lucian and Rabelais: Prior, lively, familiar, and amusing: Rowe, solemn, florid, and declamatory: Pope, the prince of lyric poetry, unrivalled in satire, ethics, and polished versification: the agreeable Parnel: the wild, the witty, and the whimsical Garth: Gay, whose fables will vie with those of La Fontaine, in nature, humour, ease, and simplicity, and whose genius for pastoral was truly original.

“ The most remarkable political writers were Davenant, Hare, Swift, Steele, Addison, Bolingbroke, and Trenchard.

“ Dr. Bentley stood foremost in the list of critics and commentators: sir Christopher Wren raised some noble monuments of architecture: in a word, during the period we have run over, England made a considerable figure in every branch of learning and the liberal sciences.

GEORGE II. A. D. 1727.

GEORGE II. on ascending the throne, had the happiness to find the minds of his new subjects in general prepossessed in his favour: they had with pleasure contemplated in him, while prince of Wales, many amiable qualifications, which promised them all the felicity they could wish, when he should one day come to rule over them. Although, during the life-time of his father, who seemed to have conceived some jealousy of him, he had been in a manner excluded from all share in the government, yet a more than common discernment supplied the defect in this part of his education; and his natural talents being improved and ripened by years, his majesty being in the forty-fourth year of his age at the death of his royal father, he seized the reins of government with full abilities to manage them.

At this time also conjunctures were particularly favourable to the new monarch. Commerce, the great idol of this nation, and to which she sacrifices every other consideration, flowed uninterrupted through all her channels, bringing daily a spring-tide of wealth into the capital, from whence it circulated through the most distant parts of the kingdom, producing riches and ease: that such was really the situation of the country at this period, may be demonstrated by numberless proofs; a few only will suffice. It is an unalterable maxim, that when in any state money bears but a low interest, and that the value of lands is every day increasing, there must be great plenty of money in that state: now this was at present the very case with regard to England. The interest of money was not now at more than three and a half or four per cent. at the most; the price of lands, which not many years before was at twenty and twenty-one years purchase, were now raised to twenty-five, twenty-six, and twenty-seven years purchase; an evident proof that there were more persons able and ready to purchase lands than formerly. dence of the increased wealth of Britain was, the great sums of late expended in the inclosing and improving lands, and the erecting of magnificent edifices. To this if we add the great increase of jewels, plate, and other rich moveables, much beyond former times; and, lastly, consider the increase in the tonnage of shipping, which in the last six years exceeded the preceding six years two hundred and thirty-eight thousand tons, we have undoubted proofs of Great Britain being in a most flourishing state, and, by consequence, her people rich and prosperous.

By the attention which had been shewn during the last reign to maritime affairs, our fleet was now on the most respectable footing; near two hundred sail of ships of war, as well of the line as frigates, fire-ships, &c. were either cruizing upon different parts of the ocean, or ready to sail from the several ports at the first warning, for the purpose of protecting our commerce, or annoying the enemy. Several regiments of well-disciplined troops were cantoned in different parts of the three kingdoms, so as to overawe the disaffected, and secure the peace and tranquility of the whole, while it strengthened the hands of government, and gave the new sovereign an ascendancy that had been unknown to his predecessors on the English throne for many years.

The parliament too, that body in other times so formidable to the sovereign, and who had for so many centuries been a constant check upon the regal power, under pretext of maintaining the rights of the people, now seemed to be a mere machine actuated by ministerial springs, and hardly waiting for the demand, lavished supplies upon the crown without end or limitation.

On the other hand, the state of affairs in Europe were every day growing more and more favourable to the peace and security of George, as well with respect to his British as his German dominions. Spain recovering at length from the illusion in which it had been held by the court of Vienna, became sensible how much it was her true interest to be heartily reconciled to Great Britain, and restore all the commercial privileges they enjoyed before the rupture between the two crowns, especially, as by keeping fair with king George she alone could hope to secure to Don Carlos, afterwards king of the Two Sicilies, the succession to the valuable duchy of Tuscany, and those of Parma and Placentia. To obtain this was the object of the treaty of Seville.

The emperor Charles VI. far from persisting to trouble the repose of Great Britain, readily gave up the new Ostend company; and by that concession obtained from his Britannic majesty the guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction, a family-law of which I shall have occasion to speak more particularly in the course of this history.

Holland, more closely united than ever with the English, her antient good friends and allies, blended her interests with theirs, and sincerely rejoiced at their prosperity, as the certain pledge of her own.

France, which was at this time principally governed by cardinal de Fleury, seemed desirous of peace, in order to repair the losses she had suffered, and to enrich herself at leisure by the extensive commerce she now carried on, without seeking to make any innovation.

The pretender, abandoned to his ill fortune, led an obscure life in the papal dominions, despairing to find any potentate in Europe weak enough to hazard his own tranquility, in support of the imaginary rights of a forlorn wanderer against a powerful monarch, actually in possession of the crown to which he aspired.

Thus, as I have already observed, George II. acceded to the crown under such favourable circumstances, as promised the most lasting happiness to himself, and the highest advantages to his people; yet (such is the precariousness of all human prospects) few reigns exhibit a greater variety of disagreeable events, both to the sovereign and the people, as will be abundantly manifested in the course of this history, the thread of which I shall now resume.

His late majesty's decease was not known in England till three or four days after it happened: but on the fourteenth of June an express arrived with the melancholy advice to sir Robert Walpole, who was then at his house at Chelsea. He immediately waited upon the prince and princess of Wales at Richmond, with the important intelligence; and they thereupon repaired to Leicester-house, where they had for some time kept their court. Here they were received by a number of the lords of the privy-council, and other persons of quality and distinction, who drew up and signed an instrument for proclaiming his royal highness king of these realms; and the ceremony of the proclamation was performed the next morning (Thursday June 15) at the usual places, with all the accustomed solemnities. His majesty in the interim caused all the lords and others of the late king's privy-council to be sworn of his privy-council: he likewise was pleased to make a declaration in council, in which, among other things, he had the following expression: "The religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom, are most dear to me; and the preservation of the constitution in church and state, as it is now happily established, shall be my first, and always my chief care." On the evening of the fourteenth his majesty took and subscribed the oath relating to the security of the church of Scotland, according to the forms prescribed by the laws of that kingdom. On the fifteenth the earl of Scarborough was sworn of the privy-council, and appointed master of the horse to his majesty.

The next day the court of lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London waited on the king and queen, with their compliments of condolence on the death of his late majesty, and congratulation upon their new sovereign's accession to the crown. The example of the capital was quickly followed by most of the cities, towns, boroughs, and corporations in the three kingdoms and the plantations. On the nineteenth of June his majesty was proclaimed with great solemnity at Edinburgh and Dublin.

The parliament of Great Britain assembled on the first news of the late king's death, in pursuance of the act made for that purpose in the fourth year of queen Anne, but was immediately prorogued by commission to the twenty-seventh day of the month. All the great officers of state were continued in their places; sir Robert Walpole kept possession of the Treasury; and the system of politics established by the late king was still strictly adhered to.

The supreme direction of affairs was not yet consigned to any single minister. The lord viscount Townshend was in general considered as the principal manager of foreign transactions relating to treaties and negotiations, for which he was on all hands allowed to be very capable. The duke of Newcastle, his colleague, though not possessed of so extensive a fund of knowledge in these matters, had ingratiated himself with his sovereign by his exemplary zeal for the protestant succession in the illustrious line of Hanover.

The interior government of Great Britain was chiefly managed by sir Robert Walpole, a man of extraordinary talents, and who had, from his first obtaining a seat in parliament, declared himself a strenuous partizan of the Whig party. As a public speaker, he was cool and clear; and though he might not, in a classical sense, be termed eloquent, he possessed that happy kind of elocution which seldom failed to persuade his audience into a belief of what he advanced. He was indeed inclined to speak rather too frequently for a man of his exalted station; but then he did it from a persuasion that he was better acquainted with the nature of the subject he handled than any of his friends who would have spoke for him. Few men better understood the nature of the public funds, and the iniquitous mystery of stock-jobbing; by which means he frequently counteracted the schemes of those who consulted their own interests at the expence of the public good; a charge which the most inveterate of his enemies could not make good against him. He was remarkable for his discernment of characters. In this distinguishing mark of a political genius he stood unrivalled by any minister we read of in history; but the greatest reproach (perhaps the greatest misfortune) of his administration, was, his applying himself only to the knowledge of men as they could be immediately useful in parliament. By this knowledge he could convert the degeneracy of the times to his own advantage, and always keep the venal part of the representatives of the nation in his interest, by gratifying them with profitable considerations for voting as he dictated. From the deaths of the earls of Sunderland and Stanhope, in the late reign, he had been making long strides towards the office of prime minister, to which he finally attained soon after the accession of George II. and kept possession of longer than any minister recorded in the English annals. If, during his long administration, his measures were frequently reprehensible, those of his antagonists were not always right; for in the heat of their animosity to him they opposed, without distinction, the justifiable as well as the questionable schemes he set on foot. But to return.

The parliament, agreeable to the royal proclamation, met on the twenty-seventh of June, 1727, and the session was opened by a speech delivered from his majesty's own mouth; in which he gave an early omen of that paternal care he ever after exerted for the welfare of his people: among many other gracious expressions, he assured the two houses, that it should be his constant care to preserve the constitution in church and state inviolable in all its parts, and to secure to all his subjects the free enjoyment of their religious and civil rights.

Addresses of condolance and congratulation being drawn up and presented by both houses, the commons, in a committee of the whole house, took into consideration a motion for establishing the civil list, for the better support of the honour and dignity of the crown. On this occasion sir Robert Walpole, as chancellor of the Exchequer, reminded the house, that the annual sum of seven hundred thousand pounds, which had been settled on the late king, had fallen short every year, insomuch that the house had been obliged to make up the deficiencies; and his present majesty's expences, he said, must necessarily be expected to increase, as he had a large family: he therefore moved, that the entire revenues of the civil list, which produced about eight hundred and thirty thousand pounds, should be settled on the king during his life. This motion was violently opposed by all the anti-courtiers; but no one distinguished himself so much as Mr. Shippen, who was an avowed enemy to the reigning ministry, and was an intrepid, shrewd, and sarcastic speaker: he urged, that this motion was inconsistent with the trust reposed in that house as representatives of the people, who ought to be very frugal in exercising the right of giving away the public money: he observed, that the civil list branches in queen Anne's reign did not often exceed five hundred and fifty thousand pounds; nevertheless, she called upon her parliament but once in a reign of thirteen years to pay the debts contracted in her civil-government; and these were occasioned by very extraordinary acts of piety and generosity, which she had exhibited on sundry occasions, particularly in the case of the poor clergy, towards the augmentation of whose livings she had given up the first-fruits and tenths, arising to nineteen thousand pounds per annum; and immediately before her death said she had formed a plan of retrenchment, which would have reduced her yearly expences to four hundred and fifty-nine thousand pounds per annum. He affirmed, that a million a year would not be sufficient to carry on the exorbitant expences of a profuse and vain-glorious administration. As none of the large sums which had been already granted were accounted for, but had all been sunk in the bottomless gulph of secret service, those sums, he said, had in all probability been employed in services not fit to be owned, in perverting from their public duty those who were weak or wicked enough to sell themselves as the tools and hirelings of a corrupt ministry. No answer was made to any of the particulars insisted upon in this speech. Antiministerial association was now reduced too low to be thought worthy such a mark of notice. The question was put. The house agreed to sir Robert's motion, and a bill was brought in upon the following resolutions; "First, That towards the supply granted to his majesty for the support of his household, the same revenues which were payable to his late majesty during his life, be granted and continued to his present majesty during his life. Secondly, That the said revenues be continued from the death of his late majesty."

While this bill was depending, a message was delivered by sir Paul Methuen, the treasurer of the household, from the king, recommending the making further provision for the queen, in case of his majesty's demise. The success of this message was considered as the touchstone of the disposition of the commons, who left it not long in suspense; for, after considering the message in a grand committee mittee of their house, they resolved, "1. That a provision be made for the queen, in case she should survive his majesty, of one hundred thousand pounds per annum during her life, together with his majesty's palace of Somerset-house, and the lodge and lands at Richmond Old Park. 2. That his majesty be enabled to charge the said one hundred thousand pounds on all or any of the duties and revenues, for the better support of her majesty's household, &c. which shall subsist after his majesty's decease."

Pursuant to these resolutions, bills were brought in and passed both houses, and received the royal assent on the seventeenth of July; as also an act "to enable his majesty to be governor of the South-sea company," and an act "for continuing the imprisonment of Robert Blackburne and others, for the assassination-plot against king William." The same day his majesty made a most gracious speech to both houses, which sufficiently demonstrated the pleasure their proceedings had given him. He thanked the members for the provision they had made for the support of his family and civil-government, and for the ample provision they had made for the queen. He then subjoins the following remarkable paragraph:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is a great happiness to me to see the nation in so prosperous and flourishing a condition; at the highest pitch of glory and reputation; of great weight in holding the balance of Europe; defending themselves in their just privileges and possessions; and vindicating the honour of the crown of Great Britain."

His majesty having concluded his speech, the lord-chancellor, by the royal command, declared the parliament prorogued to the twenty-ninth day of August; but on the seventh day of that month it was dissolved by proclamation, and writs were issued for convoking another.

In the interim, some changes were made in different departments of civil oeconomy. George Byng, lord viscount Torrington, was placed at the head of the admiralty; the earl of Westmoreland was appointed first lord-commissioner of trade and plantations; Philip-Dormer Stanhope, earl of Chesterfield, was nominated ambassador to the Hague; and the lord Carteret obtained the place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland: the duke of Devonshire was dignified with that of president of the council; and the duke of St. Albans was appointed master of the horse.

On the eleventh of October their majesties coronation was performed with great splendor and solemnity: the bishop of Oxford preached on the occasion, and the day was celebrated in every part of his majesty's dominions with the most extraordinary rejoicings. On the thirtieth, being lord-mayor's day as well as the king's birth-day, conformable to an humble invitation from the city, their majesties, the princess-royal, and princess Carolina, accompanied by the great officers of state, and other suitable attendants, dined with the lord-mayor at Guildhall, were present at a ball, and returned to St. James's in the same state with which they entered the city, at eleven o'clock the same night.

The other domestic transactions of this year are of little importance to a general history of England: we shall therefore pass on to a view of foreign affairs during the remaining part of this year.

The reader may remember, that towards the close of the last reign we took notice of certain articles, preliminary to a general pacification, being signed at Paris on May 20-31, 1727, on the part of the emperor, his Britannic majesty, the most Catholic king, and the States-general, by which a mutual cessation of hostilities was stipulated for seven years; and that within four months after signing this convention, a congress should be formed, in which all the rights and pretensions of the contracting parties should be examined, discussed, and determined: but as soon as the articles were produced in public, it was immediately foreseen that the dark and ambiguous manner of wording them would give occasion to many cavils and disputes.

Accordingly, the preliminaries were no sooner signed than new disputes began to be started about the meaning of them, and such interpretations to be put upon the words of these articles as utterly destroyed the intent and design of them. The Spaniards insisted that a mere cessation of hostilities, as stipulated by the preliminaries, did not imply an actual raising of the siege of Gibraltar; and that the restitution of the South-sea ship Prince Frederic, with her cargo, was not mentioned or included in them. Besides this, the court of Spain demanded an indulto of twenty per cent. on the effects of private persons embarked in the Flotilla.

These points having been warmly litigated by the different parties for eight or nine months, they were at length adjusted by another convention negotiated by the count de Rothemberg, minister of France, and signed at the Pardo, near Madrid, the sixth of March, 1728. This instrument contained an explanation of the preliminaries: and it was once more solemnly stipulated, that all the respective pretensions on each side should be produced, debated, and decided in the congress to be held at Soissons, with a particular engagement that their Britannic and Catholic majesties would abide by what should be there regulated.

In the mean time, it was agreed that the British squadrons should be ordered, without delay, to withdraw from the seas of Old and New Spain; in consideration of which, his Catholic majesty likewise engaged that the blockade of Gibraltar should be immediately raised; that a clear and express order should be sent without delay for restoring the ship Prince Frederic, with her cargo, to the agents of the South-sea company; and that the effects of the Flotilla should be forthwith delivered to the respective proprietors.

These conditions being accepted on both sides, his Catholic majesty ratified the preliminaries; but before the ratifications were exchanged, some new disputes arose concerning the orders agreed to be sent to the West Indies, in pursuance of this convention. These fresh difficulties took up some time longer, but were likewise got over by the count de Rothemberg and M. Vandermeer, the minister from the States-general, who managed all our affairs at the court of Spain; and the congress was opened at Soissons on the fourteenth of June, 1728, of which more in its place.

While these negotiations were on foot, a treaty or convention, which afterwards made a great noise in the world, was concluded at Westminster, between his Britannic majesty and the duke of Brunswic-Lunenbourg-Wolfenbittel. By this convention the Serene duke engaged to guaranty all his majesty's dominions in Great Britain, Ireland, and Germany; and likewise to furnish a body of five thousand men, for which our king engaged to pay the said duke a yearly subsidy of twenty-five thousand pounds, for four years. By a separate article in this convention it was stipulated, that the duke's troops were not to be obliged to pass over to Great Britain or Ireland, but should be employed either in replacing troops that might be drawn from his majesty's German dominions, or be put into the garrisons of the States-general, in case any of their troops should be sent over to Great Britain.

The elections in England and Scotland for the new parliament having gone entirely in favour of the ministry, the two houses met on the twenty-third day of January, 1728, when the commons unanimously chose for their speaker Arthur Onslow, esq. knight of the shire for the county of Surry; a gentleman of extensive knowledge, approved integrity, and abilities every way equal to the discharge of that honourable and important office, and who afterwards fully justified the choice of that respectable body, by his conduct in a longer series of public and irreprehensible services in that station than any man had ever done before him.

The king, in his speech to this new parliament, declared, that he was very sensible of the disagreeable and uneasy situation in which their affairs were at present placed, and had been greatly concerned to see many of the inconveniencies of a war attending his subjects, without any opportunity of resenting the injuries they had sustained, or gaining, in return, any of those advantages which the vigorous prosecution of so just a cause, and the success of his arms, might probably have secured to them: that many difficulties had occurred to impede the execution of the preliminaries; and tho' there was great reason to believe that the congress would soon be opened, and all obstructions removed, yet was it absolutely necessary to continue their warlike preparations, which had hitherto prevented a general rupture in Europe, and procured to the English nation many advantages, which would be entirely lost through a discontinuance of their armaments: that he was extremely desirous of reducing the national expences, and would not fail to set about this necessary and important work, as soon as the interest of his people would permit: he earnestly recommended to their consideration the increase and encouragement of seamen in general, that they might be invited, rather than compelled, to enter into the service of their country; a consideration, he said, well worthy the representatives of a people great and flourishing in trade and commerce: that he hoped they would make an addition to the fund of Greenwich hospital, and proceed in all their deliberations with such unanimity, zeal, and dispatch, as to convince the world that none of them could be induced, from any views or motives whatever, to wish the distress of their country, or to give occasion, from the prospect of divisions that might be excited and fomented at home, to interrupt or disappoint their expectations from abroad.

The two houses seemed to vie with each other in expressions of loyalty and affection to his majesty. The lords in their address complimented him in the highest strains of applause, as the best of kings, and the true father of his country. The commons, not to be behind with them, poured forth their grateful acknowledgements for the blessings they enjoyed under his auspicious reign (in which it should seem they rather over-shot the mark, as it was hardly eight months old). They approved of all his transactions, promised to support him in all his undertakings, and declared they would cheerfully grant whatsoever supplies should be wanted for the public service.

These warm professions of the commons drew from the king a most gracious answer, in which he gave them thanks for their very loyal and affectionate address: "Such returns of duty and gratitude from his faithful commons, he said, would add, if any thing possibly could, to his resolution of promoting and consulting upon all occasions the welfare and prosperity of his people. The entire confidence you place in me (continues his majesty) will engage me more strictly to make use of the power and trust you have reposed in me for your interest, and to your satisfaction; and you shall always find my readiness to ease and reduce the expences of the public to your expectations." This answer was so highly pleasing to the house, that they unanimously resolved to return their most humble thanks for it by another address.

Nor did they confine themselves to words alone; for having considered the estimates which were laid before them by order of his majesty, they voted twenty-two thousand nine hundred and fifty-five men for the land-service, and fifteen thousand seamen. They granted two hundred and thirty thousand nine hundred and twenty-three pounds for the maintenance of twelve thousand Hessian troops; a subsidy of fifty thousand pounds to the king of Sweden; and another of half that sum to the duke of Wolfenbittel. The expence of the year amounted to three millions seven hundred and ninety-nine thousand four hundred and fifty-four pounds sixteen shillings, raised by the land-tax, the malt-tax, and by a loan from the Bank of one million seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds, for which annuities, to the amount of seventy thousand pounds, to be raised by the duty on coals imported into the city of London, were granted to that corporation.

We must not, however, suppose that these very liberal grants passed unopposed: the number of land-forces occasioned a debate, and great heats arose about allowing the Hessian auxiliaries. In regard to the loan of the Bank, Mr. W. Pulteney observed, that the shifting of funds was in effect only perpetuating taxes, and putting off the evil day; that although some persons had arrogated great merit to themselves in having erected the Sinking Fund, it appeared that the national debt had been increased since the setting up of that project. This subject occasioned some warm altercation between this gentleman and sir Robert Walpole.

On

On the twenty-sixth of February the city of London presented a petition to the house of commons on the affair of the coal-tax, setting forth, "That the duties already laid upon coal and culm imported into the port of London only affect their trade; and the inequality of the burthen thereof is a great discouragement to their manufactures, as well as an hardship upon the whole trading people in and about the city of London; and praying the house would give them such relief as to their wisdom should seem meet." As the granting this petition would have entirely defeated the loan, it was rejected by the majority, and the tax was imposed.

Great heats and debates arose in the house of commons this session about the application of part of the public money. The commons having addressed the king for a particular account of the distribution of the money that had been granted the preceding year, a state of it was laid before them; but finding a charge of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, said in general terms to have been issued "for securing the trade and navigation of the kingdom," they presented a second address, desiring a more exact and distinct specification of the disbursement of that sum. To this address sir P. Methuen, by his majesty's command, returned for answer, that the last parliament having given the late king, his majesty's royal father, a power to issue and apply such sums of money as he should find necessary for discharging such expences, and fulfilling such engagements as had been or should be made for the security of his kingdom, and the preservation of the peace of Europe, some part of the money mentioned in the address had been issued and disbursed by his late majesty for these great and necessary purposes, and the remaining part had been applied by his present majesty for the like services. His majesty therefore hoped that the house would repose the same confidence in him as they had done in his royal father, and rest assured that the money had been faithfully and necessarily expended, pursuant to the power given him by act of parliament, and for the uses and purposes therein directed; but that a particular and distinct account thereof could not be given, without manifest prejudice to the public service.

Such a message, though perhaps not unprecedented, was certainly very little agreeable to the established methods of proceeding between king and parliament, and would, under some reigns, have been construed into an unpardonable stretch of the regal power: it was indeed too glaring to escape the animadversions of the gentlemen in the opposition. Mr. W. Pulteney in particular inveighed against it, as vague, frivolous, and altogether unparliamentary, and such as might be made use of to defeat every enquiry which that house might think proper to set on foot concerning the disposal of public money. "If we allow of such answers, said he, we may resign our most precious privilege as a parliament, that of enquiring into the distribution of public money, and the conduct of corrupt ministers, who ought to be the objects of our censure." To this the advocates for the ministry replied, that the answer was conformable to another returned in the late reign to a like address: there was no more reason, they said, for distrusting his present majesty, than there was for distrusting his royal father: that the commons were so well satisfied on that occasion, that instead of expressing any dissatisfaction, they returned the king an address of thanks for his gracious answer. Sir Robert Walpole said, that if the gentlemen on the other side of the question would but maturely consider the various and complicated interests actually subsisting on the continent, they would find it absolutely impossible that the public service could be carried on if every shilling of the money, expended for the benefit of the common cause, and the maintenance of the balance of Europe, should be laid open to all the world. In the end, the house resolved, by a great majority, to accept of the answer returned by his majesty.

On the fourth day of March the commons took into consideration the state of the national debt; on which affair the house, resolving itself into a grand committee, examined the accounts, and interrogated the proper officers, when a court-member moved for the following resolution, "That it appears to this house that the monies already issued and applied towards discharging the national debts incurred before Christmas 1716, together with the sum of six hundred and fifty-five thousand pounds to be issued at Lady-day next, amount to six millions six hundred and forty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty-two pounds five shillings and one penny farthing." The bent of this motion was evidently to appease the clamour which had been raised, that the public debts had increased since the establishment of the Sinking Fund. The anti-ministerial party, on the other hand, exerted all their abilities, which are allowed to have been very great, to expose the fallacious tendency of this motion. Mr. Daniel Pulteney, who was at that time in high credit for his great knowledge of public business and foreign transactions, put himself at the head of the debate upon this occasion. He was supported by his relation Mr. William Pulteney, Mr. Shippen, and in general by all the heads of the opposition.

Mr. Daniel Pulteney was a cold, but weighty speaker; and tho' other members in the opposition had brighter parts, none of them possessed superior, if equal, abilities; because his capacity, which was sound and vigorous, had been improved by study. Mr. William Pulteney inherited from nature a good understanding, which he had studiously cultivated: he was well read both in history and politics, and deeply skilled in the British constitution: he was master of a rapid and overpowering eloquence, and spoke with great freedom and courage. Mr. Shippen was calm, intrepid, shrewd, and sarcastic. Sir William Wyndham was nervous, manly, and full of senatorial dignity.

These great men declaimed in the warmest terms upon the profuse mismanagement of the public money: they insisted, that notwithstanding the very liberal grants which had been made by parliament during the last and present reign, notwithstanding the establishment of the Sinking Fund, the national debt was annually increasing, and that too in a time of profound peace; a circumstance which yielded a very melancholy prospect, since at this rate the public debts must encrease farther in case of a foreign war, or domestic commotion; so that the heavy and numerous taxes, under which the people at present laboured, seemed likely to be entailed on them to latest posterity.

In support of these assertions, they demonstrated several fraudulent artifices used in drawing up the accounts: they shewed that those who had prepared them had, in order to render more capital the sum said to have been issued and applied toward the discharge of the public debts incurred before Christmas 1716, added no less than three millions for the advanced price given in 1720, to convert the irredeemable debts into redeemables, which they urged could not with any propriety be called a payment of those debts: that on the other hand, in the account of the present national debt, or of the increase of that debt since Christmas 1716, several large sums were omitted, particularly one million upon the credit of the civil list, and several deficiencies in the land-tax, malt-tax, and other funds, which certainly still remain a public debt.

After having exhausted all their rhetoric, however, the ministerial party carried their point; for a second motion being made by the opposition for the speaker to resume the chair, it was carried in the negative by a very great majority; in consequence of which the first motion was approved without any division.

The great debt due to the navy was another interesting object of this parliament; and therefore, on the twenty-ninth of April, the house came to the following resolution; "That in order to the more regular, constant, and punctual payment of seamen's wages for the future, a sum, not exceeding five hundred thousand pounds, be granted to his majesty, towards paying off and discharging such part of the debt of the navy as is due upon the head of seamen's wages."

And now the minister, though sensible that he had greatly the superiority of numbers in the house in his favour, resolved to establish his credit without doors, which had been of late very severely handled from the press, of which his opponents had in a manner the entire possession, while he was inconceivably negligent in this respect: he looked upon writing to be a mechanical kind of business, and took up with the first pen he could find in public offices, or whom he could oblige by private liberality; and it was very seldom he ever read over the pamphlets or papers that were wrote even in defence of his own measures. But to return: Sir Robert Walpole knew that the writers for the opposition had, by numbers and calculations, persuaded the people that the Sinking Fund, which had been extolled as a growing treasure, sacred to the discharge of national incumbrances, had, by a shameful misapplication, proved of little or no service to the purpose for which it was originally intended. Such a notion prevailing among the public, could by no means be favourable to the administration. The minister therefore, in order to retrieve his character, made a solemn appeal to the tribunal of majesty itself, by causing a representation to be drawn up, containing a particular detail of the national debts discharged and incurred since the twenty-fifth day of December 1716, with a state of the Sinking Fund and of the public credit.

It was a very elaborate performance, and began with some very severe reflections against the arts which had been practised in order to mislead the people in this important point: then, after stating the whole of the national debt, it represented to his majesty, that the several national debts incurred before the twenty-fifth of December 1716, which have been since discharged, after deducting the sum of twenty-two thousand three hundred and fifty-seven pounds eight shillings and four-pence, do amount in the whole to six millions six hundred and twenty-six thousand four hundred and four pounds sixteen shillings and nine pence half-penny; and that the several national debts incurred since the said twenty-fifth of December, 1716, and now subsisting, amount together to the sum of three millions nine hundred and twenty-seven thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight pounds seven shillings and one penny three farthings, which being deducted out of the amount of the debts discharged, the difference is so much real decrease of the national debt since the twenty-fifth of December 1716, being two millions six hundred ninety-eight thousand four hundred and sixteen pounds nine shillings and seven-pence three farthings. The representation then goes on to shew, "That by the several reductions from six to five, and from five now to four per cent. on the greatest part of the public debts; so great savings of interest have been made, that the Sinking Fund may now be estimated to be about one million two hundred thousand pounds per annum, and will be every year increasing, from the farther savings of the interest of the remaining debts from time to time, as they shall be paid off: which increase of the Sinking Fund, from four hundred thousand pounds to about one million two hundred thousand pounds (since Midsummer 1727) being in the hands of government, and applicable from time to time to the discharge of the principal, makes a gain and profit to the public equal to the discharge of one third of the principal debt; so that the said additional eight hundred thousand pounds to the Sinking Fund, if valued at twenty-five years purchase, at which rate all annuities are now currently sold, makes a real profit to the public of twenty millions: and if, notwithstanding the many difficulties this nation has laboured under by an unnatural rebellion, and by the many heinous plots and conspiracies since formed for overturning the religion and liberties of our country, and notwithstanding the embroiled condition of the affairs of Europe, we have been able to diminish the national debts so much already, what may we not hope for (concludes this paper) in regard to a speedy dispatch of them for the future?"

Such was the purport of this famous representation, upon which we shall only in brief remark, with the most approved writers on the other side of the question, that although the then administration, and those which succeeded it, had afterwards many such difficulties to struggle with as are enumerated in the above representation, more surely might have been done for increasing the Sinking Fund, by absolutely preserving it inviolable; although it must be allowed, that it would have been attended with many and great difficulties, considering that a second rebellion, and two very expensive wars, have happened since that representation was made. What is past needs not to be enlarged upon; but surely hereafter (especially in times of peace) a determined national frugality ought to be cultivated with the utmost attention; and it is earnestly to be hoped and wished, that in order to increase the Sinking Fund, the public might be benefited by a rational reduction of the salaries salaries of many useless offices and employments in the revenue, &c. the fee-simple whereof would probably amount to a greater sum than many may apprehend, were a strict enquiry made thereinto.

The representation being approved of by the house, was presented to his majesty, who returned a very remarkable and favourable answer, importing, that he was highly pleased with this representation, which could not fail to give general satisfaction to all his people, by removing those groundless jealousies and apprehensions which had been propagated and dispersed throughout the kingdom: that the happy effects of the flourishing state of the public credit were too sensibly felt and seen, not to be confessed and acknowledged by every impartial person: that the provision made for gradually discharging the national debt was now become so certain and considerable, that nothing but some unforeseen event could alter or diminish it; a circumstance that afforded the fairest prospect of seeing the old debts discharged without the necessity of incurring new incumbrances: and that they might be well assured, that it should ever be his particular care and study to maintain and preserve the public credit, and improve the Sinking Fund, and to avoid all occasions of laying new burdens upon his people.

This answer, fraught with so many expressions of fatherly tenderness for his subjects, paved the way for a message from his majesty to the house of commons, which was delivered on the fourth day of May by sir P. Methuen, and consisted in a demand of a vote of credit, to fulfil certain engagements entered into and concerted with the advice and concurrence of the last parliament, for securing the trade and navigation of the kingdom, and for restoring and preserving the peace of Europe. This message was productive of a long and violent debate; but notwithstanding all the efforts of the opposition, it was carried by a majority of two hundred and thirty-seven against one hundred and one, that his majesty's request should be granted. This completed the triumph of the minister, who now seemed to have set his foot upon the neck of his adversaries.

They returned, however, to the attack, not so much from any view of being able to make a successful stand, as from a determined resolution to render the minister as unpopular as possible. With this view a motion was made on the seventeenth of May, for an account of the sale of woods, and grants of falls of woods, by his late majesty, from Christmas 1715 to January 1727, and how the same had been accounted for. This motion however had a negative put upon it, though it was represented that great waste had been made in the royal forests, at a time when the nation was in the utmost want of timber to supply and support the navy.

Little else material of public business happened this session of parliament, if we except an address of the commons to the king to purchase the Carolina charter, of which take the following short account:

Towards the close of the late reign the colonies of South and North Carolina were terribly harassed by the incursions of the Indians in their neighbourhood, the inhabitants being unable, with what assistance they could procure from the adjoining colonies, to withstand those savages; and the lords proprietors, unwilling to take upon themselves the expence of this Indian war, the deputies of the suffering colonies humbly besought his majesty to take them under his royal protection. The duke of Beaufort, the lord Craven, sir John Colleton, and others, the representatives of the original proprietors of those two provinces, having also declared by petition to his majesty their willingness to surrender their charter to the crown for a valuable consideration; the commons thereupon addressed the king to contract with the said lords proprietors of Carolina for the purchase and surrender of their title to that province, promising to make good the expence out of the next aids granted by parliament. In consequence of this address, an act was passed this session, by which (for the trifling sum of twenty-two thousand five hundred pounds) these fine provinces were made regal from after the 1st of June 1729: and in this regal state Carolina has amazingly flourished and increased in trade and commerce, and has extended its plantations farther back or westward. Proper supplies have been sent thither by the crown from time to time, whereby the neighbouring Indians were compelled to live in a peaceful manner, till some few years ago, when they were again reduced to reasonable terms, though not without much bloodshed*.

During this session the parliament were chiefly employed in examining copies of several treaties and alliances which the king had laid before them. They likewise made an attempt to amend the statute of limitations, which however miscarried in the sequel. They passed the mutiny-bill, together with those relating to the public supplies, and some others of a private nature. These having received the royal assent, the king closed the session on the twenty-eighth day of May, when he thanked the commons for the effectual supplies they had raised, and in particular for having empowered him to borrow five hundred thousand pounds for the discharge of wages due to the seamen employed in the navy.

Towards the close of this session his majesty was pleased to raise the following gentlemen to the degree of barons of this kingdom: sir John Monson, by the title of lord Monson: sir Thomas Wentworth, by that of lord Malton: sir John Hobart, by that of lord Hobart: and sir Thomas Coke, by that of lord Lovel.

In the spring of this year the king made an excursion to New-market, where he was waited upon by the university of Cambridge, with Dr. Lambert, their vice-chancellor, at their head, who besought his majesty to honour them with his presence at dinner; which invitation he most graciously accepted. At a small distance from the town of Cambridge he was met by the mayor and corporation in their formalities, who conducted him through it to the Regent-walk, where he was received by the duke of Somerset, then chancellor of the university, attended by the whole body of that illustrious seminary in their proper robes and habits. At the senate-house he ordered several degrees to be conferred; at King's-college chapel he heard divine service, and dined at Trinity-college with great magnificence. His majesty made a present of two thousand pounds to the university, and retired in the evening to New-market, from whence he returned to St. James's the fifth day after his having left it.

England was at this time quite barren of remarkable events. In the beginning of July signior Como, agent from the duke of Parma, was ordered to depart the kingdom in two days, his master having offered a gross insult to king George, by inviting the pretender to reside in his dominions, and having received him with the honours due to the king of Great Britain.

In August several persons were taken into custody, and some of them sentenced to stand in the pillory, and to be committed to Bridewell to hard labour, on account of printing and publishing Mist's Journal of August 24, which, under colour of relating the affairs of the Persian empire, was deemed to contain very gross and scandalous reflections upon the government, and the happy establishment in the illustrious house of Hanover. Edward Farley, printer of the Exeter Journal, for reprinting Mist's Journal, had a bill of indictment found against him for high treason; but upon a petition to the queen, after lying near a year in prison, without bail or mainprize, he obtained a noli prosequi, and was cleared thereupon in open court.

The king's uncle Ernest Augustus, prince of Brunswic, duke of York, and bishop of Osnabrug, died at his palace of Osnabrug on the third day of August, and was succeeded in the bishopric by the elector of Cologne, according to the paction by which Osnabrug is alternately possessed by the house of Brunswic and that elector.

In the beginning of December following the nation was agreeably surprized by the sudden and unexpected arrival in England of his royal highness prince Frederic, his majesty's eldest son, who set out from Herenhausen on the twenty-fourth of November, attended by the marquis de la Forest, his lord-chamberlain, and lieutenant-colonel Delaunay, of the Hanoverian guards, who had been sent by his majesty, they being then at the English court, to bring over his royal highness, some doubts having been urged in the privy-council concerning the non-residence of a prince of Wales in Great Britain. The marquis passed for an English gentleman, named Compton, and the prince for his son. Arriving in this manner incognito at Helvoetsluys, they went on board a packet then ready to sail for Harwich, where his royal highness arrived on the third of December, lodged at Colchester that night, came to Whitechapel the next day about seven in the evening, and proceeded thence very privately in a hackney-coach to St. James's. The next day he was introduced to the privy-council, and created prince of Wales; and there was a brilliant and numerous court to congratulate his royal highness on his safe arrival, who was soon after addressed on the same occasion from all parts of the kingdom.

The eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon the congress which was opened at Soissons on the 1st of June O. S. this year. The British ministers were, William Stanhope, esq. afterwards earl of Harrington; Horatio Walpole, esq. and Stephen Poyntz, esq. Those of the emperor were, the counts Zinzendorf and Windisgratz, and the baron Pentenreedter. Those of the French court were, the cardinal de Fleury, the marquis de Fénélon, and the count de Brancas. From Spain were sent the duke de Bournonville, the marquis de Santa Cruz, and Don Ignatio de Bernachea. The Dutch, the Swedes, the Danes, the Russians, the Poles, the dukes of Holstein, Parma, Bavaria, and the count Palatine, had likewise their several ambassadors there. But this numerous train of plenipotentiaries did little more than assemble in form, and produce their credentials; after which, having spent five or six months in ceremonies and diversions, they broke up, and separated without adjusting any one material point in dispute.

It is true, indeed, that a certain plan of accommodation, called a provisional treaty, was framed by the minister of the Hanover alliance during this assembly, and sent to the respective courts for their approbation: but as this draught of a treaty was neither relished at home, nor accepted abroad, it does not deserve much notice. I shall only observe in general, that it was little more than the preliminaries new-modelled, and digested into the form of a treaty, without any specific explanation of those points which most immediately affected the interests of Great Britain. Thus the fate of Europe was still left in suspense; the English fleet lay inactive in the West Indies; the sailors perished miserably, without daring to revenge their country's wrongs; for the ministry were unwilling to engage in a war; and in the mean time the Spanish guarda costas committed daily depredations on our merchant ships in that quarter of the world.

Through the natural infirmities of the king of Spain, who had betaken himself to a peevish recluse sort of life, his queen, an Italian by birth, had engrossed all power into her own hands. This princess was reserved, resolute, cunning, and dexterous in executing the most daring projects, even when attended with the most unpromising circumstances: she had fixed her heart upon the recovery of Gibraltar and Minorca; and procuring a settlement for her son Don Carlos in Italy. This made her very indifferent in regard to a reconciliation with England: but she had been very assiduous in renewing a good understanding with the court of France, and now sought to strengthen her interest by a double marriage with the royal family of Portugal. The prince of Asturias, eldest surviving son of the king of Spain by his first queen, now espoused the infanta of Portugal; while the Spanish infanta, formerly affianced to the French king, but sent back by him, was matched to the prince of Brazil, eldest son of his Portuguese majesty. But it is now time to attend domestic affairs.

The parliament of Great Britain met, according to their last prorogation, on the twenty-first day of January, 1729, when his majesty, in a speech to both houses, acquainted them, "That the plan of a provisional treaty had already been approved by him and his allies, but that no satisfactory answer had as yet been returned by the courts of Vienna and Madrid: that this circumstance created a state of uncertainty, which gave him great uneasiness: but he hoped they would believe, that nothing but a regard for the ease and interest of his his people could have prevailed upon him, rather to suffer some temporary inconveniencies, with the daily prospect of obtaining a safe and honourable peace, than precipitately to kindle a war in Europe, and to plunge the nation into still greater and more enormous expences: that he was sorry to find that the state of affairs obliged him to continue the public expences, in order to enable him, as events might require, to act with vigour, and in concert with his allies, who had all of them resolved to make the same preparations, and to keep on foot all their extraordinary forces: that he had some reason to believe, that the courts of Vienna and Madrid had been encouraged in their dilatory proceedings by the hopes which were given them from hence of creating discontents and divisions among his subjects; but he was persuaded, that their known affection for him, and a just regard for their own honour, and for the interest and security of the nation, would determine them effectually to discourage the unnatural and pernicious practices of some few, who suggested the means of distressing this country, and afterwards clamoured at the inconveniencies which they themselves had occasioned."

A man must have very little discernment, or else be miserably blinded by prejudice, not to observe in this speech the hand of the minister, labouring to render odious and unpopular all those who set themselves up to oppose him. The artifice had its desired effect; the two houses, all compliance with the will of those at the helm, joined in addresses that could not fail of being agreeable: pursuing the hint that had been given them, they professed their detestation and abhorrence of those who went about to distress their country, by unfair representations of the state of things, and clamoured at the inconveniencies they themselves had occasioned. The estimates having been examined in the usual form, the house voted fifteen thousand seamen for the ensuing year; but the motion for continuing the same number of land-forces which had been allowed in the preceding year, and which amounted to near twenty-three thousand men, begat a warm dispute, in which Mr. W. Pulteney and Mr. Shippen particularly distinguished themselves: they laboured to prove, from history and experience, the dangers into which a standing army brought the constitution: they urged, that the court of Vienna having readily agreed to the preliminaries for a general pacification, there ought to be a reduction of that augmentation of the army, which the differences lately subsisting with the house of Austria had induced the parliament to agree to. These arguments, however, were answered and represented as absurd by Mr. Horatio Walpole, and other staunch adherents of the minister, who said, that as no definitive resolution in favour of peace had been made by the courts of Vienna and Madrid, the reduction of our national troops during such a state of indecision, would only encourage the powers with whom we were at variance to insist upon higher terms: in a word, the motion for continuing the army upon the same footing it then was, passed by a great majority.

The subsidies to Sweden, Hesse-Cassel, and Wolfembuttel, were continued, notwithstanding the remonstrances of sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. Lutwyche, and Mr. Pulteney; which last observed, that as the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel and the duke of Brunswick-Wolfembuttel usually maintained a certain number of troops in their pay, it was but reasonable that Great Britain should defray the expence only of the additional forces which those powers had raised, in consequence of their conventions with the king of England. Sir Robert Walpole perceiving that this remark made an impression on the house, thought it necessary to vindicate his measure: he expatiated on the wisdom of the late king in concluding the Hanover alliance: he affirmed that the convention with Hesse-Cassel had prevented a war in the empire, for which the court of Vienna had made great preparations: that the emperor had not only augmented his own forces by the help of Spanish subsidies, but also retained the troops of three electors; and if he had not been overawed by the Hessians, would certainly have rejected the preliminaries, and all other advances towards a pacification: that therefore they ought not to grudge an expence which had already proved so beneficial to the tranquility of Europe. The question being put, the court carried their point by a great majority. It was then voted to grant the pay for the twelve thousand Hessians, and for the duke of Wolfembuttel's troops, and five hundred thousand pounds subsidy to Sweden. The house of commons, however, thought proper on this occasion to address his majesty, that whenever it should be necessary to take any foreign troops into his service, he will be graciously pleased to use his endeavours that they may be clothed with the manufactures of Great Britain. The supplies were raised by a continuation of the land-tax, the duties upon malt, cyder, and perry, an additional imposition on unmalted corn used in distilling, and by the sale of annuities to the Bank, not exceeding fifty thousand pounds per annum.

All this time the Spaniards continued to commit great depredations on our ships and settlements in America, which set the English on fire to repel these insults; but the ministry, who were entirely devoted to peace, urged, that as something decisive must happen ere long, it was most eligible, as the nation had waited so long, to wait a little longer before it broke out into open hostilities. The opposition taking advantage of the popular sentiments, let slip no opportunity of reviling and exposing the government, who, for the sake of one man, sacrificed the honour and interest of their country. In order to counteract these attempts, sir George Oxenden made a motion in the lower house for an address to his majesty, in answer to his speech from the throne, to acknowledge his majesty's great goodness and wisdom in endeavouring to avoid all difficulties and delays, by concerting the most expeditious methods of bringing the negotiations at Soissons to a speedy and honourable conclusion; expressing their grateful sense of his majesty's watchful care for the ease and interest of his people, in declining to plunge the nation into an expensive war, as long as there was any prospect of obtaining a safe and honourable peace; and, finally, assuring him that the house, in an entire confidence of his majesty's tender regard for his own honour, and that of the nation, rested fully satisfied that, as soon as necessity required, he would would not fail to take the first opportunity of doing justice to himself and the nation, in securing the trade and commerce of the kingdom.

The opposition, however, were prepared for this counter-stroke, and endeavoured to return it back upon the ministry, by rendering them obnoxious to the trading part of the kingdom. With this view they moved for an amendment in sir George's proposed address, and that the word restore should be substituted in the room of secure the commerce of the kingdom. This cavil, it must be confessed, did little honour to those who raised it, being at best but a poor quibble upon words. However, it so far answered the end, as to raise a warm debate upon a point the ministry were not very able to defend, their passive behaviour in regard to the insults of the Spaniards. Sir William Yonge was at this time a frequent and a ready speaker, and his oratory was florid and captivating. Some part of his private life, however, had been such as had created him many enemies; and the prepossession which prevailed against him, had extended itself to his parliamentary and ministerial character, though in this point of view he certainly exhibited many strong abilities. On this occasion he set himself with all his strength to refute the arguments brought by the opposition in support of their amendment. He said, that the distinction between restoring and securing commerce, was a distinction without a difference; because supposing (which however he would by no means admit) the British commerce was ruined, it might be restored before it could be secured. He observed, that whatever was just in the outcry against the Spanish depredations, was in a great measure owing to the intolerable avarice of some English interlopers, who carried on an unlawful traffick with the subjects of Spain in America, in defiance of treaties and the law of nations, as well as to the manifest prejudice of the fair British trader.

The opposition were strengthened in this dispute by sir Joseph Jekyll, master of the rolls. He was esteemed an upright judge, and an uncorrupt senator. His knowledge both in law and equity were consummate; but he was a weak politician, and a very indifferent speaker. His prepossessions in favour of the old Whig principles were so strong, that he could not bear the thoughts of England detaching herself from the house of Austria, and joining her interest with that of Bourbon. This was a revolution in politics which he could not comprehend; and which, in his opinion, endangered the constitution of the kingdom, the security of which, he said, ought to be still more dear to them than the security of commerce. In a word, the ablest speakers on both sides exerted their utmost abilities in this debate; but the question being at last put, whether the address should stand in its original form, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of two hundred and ninety-four against eighty-seven.

It happening, however, that the Spaniards made prize of some of our ships engaged in a lawful trade, the indignation of the public could be no longer restrained: petitions were delivered to the house of commons from the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Bristol, complaining of the interruption they had suffered in their trade for several years, by the depredations of the Spaniards in the West Indies. These being considered, the house ordered the lords of the admiralty to produce the other memorials of the same kind which they had received, that they might be laid before the congress at Soissons; and addressed his majesty for copies of all the letters and instruments which had been sent to admiral Hosier, and those who succeeded him in the command of the West India squadron. Having obtained these necessary informations, they enquired into the particulars, examined evidence, and drew up an address to his majesty, desiring he would be graciously pleased to use his utmost endeavours for preventing such depredations, for procuring just and reasonable satisfaction, and for securing to his subjects the free exercise of commerce and navigation to and from the British colonies in America. The king assured them, he would use his best endeavours to answer the desires and expectations of his people in an affair of so much importance; and they in another address thanked him for his gracious answer.

The commons having made farther progress in the enquiry, and received fresh petitions from the merchants, agreed to the following resolutions; that several ships, merchandizes, and effects belonging to the merchants of this kingdom, trading to Spain, Portugal, and Italy, had been taken by the Spaniards, in manifest violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns, for which no restitution had as yet been made; and that the masters and crews of several ships had been barbarously and inhumanly treated: that, in order to take the necessary care of the interests and properties of his majesty's subjects and those of his allies, who were deeply concerned in the cargo and effects belonging to the flota and galleons; and to the end that the said treasure should not be employed in carrying on and supporting dangerous measures and engagements against his majesty and his allies, the orders and instructions given to vice-admiral Hosier to block up the flota and galleons, and to endeavour to secure and detain them without embezzlement, until justice and satisfaction should be given to his majesty and his allies, were just, prudent, and necessary, tending very much to prevent an open rupture, and to preserve the peace and tranquillity of Europe. These resolutions were communicated in an address to his majesty, who was again requested to use his endeavours to procure satisfaction to the unhappy sufferers; and he assured the house that he would not fail to comply with their request.

The Spanish ministry, on the other hand, insisted that the English, being excluded by treaty from any right to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy, or of trading to that bay, their cruizers and guarda costas were warrantable in seizing and detaining all such vessels as they should find pursuing that illicit trade. To set this matter, which was the foundation of most of our disputes with the Spanish court, in a true light, I shall present my readers (from Mr. Anderson's celebrated Treatise on Commerce, and other authorities) with a short historical deduction of the right claimed by the British nation, to retain a colony, and to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy.

It was in the year 1662 that the English, from their colonies on the north continent of America, first began to cut down the logwood trees, growing in infinite quantities on the uninhabited coasts of the province of Yucatan, and more especially in the bay of Campeachy, where they made a settlement for that end, as it was not near to any Spanish settlement or inhabitants. Their first settlement was near Cape Catoche, next the Laguna di Terminos, which was found more convenient, and where the English buccaneers afterwards found themselves obliged to settle, upon the treaty of Madrid between England and Spain in 1667; which treaty, though it made no particular mention of America by name, expressly stipulated "A general, firm, and perpetual amity between the two crowns, as well by land as by sea, and between all the countries under the obedience of either of the kings." By the year 1669 that English settlement was considerably increased, and much logwood was carried from thence both to New England and Jamaica. In the year 1670 was concluded at Madrid, by sir W. Godolphin, the first treaty between England and Spain which expressly related to America, and therefore is usually called the American treaty.

By this convention the then possessions of both nations in America are confirmed. This gave encouragement to more of our people to settle with the above-mentioned logwood cutters, as it was in a desolate and unplanted country, and that the Spaniards had not hitherto made any complaints about it: for it was not till the year 1672 that the Spaniards began to interrupt our logwood cutters there, or to make the least remonstrances to our court against their settling in that bay. Soon after, however, the Spaniards became so uneasy at that settlement, and our cutting the logwood, that they actually made prize of all English vessels they met in the American seas which had any of that commodity on board; of which the earl of Arlington, the English secretary of state, loudly complained to the Spanish court by a letter, in the year 1674: for, as the sole advantage our court had in view by concluding the American treaty was, that our people might, without interruption, trade to our own colonies, and peaceably enjoy our then possessions in America, we were herein greatly frustrated by the court of Spain's conduct; so that this American treaty has ever since afforded a handle or pretence to that court to seize on our ships sailing along their American coasts, although with no intention of carrying on any contraband trade. It has occasionally been farther improved by Spain, to the having any quantity of pieces of eight to be seized, when found on board our ships near their American coasts; yet (excepting two or three months in the year 1680 that the Spaniards, by a considerable force, dislodged our logwood-cutters from the Laguna di Terminos, and the island de Trist) our people have remained in possession thereof. In the year 1717 the marquis de Monteleone delivered a memorial against the British subjects settlements in the isle of Trist, and one near the Laguna di Terminos, in the province of Yucatan and bay of Campeachy, where they continued to cut logwood; declaring, that if in the space of eight months they do not leave the said place, they shall be looked upon and treated as pirates. Hereupon the matter was referred by the king to the board of trade: they gave it as their opinion, that the English had a right to cut logwood there; which opinion was founded on the principles above related, confirmed by the treaty of Utrecht; wherein, after confirming the American treaty, a stipulation is inserted, that the same shall be without any prejudice to any liberty or power which the subjects of Great Britain enjoyed before, either through right, sufferance, or indulgence.

The attention of the commons was not so wholly engrossed by affairs of a public nature as to suffer them to neglect certain matters of a domestic kind, which were about this time brought before them, and which were very important and interesting objects. Some public-spirited gentlemen, at the head of whom was Mr. (afterwards general) Oglethorpe, having received intimations of the cruelties and oppressions practised throughout almost all the gaols in the kingdom upon prisoners, particularly in his majesty's prison of the Fleet; Mr. Oglethorpe, who was a member of the commons, laid the information he had received before the house; upon which a committee was appointed, with Mr. Oglethorpe for their chairman, to enquire into the state of all the gaols over the kingdom; and on the twenty-seventh of February they repaired to the Fleet prison, that they might examine the prisoners in their own persons. In consequence of this visitation, what before seemed justly alarming, now rose into circumstances of such complicated guilt, as filled the committee with horror. Whereupon the house came to several resolutions, and committed Huggins and Bambridge, the late and present wardens, with several of their understrappers, close prisoners to Newgate. A state of the Fleet prison was published, which displayed a lamentable scene of cruelty and barbarity. Huggins and Bambridge were tried for many crimes and misdemeanors, as well as murder; but were unexpectedly acquitted. One Acton, farmer of and clerk to the Marshalsea, was also tried for murder, and acquitted. The issue of the whole was, that the gaols were put under proper regulations, and our unhappy fellow-subjects beneath the pressure of misfortunes, delivered from the gripe of villains who had made a practice of adding misery, torment, and extortion, to wretchedness.

Complaints having been made of the deficiency of the civil list revenue, some members moved for an address to his majesty, intreating him to order an account of these revenues for one year to be laid before the house. The address was presented, the account produced, and the house resolved itself into a grand committee, to take the affair into consideration. The ministry affirmed that they fell short of the eight hundred thousand pounds settled upon his majesty; and therefore moved that the sum of one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds should be granted to the king on account of those deficiencies and arrears.

This motion was vehemently opposed by all the members of the anti-ministerial party: they insisted, from the examination of the officers of the revenue at their bar, with several accounts that had been delivered to the house, that this sum of eight hundred thousand pounds and more was actually standing out in arrears which would be soon paid into the Exchequer. The pretence of a deficiency was therefore given up, and the one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds were in a manner begged by way of salvo, to the credit of those who first demanded it as a just debt. Nay, for their honour, there there is a clause inserted in the act which grants it, shewing it to be true; for it is there enacted, that the sum of one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds shall be repaid out of any arrears of the civil list at his majesty's demise.

The sum of ninety-three thousand nine hundred and forty pounds of the late queen's civil list lottery, which remained unsubscribed to the South-sea company, being entirely paid off in the year 1728, by the thirty-five thousand per annum appropriated for this service; and there being an annual sum of sixteen thousand four hundred pounds then remaining more than what answered the bare interest of that part of the lottery which was subscribed into the South-sea company, this annual sum of sixteen thousand four hundred pounds was judged to belong to the civil list, and accordingly was taken, though, by an act of the sixth Geo. I. the whole thirty-five thousand pounds were appropriated for ever, with the other branches of the Sinking Fund, towards the payment of the national debt. Few persons, however, were surprised at the frequent necessities of the civil list, notwithstanding that ample revenue which was settled on the crown in the preceding reign, when it was found that no less a sum than one million three hundred and thirty-six thousand pounds was paid in four years, from March 1721 to March 1725, for pensions, bounties, and secret service-money, which is annually above half the civil list revenue.

It was from a reflection on the damage that must accrue by such profusion to both prince and people, and even to the ministers themselves, as it induced a corrupt dependence thro' all ranks and degrees of men, that the most reputable members in the opposition resolved to make a stand against this torrent, and, if possible, lessen the ministerial influence. With this view a bill was produced by Mr. Watkyns-William Wynn, for the more effectually preventing bribery and corruption in parliamentary elections. The title of this bill being so truly unexceptionable, the minister, fearful of increasing too much the popular clamour against him should he oppose it, though, on the other hand, if he suffered it to pass, his influence would be greatly diminished thereby, was for some time at a loss how to act: at length his prudence determined him to give it no opposition, and the bill accordingly passed through the lower house with great dispatch.

When it came into the house of peers, that august assembly thought proper to raise the penalty upon a corrupt voter, party, or agent, in the election for a member of parliament, from fifty to five hundred pounds; and the person so convicted to be for ever disabled to vote in any election, and disqualified from holding any office or franchise as a member of any city, borough, town-corporate, or cinque-ports. The lords likewise added to this bill the following clause: "That such votes shall be deemed to be legal, which have been so declared by the last determination in the house of commons, concerning any county, shire, city, borough, cinque-port, or place, and shall be final to all intents and purposes whatsoever, any usage to the contrary notwithstanding."

of Spain for the restitution of Gibraltar, grounded on a letter written by the late king to his Catholic majesty, a copy of which was laid before the house. The lords engaged in the opposition took occasion from this letter to declaim violently against the ministry; and moved to resolve, that for the honour of his majesty, and the preservation and security of the trade and commerce of this kingdom, effectual care should be taken in the treaty now depending, that the king of Spain do renounce all claim and pretension to Gibraltar and the island of Minorca, in plain and strong terms.

This motion however was opposed by the lords of the court-party, who insisted, in the first place, that the pretensions of the court of Madrid were in themselves absurd and frivolous, since it appeared by the copy of the letter before them, that his majesty had only said that he would make use of the first favourable opportunity to regulate the article of the restitution of Gibraltar, with the consent of his parliament; the promise therefore was no other than conditional, and could not in any sense be binding to his Britannic majesty, unless his parliament should give their consent. Furthermore, they said, that in their opinion Great Britain had a much better right, by the treaty of Utrecht, to Gibraltar and Minorca, than she possibly could have by any personal act or renunciation of his Catholic majesty. The desiring therefore any such act would imply a kind of invalidity of the right by which these possessions were already held. It was not to be doubted, they said, that the king and kingdom of Spain would readily embrace the first opportunity of endeavouring to recover these places; nor would any renunciation, however strong and peremptory, prevent their seizing such an opportunity whenever it should offer. Besides, should his Catholic majesty, as there was reason to believe he would, refuse to grant any such renunciation as was now proposed, all Europe would be apt to think that Great Britain held these conquests by a very weak and invalid title. After these and other arguments, the question being put, a negative was put upon the motion, though not without a spirited protest on the part of seventeen peers.

The court-party, however, had so much prudence in the midst of their triumph, as not to suffer a matter of so much importance to pass wholly neglected. Possibly the minister might think that all his power and influence would not be able to counterbalance the indignation which the people in general must have felt on the appearance of a settled design to give up these two valuable possessions. It was therefore resolved to proceed on the affair in the most solemn manner: a message was sent to the commons, inviting them to a free conference in the Painted Chamber, relating to the subject in debate, which was agreed to on the part of the latter, when the lords desired their concurrence to the following resolution; "That they do entirely rely upon his majesty that he will, for the maintaining the honour and securing the trade of this kingdom, take effectual care in the present treaty to preserve his undoubted right to Gibraltar and the island of Minorca."

The opposition in the lower house, however, were not to be moved from their first principles: they insisted strenuously upon a specific renunciation of those places on the part of Spain; they spoke the voice of the nation, who could not without concern see this essential object left liable to contest and altercation. The energy, the clearness of argument made use of by the minority on this occasion, brought over many members from the court-side, as appeared from the putting of the question, when the ministry carried their point only by a majority of two hundred and sixty-seven against one hundred and eleven.

The commons thus agreeing with the peers in their resolution, a joint address was presented to the king from both houses on the twenty-fifth of March, 1729, when his majesty was pleased in his answer to promise them, "That he would take care to secure his undoubted right to Gibraltar and the island of Minorca."

When the lords took under their examination the papers relating to the Spanish depredations, many severe reflections were thrown out against the conduct of the ministry; and a motion was made to resolve, That admiral Hosier's expedition was an unreasonable burden on the nation; but this too was rejected, and occasioned another protest. Nor did the clause for granting one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds to his majesty, to make good the deficiency in the civil list, pass thro' the house of peers without warm opposition. Divers lords alleged (as had before been done by some of the commons) that instead of a deficiency in the civil list revenues, there was a considerable surplus: that this was a new grant, and a new burden on the people: that the nation was loaded, not to complete, but to augment the sum designed for the civil list; and this at a time when the public debts were increased, and when the taxes were heavily felt in all parts of the country. They observed, that if the produce of the civil list revenue should not amount to the yearly sum of 800,000 l. the deficiency must be made good to his majesty by the public; whereas no provision was made by which, if the produce of those revenues should exceed that sum, the surplus should accrue to the benefit of the public: that by this precedent, not only real deficiencies were to be made good, but also supplies were to be given for arrears standing out at the end of every year, which should come on before the supplies could be granted, though the supply given to make good arrears in one year, would certainly increase the surpluses in another: that the revenues of the civil list were variable in their own nature; and even when there is no deficiency in the produce, there might be arrears in the receipt: these might easily be increased by the management of designing ministers, by private directions to receivers, and by artful methods of stating accounts. All these arguments, all these objections, however, served only to evince the weakness of the opposition, and the overbearing influence of the minister. Every motion made by the opposition was baffled: every motion proposed by the court-party was carried by an amazing majority.

At length the complicated business of this session being spun out to its utmost length, altercation was out of breath: each party wished to retire from the bustle of business; the one to enjoy its triumph, the other to brood over its discontent. His majesty, on May 14, after giving, among a number of other acts, the royal assent to one enabling the queen to be regent of the kingdom during his absence, without taking the oaths; and another for the relief of insolvent debtors, and to thirty-two private bills, put an end to the session by a speech, in which he signified his intention of visiting his German dominions; and set out for Hanover on the twentieth day of the same month.

Great Britain at this time enjoyed uninterrupted repose, and commerce continued to increase. In the beginning of June the fleet at Spithead, under the command of sir Charles Wager, was joined by eleven Dutch ships of war under vice-admiral Somersdyke. This squadron was intended for the coast of Spain, in case affairs did not take a favourable turn with that court; but the treaty of Seville being agreed upon towards the end of the summer, the Dutch squadron returned to Holland in the beginning of October, and the English fleet separated soon after.

The people of Ireland found themselves happy under the government of lord Carteret; and their parliament assembling in the month of September, conducted their deliberations with the true spirit of patriotism. They settled funds for the discharge of their national debts, and for answering the exigencies of government: they gave all possible encouragement to manufacture, trade, and agriculture; and enacted several wise and wholesome laws for the improvement of domestic oeconomy. The session in that kingdom being closed, lord Carteret repaired to England, and was succeeded as lord-lieutenant of Ireland by the duke of Dorset. Colonel Stanhope, who was about this time created earl of Harrington, was appointed one of the secretaries of state, in the room of lord Townshend, who resigned; so that sir Robert Walpole now saw himself without a rival in the ministerial sphere. The earl of Waldegrave was appointed ambassador to France, to congratulate Lewis XV. on the birth of a dauphin, which filled that court with inexpressible joy.

Savoy at this time furnished the world with an extraordinary sight. Victor Amadeus II. king of Sardinia, and duke of Savoy, the same who was sometimes the ally and sometimes the friend of France and Austria, and whose wavering conduct had passed for policy, being tired of the burden of public affairs, and weary of himself, abdicated, through mere caprice, in the month of September this year, at the age of sixty-four, a crown which he had worn the first of his family. He resigned the regal authority to his son Charles Emanuel, prince of Piedmont, and reserving to himself a revenue of one hundred thousand pistoles per annum, retired to the castle of Chamberry, and espoused his favourite mistress the countess dowager of St. Sebastian, who declined the title of queen, but assumed that of marchioness of Somerive.

In October Peter II. czar of Muscovy, and grandson of Peter I. died in the fifteenth year of his age, at Moscow, and was succeeded on the throne by the princess Anne-Ivanowna, second daughter of Ivan (John) Alexowitz, elder brother of the first Peter, and widow of William duke of Courland. The following month died pope Benedict XIII. in whose room cardinal Laurentio Corfini was raised to the pontificate, and assumed the name of Clement XII.

All this time the negotiations at Soissons seemed at a stand: at length it was agreed to open conferences at Seville between the plenipotentiaries of England, England, France, and Spain. The earl of Harrington, who had this year been nominated ambassador extraordinary to his Catholic majesty, had the management of this treaty on the part of Great Britain, together with Mr. Keen, our plenipotentiary at the court of Madrid, the Spanish plenipotentiaries being the marquis de la Paz, and Don Joseph Patinho.

By this treaty, which was signed on the ninth day of November, 1729, N. S. it was stipulated that all former treaties and conventions between the crowns of Great Britain and Spain should be as amply confirmed as if they had been expressly repeated: that their Britannic and Catholic majesties should guaranty to each other their respective dominions; and in case either of them should be attacked, the other should furnish to the party so invaded a body of twelve thousand men: that all such engagements contracted by his Britannic majesty, in consequence of the treaty of Vienna, as were inconsistent with the treaties subsisting between the crowns of England and Spain, antecedent to the year 1725, should be rendered void and invalid: that the commerce of the English and French nations, both in Europe and the Indies, should be restored to its former footing, and orders should be instantly dispatched on all sides for that purpose: that his Catholic majesty should make reparation for all the damages that had been done by his subjects to those of the other two parties: that commissaries should be nominated, with sufficient powers, on the part of their Britannic and Catholic majesties, who should assemble at the court of Spain, within the space of four months after the ratification, or sooner, if possible, to decide whatever concerned the ships and effects taken on either side: that the said commissioners should likewise examine and decide, according to treaties, the respective pretensions which relate to the abuses that were said to have been committed in commerce, as well in the Indies as in Europe, and all other respective pretensions in America founded on treaties, whether with respect to the limits or otherwise: that the said commissioners should likewise discuss and decide the pretensions which his Catholic majesty might have by the treaty of 1721, to the restitution of the ships taken by the English fleet in 1718: that the said commissioners, after having examined, discussed, and decided the above-mentioned claims and pretensions, should make a report of their proceedings to their Britannic and Catholic majesties, who by the present treaty promised, that in the space of six months after making the said report, they would cause to be executed punctually and exactly what should have been so decided by the said commissioners. His Catholic majesty engages to send six thousand of his troops, without loss of time, to garrison Leghorn, Porto Ferraro, Parma, and Placentia, for the better securing and preserving the succession of those states in favour of Don Carlos, and to be ready to withstand any enterprize and opposition that might be formed to the prejudice of what had already been regulated touching the succession. The contracting powers also promise to take the softest and most effectual means of persuading the dukes of Tuscany and Parma to admit these garrisons, upon their promising to take an oath to be faithful to the reigning powers in every thing that should not be contrary to the right of succession reserved to the infanta Don Carlos; and upon their engaging not to meddle directly nor indirectly in the government of the places where they should be garrisoned, and to pay to the dukes of Tuscany and Parma all the honours due to sovereigns in their own dominions; and as soon as the succession of these territories should be quietly settled in the person of Don Carlos, his Catholic majesty engages to withdraw his troops from the said garrisons: the contracting princes agree, on their parts, to become guarantees to Don Carlos for the quiet possession and enjoyment of the said states of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, after he shall have once obtained them.

By the thirteenth article of this treaty the kings of England and France promise to ratify and guaranty all the particular regulations that shall be concerted between his Catholic majesty and the two dukes of Tuscany and Parma, relating to the aforesaid garrisons. The fourteenth and last article stipulates, that the States-general of the United Provinces shall be invited to accede to the treaty, the ratifications of which were to be dispatched within the space of six weeks at farthest.

Besides these, there were two separate articles, by which it was expressly stipulated, for the greater exactness, that the treaties of peace and commerce at Utrecht between Great Britain and Spain, in which are comprised the treaty of 1669 and of 1715; as also the Affiento contract of 1713, and its farther explanation, anno 1716, shall from this day (even during the examination by the commissaries) remain in their full force and vigour, for which end the Catholic king shall dispatch his cédulas to his vice-roys, &c. in America as well as in Europe; as also his Britannic majesty to his governors, &c. for the release of all ships and merchandize, and particularly the South-sea company's ship Prince Frederic and her cargo, shall be immediately restored: all which under the before-named guarantee.

In the accession of the States-general (which was performed in this same month) they were to furnish only four thousand foot and one thousand horse; and on the part of the other allies, they were to guaranty the abolishing the Ostend East India company; and the Catholic king engages that entire satisfaction shall be given them (the Dutch) for their grievances, as well in the West Indies as in Europe, and to re-establish their commerce, agreeable to former treaties; and, lastly, to grant them all the commercial privileges enjoyed by the nations most favoured.

Such were the contents of the famous treaty of Seville, which afterwards produced such an alteration in the system of Europe, by the concurrence of other events.

His majesty having returned to England from his German dominions, in the beginning of September, opened the session on the third of January, 1730, with a speech, in which he informed them, That he had concluded an absolute peace with Spain, and thereby prevented the miseries and calamities inseparable from a war. He assured them, that the peace was agreeable to the purport and intention of former treaties, and calculated to render effectual the stipulations of the quadruple alliance: that sufficient provision had been made for the indemnification and future security of the trading interest: and that he had given orders for making an immediate reduction both of his land and sea-forces. He then concluded with recommending to their consideration the state of public credit, and the hardships of poor artificers and manufacturers.

The commons being returned to their house, fir Robert Walpole laid before them the treaty of Seville, when lord Fitzwilliams made a motion for a loyal address of thanks to the throne, conceived in much the same terms as the speech. This motion, however, was vehemently opposed by the country party, who proposed simply to assure his majesty of the steady and zealous attachment of the house to his royal person, government, and family, and of their readiness to support him in all measures which should be necessary for the honour and dignity of the crown, and for the interest and welfare of his people. In support of this allegation they threw out many severe and bitter reflections against the substance of the treaty: they urged, that the ministry had imposed upon his majesty in calling the peace an absolute peace, inasmuch as the most important interests of Great Britain were left to a future decision. It was no wonder indeed, they said, that the minister and his friends, who triumphed so much the year before on the mere project or draught of a treaty, should discover the same spirit of exultation upon procuring a formal one, actually signed, though there was still wanting the accession of one power, whose consent was most necessary to the putting it in execution; for, as the introduction of six thousand Spanish forces into the strong places of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, instead of six thousand neutrals stipulated by the quadruple alliance, was the basis of the Seville treaty, the concurrence of the emperor, to whom the feodality of these states belonged, was certainly requisite to the amicable execution of it; and yet he was not so much as complimented in the treaty with an invitation to accede, as the Dutch were by an express article. The minister maintained that the peace was absolute, and that no difficulties could happen in the execution of it, unless the Spaniards and other powers were encouraged to raise them, by the dissensions that might happen amongst us at home: he attempted to prove, that this treaty under consideration was framed to answer every desirable purpose, could give the emperor no disgust, secured our right to Gibraltar and Minorca, and would procure reparation to our merchants; assertions which, however, appear not to have been justified by the events. The question being at last put, whether to draw up the address in the original form proposed, the majority carried it in the affirmative.

After both houses had presented their addresses of thanks and congratulation to his majesty on the peace of Seville, the lords took that treaty into consideration, and it did not pass without severe animadversions. The lords in the opposition observed, first, that the merchants of Great Britain were subjected to great inconveniencies, by being obliged to make proof of their losses at the court of Spain. They said, that this stipulation was not only a hardship on British subjects, but also dishonourable to the nation: that few would care to undertake such a troublesome and expensive journey, especially as they had reason to apprehend their claims would be counterbalanced by the Spaniards; and after all, they would have no more but the slender comfort of hoping to obtain that redress by commissaries, which they had not been able to procure by plenipotentiaries. They thought it very extraordinary that Great Britain should be bound to ratify and guaranty whatever agreement should be made between the king of Spain and the dukes of Parma and Tuscany, concerning the garrisons once established in their countries: that the English should be obliged to assist in effectuating the introduction of six thousand Spanish troops into the towns of Tuscany and Parma, without any specification of the methods to be taken, or the charge to be incurred in giving that assistance: that they should guaranty for ever, not only to Don Carlos, but even to all his successors, the possession of the estates of Tuscany and Parma; a stipulation which, they said, would in all probability involve Great Britain in endless quarrels and disputes, about a country with which they had no concern. They affirmed, that the treaty of Seville, instead of confirming other treaties, was contradictory to the quadruple alliance, particularly in the introducing Spanish troops into Tuscany and Parma in the room of neutral forces, stipulated by the former alliance, and agreeing that they should remain there until Don Carlos and his successors should be secure and exempt from all hazards.

The court-party, on the other hand, insisted that there neither was nor could be any essential difference, if the emperor was sincerely and heartily disposed to fulfil the terms of the quadruple alliance, with regard to the eventual succession of the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia: that introducing Spanish instead of neutral troops into the garrisons of those dominions, could make no material difference, especially as the treaty had in the strongest manner stipulated the recalling those troops, as soon as the succession to the duchies, which was a main object of the quadruple alliance, should be secured: and finally, that though there was an immaterial difference, which might give umbrage to the court of Vienna, between the treaty in question and the quadruple alliance; yet the preservation of the tranquillity of Europe, and the obtaining satisfaction and security to our commerce, were considerations that ought infinitely to outweigh any apprehensions from a resentment that could be founded only on pride and ambition.

In answer to this plea of the ministerial advocates, it was observed by the opposition, first, that supposing this treaty so deviating from the former alliance, not to be prejudicial to the interests of his Imperial majesty, yet that the manner of making the alteration without his consent, and by way of triumph over him as a great stroke in politics, would be thought a reflection upon his honour at least, and must be attended with very fatal consequences. They likewise undertook to prove that the introduction of Spanish troops would be really prejudicial to the emperor and the empire, even according to the method of reasoning adopted by the advocates for this measure, they having plainly intimated that the design of the Seville treaty was to restrain the emperor's power in Italy; and consequently it was his interest to defeat that design, however it might be the interest of others to put it in execution. They observed furthermore, that this avowed end of the Seville treaty was aggravated by another, which had likewise been cried up by the friends of the minister as a master-piece of politics, namely, the separation of Spain from the emperor, and thereby dissolving the Vienna alliance, which had been represented so advantageous to the latter. Did not this, they asked, affect the interests of his Imperial majesty? or could it be reasonably expected that he would not resent it?

The country party went still farther, and shewed that the variation from neutral to Spanish troops (without insisting on the affront, or having any regard to the Vienna alliance) was highly prejudicial both to the emperor and the empire; for the neutral troops stipulated by the quadruple alliance, were designed not only to leave the eventual succession of Don Carlos, but likewise the rights of sovereignty established in the emperor and empire over these states. Now this part of the condition was entirely reversed by the variation in dispute. To this it was added, that his Imperial majesty appeared very plainly to look upon the introduction of Spanish troops in this light, by refusing to consent to it, whilst he was under so beneficial an alliance with Spain, and even suffering himself to be disunited from that crown rather than comply.

They observed farther, that the Spaniards were so far from having renounced their pretensions to Gibraltar and Minorca, or recognized our right to the possession of them, that they are not so much as mentioned in the treaty; a plain indication that the court of Spain would not admit of any words therein which might annihilate their pretensions, and never did design to include our possession of that place in their general guaranty of "all his majesty's kingdoms, states, and dominions."

The lords on the side of the ministry exerted their utmost endeavours to baffle the arguments of their adversaries on this last very popular objection: they observed, that the Spaniards never could, even while on the best terms with the English, be brought to relinquish their right to Jamaica, which notwithstanding the English continued to possess unquestioned and uninterrupted. They said, that the strongest renunciations would be invalid, should the Spaniards ever be in a condition to dispute the English property in those places that England had conquered from the crown of Spain; and therefore to have insisted upon an absolute formal renunciation would not only have been altogether needless, but, in case of the Spaniards refusing it, would have even weakened our title to these places, besides hazarding the whole success of the negotiation, which they maintained to be highly for the honour, as well as interest, of Great Britain.

Such was the substance of the arguments for and against the peace, in which the most able and plausible speakers on both sides displayed all their talents for elocution. The public, however, and particularly the commercial part of it, appeared to be strongly prepossessed against the treaty. The lord Bathurst now moved for a resolution, "That the agreement in the treaty of Seville, to effectuate the introduction of Spanish troops into Tuscany and Parma, is a manifest violation of the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, tends to involve the nation in a dangerous and expensive war, and to destroy the balance of Europe." After some debate the question was put upon the motion, and it was resolved in the negative. The like fate attended two other motions; the one, to resolve, "That Great Britain's right of sovereignty, dominion, possession, and claim to Gibraltar and Minorca, is not ascertained by the treaty of Seville, so as to extinguish the claims and pretensions set up by the Spaniards, which were followed by an actual siege since the cession of those valuable places by the treaty of Utrecht:" and the other, "That the stipulations in the treaty of Seville, for repairing the losses of our merchants, are insufficient and precarious."

Then it was proposed by some of the lords in the majority to resolve, "That the treaty of peace, union, and friendship, (for such was its title) concluded at Seville the ninth of November last, N. S. doth contain all necessary stipulations for maintaining and securing the honour, dignity, rights, and possessions of the crown; and that all due care is taken therein for the support of the trade of the kingdom, and for repairing the losses suffered by the merchants*." After the debate, the question was put upon the said motion, and it was resolved in the affirmative; upon which several lords entered their protest against it, with their reasons at large, which made great impressions on the body of the people. It must be owned, at the same time, that those impressions were in a great measure strengthened by the weakness of the ministerial advocates without doors, who in general were the most contemptible writers that money or favour could be thrown away upon.

While the before-mentioned topics were agitating in the house of peers, the anti courtiers among the commons suspecting that the ministry were playing some hidden game, moved for an address to his majesty, entreating him "to communicate to his parliament any engagements he might have contracted for the payment of subsidies to foreign princes, or the hire of foreign troops, which had not been laid before them." This motion was treated by the courtiers as highly indecent, and implying a mean suspicion of his majesty; and upon the question being put, it was thrown out, by a majority of two hundred against one hundred and seven. And here I must once for all observe, that the ministry treated the opposition within doors as superciliously as they did that without. Secure of their own numbers in the house of commons, they seldom entered into that length or solemnity of debate which was necessary, either for the conviction or conversion of those who opposed them from principle. In short, matters were carried rather by dividing than debating. This conduct gave great and reasonable disgust to many noblemen and gentlemen of great credit and influence, who resented it by voting against the ministry; and their example served not a little to rivet in the minds of the people the unfavourable impressions they had imbibed of the court measures.

In the mean while, his Imperial majesty was so far from looking upon the introduction of Spanish garrisons into Tuscany and Parma as a trifling variation from the quadruple alliance, according to the doctrine of the British minister and his friends, that he resented both the matter and the manner of it in the strongest terms, as a downright infraction of treaties, derogatory to his honour, and dangerous to his interests, as well as the rights of the empire. Such at least was the purport of numberless rescripts and remonstrances with which he filled all Europe, Germany especially. Nor did the court of Vienna content themselves with shewing their resentment in words and appearances only, but actually made preparations for pouring a large army into Italy, with orders to oppose the execution of the treaty of Seville; but being in want of money, they set on foot a negotiation for a loan in England of four hundred thousand pounds, this being the only country where they could raise money, as the great subsidies which they used to receive from Spain were now cut off.

Our ministry were very justly alarmed at a negotiation of this kind: they set all their strength to frustrate its success, and a bill of a very extraordinary nature was brought into the house of commons, "to prohibit his majesty's subjects to lend any sum of money to any foreign prince, state, or potentate, without licence first obtained from his majesty, under his privy-seal, or some greater authority." This, however, was not to extend to prohibit any subscription to the public funds or trading companies of foreign kingdoms.

On the second reading of this bill Mr. Daniel Pulteney, a gentleman deservedly esteemed the first in commercial talents and ability amongst the anti-ministerial party, spoke against it in very strong terms. He said, that it would make Holland the market of Europe, and the mart of money to the nations of the continent: that the article of lending money was so advantageous, that the Dutch, when themselves were engaged in a war with the Spaniards, who treated them as rebels, lent money, arms, and ammunition, to the enemy. He said, that this bill would disable the British merchants from lending money to the king of Portugal, a restriction that might be attended with very bad consequences to the nation: that the act, in any event, armed the ministry with too great and too extensive a power; and that while the licensing power remained in the crown, the licences would be issued through the hands of the minister, who by that means might put into his pocket many thousands a year. He observed, that while this bill restrained the merchants from assisting the princes and powers of Europe, it permitted the stock-jobbers to trade in their funds without interruption. "I know very well, said Mr. Pulteney, for whose benefit this complaisance is designed; but jobbing abroad in the stocks of foreign nations is what we should least encourage, and what we ought principally to prohibit; for we have suffered severely by that means already, and our ministry would never give us relief nor assistance."

Sir Robert Walpole and his friends finding themselves closely pushed by these arguments, contented themselves with resting the merit of the bill entirely upon the necessity at this particular juncture. Mr. Barnard, afterwards the famous sir John Barnard, a merchant of London, who perfectly understood trade in all its branches, after having explained his reasons, declared he would never consent to a bill which he deemed a violation of our fundamental laws, and a grievous hardship on individuals. He then proposed an exception, by which the prohibition should be restricted to the emperor alone, without extending to other powers. The bill, however, was vindicated by sir Robert Walpole, Mr. Pelham, and sir Philip Yorke, attorney-general; and being supported by the whole weight of ministerial influence, not only passed through the house, but was afterwards enacted into a law.

The commons having examined the estimates for the ensuing year, voted seventeen thousand seven hundred and nine men for the land-service: they continued the subsidies to the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel and the duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbittel; and, in order to defray these and other necessary expences, they granted the sum of 2,280,000 l. These measures were strongly opposed by the anti-courtiers, who made several motions which they knew, if agreed to, would render the minister uneasy; and, if rejected, would make him unpopular. The principal of these was on occasion of the land-forces being voted, and was as follows: "That an address be delivered to his majesty, humbly to represent, that the house having, in consideration of the present state of affairs, voted such a number of land-forces for the current service of the year, assure themselves that his majesty, from his just regard to the constitution of the kingdom, as well as his earnest desire to ease his people of every charge not absolutely necessary, will take the first opportunity to make a farther reduction of those forces, if the state of affairs will admit, before the conclusion of this or the beginning of next session of parliament." This motion however was rejected without a division.

Another motion was made about the same time which gave the ministry no little uneasiness, as it was the most popular that had been levelled against them during the whole session. It was a motion to bring in a bill "for making more effectual the laws in being for disabling persons from being chosen members of parliament who had any pension, during pleasure, or for any number of years, or any office held in trust for them, from the crown." We have already taken notice of the principal arguments that may be urged on both sides of this important question; suffice it at present to observe, that the following oath, to be taken by every member of the house, was proposed as a wise and necessary precaution:

"I A. B. do solemnly swear that I have not, directly nor indirectly, any pension, during pleasure, or for a number of years; or any office, either in whole or in part, from the crown, held for me or for my benefit, by any person whatsoever: and I do solemnly and sincerely promise and swear, that I will not receive, accept, or take, directly or indirectly, during the time of my being a member of this present parliament, any pension during pleasure, or for any number of years, or any gratuity or reward whatsoever, or any office from the crown, to be held for me, or for my benefit, in whole or in part, by any person whatsoever, without signifying the same to this house, within fourteen days after I have received or accepted the same, if the parliament be then sitting, or within fourteen fourteen days after the next meeting of parliament."

The violation of this oath was to be deemed wilful and corrupt perjury, and punished as such; and the seats of all members refusing to take it were to be vacated, as if they had been actually dead. A penalty of thirty pounds was inflicted upon every member for every day he should sit in the house without taking the oath, besides an incapacity ever after, either to serve the crown, or sit in parliament, or enjoy any place of profit or trust under his majesty or his successors.

Such was the substance of this famous self-denying bill, which has been so often renewed since, but never enacted into a law. For this time, however, the country party carried their point in the house of commons. The cry of corruption was become so general, that many who were not heartily for the bill (which it must be confessed was liable to several exceptions, and could not, even if passed into an act, have fully answered the purpose intended) were yet induced to vote for its passing; while the minister, who had reason to believe it would never make its way through the upper house, did not exert himself to have it thrown out below; for the question was carried in favour of it by a majority of one hundred and forty-four against one hundred and thirty-four; and Mr. Sandys, sir Edward Stanley, and Mr. Wyndham, were ordered to bring it into the house, through which it passed with very little difficulty.

When it was presented in the upper house, its friends moved for an address to the king, desiring a list of the pensions payable by the crown; but the motion was thrown out by a great majority. The bill being afterwards read (on the twenty-first of March) and the question being put, whether it should be committed? it passed in the negative, after a long debate; upon which a protest was entered by twenty-six peers. Another question was then put, that the bill be rejected; which being carried in the affirmative, produced a protest that was adhered to by the same number of peers as above.

In the course of this session the parliament passed several acts which, under a more popular ministry, would have met with great and deserved applause. They appropriated one million of the surplusage arising from the Sinking Fund, towards the discharge of the national debt; and by another act extinguished the duties upon salt; by which expedient the subject was eased of a heavy burden, not only in being freed from the duty, but also from a considerable charge of salaries given to a great number of officers employed to collect this tax.

They likewise encouraged the colony of Carolina with an act allowing the inhabitants of that province to export rice directly to any port of Europe southward of Cape Finisterre, provided the trade was carried on in British bottoms; and they permitted salt from Europe to be imported into the colony of New York. Several other acts were also passed; some of which being of great national importance, we cannot close the proceedings of this session without taking particular notice of them.

Among others, a most excellent law was enacted for the better regulation of juries. Before this time it was a reproach to the English law, that no provision was made to oblige men of substance effectually to serve as jurymen; for which reason it was very common for persons of property to shift that office from themselves upon indigent people, which opened an alarming field for corruption in capital cases, where the delinquents were monied men. But this act remedies all these inconveniences; for,

It requires "the petty constables to make up true lists of the persons qualified to serve on juries within their parishes or precincts; and to prevent frauds herein, the said lists are to be fixed on the church-doors twenty days before Michaelmas every year, for the inspection of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, who may make their objections. The more effectually to exclude needy persons from this office, a jurymen must be a freeholder or copyholder of at least ten pounds per annum in England, and six pounds in Wales, or a leaseholder for life of the yearly value of twenty pounds. These lists being transmitted to the sheriff, he is to return no others upon juries but those whose names are found there; and to prevent the jurymen being summoned oftener than is reasonable (to the hindrance of their respective businesses or occupations) no person is obliged to serve oftener than once in two years, except in the small county of Rutland. When the assize is held, the name of each person summoned and impanelled is to be written, with his addition and place of abode, in distinct pieces of parchment or paper, rolled up in the same manner, as like each other as may be; which names are to be put into a box or glass; and when a cause is brought to be tried, some indifferent person, in open court, is to take out twelve of these parchment or paper-billets, one after another; and if any of the persons drawn do not appear, or is challenged or set aside, then a farther number, till twelve be drawn who shall appear, and shall be the jury to try the cause; after which those names are to be mixed again with the other, and a new jury is to be appointed for the next cause in the same manner."

From this excellent act two very essential benefits arise to the subject; for it becomes impossible to pack or corrupt a jury, because no man knows who will try the cause till the moment the jurymen are sworn; and the freeholders, &c. will be obliged to give attendance, because none can tell whether his name will be amongst those that are drawn out: in which case, if the person does not appear, after being three times called upon in court, he is liable to a fine of forty shillings, and five pounds, at the discretion of the judge.

Another act passed this session, which was also greatly in favour of the subject. It was, "An act for explaining and amending an act made in the last session of parliament, entitled, An act for the relief of debtors, with respect to the imprisonment of their persons." By this act debtors might be carried to the nearest great assize, in order to be cleared; whereas, by the former law, they were obliged to be brought up to Westminster-hall to be cleared, however distant their place of residence might be therefrom. And whereas officers were, by the former act, restrained from carrying persons arrested to prison till the expiration of twenty-four hours after the arrest, which several persons taking taking the advantage of, and refusing to be carried to any house whatever, had made their escapes in the night; it is now ordered that such arrested persons shall be carried to some house of safety; but the choice of the house is left to them, to prevent their being hurried to spunging-houses, and such-like places*.

An attempt was made this session of parliament to throw open the East India trade. As this is also an object of great national concern, I shall give an account of the proceedings therein at large; and the rather, as Great Britain this year was remarkably barren of any other transactions of moment worthy a place in history.

The English East India company's term for the redemption of their capital and of their exclusive trade being near its expiration (viz. on three years notice from Lady-day 1733) a powerful and strenuous opposition to its renewal or prolongation was at this time raised by several merchants, and others, who wanted to be incorporated and vested in the same trade; and who, foreseeing that the company would apply to the legislature for a longer time in their exclusive privileges, determined to be beforehand with them; and therefore, on the ninth of April, 1730, they presented to the house of commons their petition and proposals, as follow.

They offered to advance 3,200,000 pounds for redeeming the fund of the company, by five several payments; the last to be at Lady-day 1733, to be allowed an interest of four per cent. till the last-named term, and only two per cent. from and after that term. Provided,

"I. That they might be incorporated, and in all respects vested with all the exclusive privileges and trade of that company; yet so as not to trade in one joint stock, or in their corporate capacity; but that the trade should be free and open to all his majesty's subjects, who should pay one per cent. of the value of their exports to India, in consideration of their taking out a licence from this proposed corporation.

"II. That this trade be solely carried on from the port of London.

"III. That this proposed company's term be thirty-one years, and to be redeemed on three years notice.

"IV. That moreover, for enabling this proposed corporation to defray the expence of forts and settlements in India, as well as the preservation and enlargement of the trade, they may be empowered to levy a duty of five per cent. on the gross value of all the merchandize which shall be imported from India."

As this petition was not only of an interesting, but of a national nature, it greatly engaged the attention of the house. Alderman Barnard, and other eminent merchants, members of the house, supported this petition by several very plausible arguments. They observed, that great benefits would accrue to the public by accepting the proposal of the petitioners; for by the petitioners taking but two per cent. interest on three millions two hundred thousand pounds after a limited time, an annuity of ninety-two thousand pounds would be added to the Sinking Fund, which, at twenty-five years purchase, was worth two millions five hundred thousand pounds to the public. They said, that the laying the trade open to East India, or the reducing it into a kind of regulated company, would, among many other advantages, necessarily occasion a larger exportation of our own product and manufactures to India; employ a much greater number of ships and seamen; greatly lower the prices of all East India commodities consumed at home; enable us to supply foreign markets cheaper, and in greater quantities, with Indian merchandize, whereby new branches of traffic might be opened, as well in Africa and America as in some parts of Europe; that hereby the customs and excise revenues would be greatly increased, and, in consequence, the national debt lessened. They alleged, (but gave no particular reason for such allegation) that great advantages might accrue by employing our shipping in freights from one part of India to another, more than the present company had ever been able to do; and, lastly, they observed, it would prevent persons acquainted with the trade of India from being under the necessity, for want of employment here, of seeking it in foreign nations; and would even bring home those who were already engaged in that way. This alluded to certain Englishmen engaged in the Ostend and Swedish East India companies. These were the plausible and principal arguments made use of to the legislature without doors, which were yet more abundantly amplified and improved without, in pamphlets and news-papers, which carried them, as is usually the case, much beyond rational probability.

We shall now, in justice to the present East India company, exhibit the principal points urged by them, by way of reply, in their own behalf. In the first place, they observed, that it seemed at present to be agreed on all sides, that the East India trade was a beneficial one to this nation, and consequently necessary to be preserved; but that the main question is, which is the best method to preserve it to us? viz. Whether by a company vested with exclusive privileges and regulations, such as the legislature shall from time to time direct? or, Whether the trade shall be left quite open to any adventurer who shall pay for a licence from the company? They observed, that the present opposition to the company proceeded in a great measure from the great gains which the company make, as their enemies do not pretend to have any thing to allege against their conduct, at least for the last forty years.

The company, said they, at present employ a vast stock in trade; their sales amount to about three millions yearly; and the customs accruing to the public are immensely great, and answer the appropriations made of them by parliament better than most other duties, they being in neat money, clear of all drawbacks and debentures, three hundred thousand pounds yearly. To prove this, they laid before the parliament on this occasion an account, shewing the amount of the value of goods, merchandize, and bullion, exported by their company from the port of London, from Christmas 1720 to Christmas 1727, and of the goods and merchandize imported by the said company from Christmas 1722 to Christmas 1729. A copy of this account the reader will find in the note at the bottom of this page *, by which he will be enabled to form some idea of the importance of this trade. It was then asked, Would it be prudent in the legislature to suffer these customs to fall without a certainty of at least as much in the room of them?

The company next proceeded to show that the forts and factories cost them three hundred thousand pounds yearly; and doubtless, they said, the government could not maintain them for so little. These forts, and other buildings, they said, were unquestionably the present company's property, who actually purchased them of the old company, and were of great value: who then should set an equitable price on them? What certainty had the government, when they might be in their hands, that the proposed open trade will be always sufficient to maintain so vast an expence of customs and forts as six hundred thousand pounds yearly? For as every person is by the proposed scheme left at liberty (and will doubtless make use of it) to trade or not to trade thither, as it may suit his interest, it may happen that one year there may go fifty ships for India, and another year perhaps not five: and these being all separate traders, the government could have no certainty nor security from them, nor indeed from any other but an incorporated body, who have a great deal to lose, and who are able to bear the ill fortune of some particular years trading, without presently laying it aside.

It was furthermore asserted, that by the separate traders outbidding one another in India, for the sake of dispatch, the prices of goods there would be raised so high at length, as not to be worth the buying; and for the same reason at home, they could so undersell each other, till the goods would not be worth selling: that an united company will always be more diligent to watch the encroachments and attempts of other European nations in India, than separate traders will or can be, whose views naturally are contracted within the narrow circle of their own private interest alone.

To sum up the matter: the managers for the company told the house, that although the company had a claim to a perpetuity in this trade by the act of the tenth of queen Anne; yet some doubts having arisen touching the certainty of this right, because that act only repeats the provision in former acts, which directed, "That the privileges of trade should cease when the fund should be redeemed;" but does not explicitly enact a perpetuity of trade to this company, in the same terms as the act of that same session expressly does in favour of the South-sea company; the East India company being unwilling that their title to this trade (however strong) should prove the occasion of disputes hereafter, therefore consent to take up with a temporary certainty in lieu thereof, and moreover to give the public almost four hundred thousand pounds for the same, by paying down two hundred thousand pounds in money, and farther consenting that their annuity of five per cent. which is not redeemable till the year 1736, be now reduced to four per cent. whereby they give up an annuity of thirty-two thousand pounds for six years to come, the value of which is one hundred and ninety-two thousand pounds.

Some other less important arguments were at this time advanced on both sides, which I shall not particularize. To conclude, the minister, who had great connections with the East India company, had been at vast pains to inform himself of the nature of the trade, and was, from the best accounts he could receive, convinced that it could be carried on only by an exclusive charter; he therefore heartily engaged in the cause of the company. And indeed the majority in the house of commons appear to have been on this occasion unbiasedly of the minister's opinion; for after very long and solemn debates, they rejected the above-recited petition of the merchants against the prolongation of the East India company's privileges: as likewise two others; one from the city of Bristol, the other from the port of Liverpool, to the same purport; and passed the bill in the company's favour, which afterwards received the royal assent, by the title of "An act for reducing the annuity or fund of the united East India company, and for ascertaining their right of trade to the East Indies, and the continuance of their corporation for that purpose:" whereby, after a full recital of former statutes and charters, the company agrees, and it is enacted, "That their present yearly fund of one hundred and sixty thousand pounds be reduced to one hundred and twenty-eight thousand pounds, or from five to four per cent. from Michaelmas 1730; in consideration whereof, and of two hundred thousand pounds to be paid by them for the public service of this present year (1730) all their exclusive privileges of trade to the East Indies are continued and prolonged, from Lady-day 1736 to Lady-day 1766, and three years notice then to be given, in all, including the said three years notice to Lady-day 1769, being thirty-three years, when, on repayment of their entire capital of three millions two hundred thousand pounds, their exclusive privilege of trade shall cease and determine; yet nevertheless the company shall continue as a corporation for ever, to enjoy the East India trade in common with all other subjects.

We have been the fuller here on the objections against this company, because the objections again started in the year 1754, and renewed at this present time in certain pamphlets and news-papers, with a view to the like private ends, are the very same as above, with some additional ones indeed, drawn from the prodigious territorial acquisitions of the company in India within these three or four last years. The subject, however, has been so long canvassed by men of judgment and experience, that there is no room left to say any thing material now on the subject, and therefore I here close it once for all, nor shall I enlarge thereon in any future part of this history.

The royal African company declining more and more, so as not to be able to support their forts and factories on the coast of Africa, and the trade being thereby laid open so as to endanger them, the British parliament in this same year granted ten thousand pounds for that purpose, by an act for raising five hundred and fifty thousand pounds by Exchequer-bills, &c. which sum of ten thousand pounds was granted by parliament annually, till the year 1744, when, by reason of the war with France and Spain, twenty thousand pounds were granted for that end; the two following years ten thousand pounds were again granted annually for the same purpose; but nothing was granted for the year 1747.

In this same year the South-sea company's great ship Prince Frederic, which had been so long detained at La Vera Cruz, in the Spanish West Indies, occasioned by the differences between Great Britain and Spain, arrived safe in the Thames, laden for that company's account with four hundred thousand dollars, or Spanish pieces of eight, in specie; one hundred and ninety thousand pounds weight of cochineal*; forty-seven thousand pounds weight of indigo; and one hundred and sixty-seven tons weight of logwood; besides what came in private trade; supposed altogether to be worth three hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling.

On the fifteenth of May the king went to the house of peers, and closed the session with a speech, which concluded with the following remarkable words:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am very glad that, for the general satisfaction, you entered into a particular consideration of the state of the nation; and it is a great happiness to see, after so many unjust and unreasonable clamours, raised with all possible art, industry, and malice, that upon mature deliberation, and the most solemn debates, you were so far from finding any thing worthy of blame or censure, that all matters that came under your cognizance met with your approbation.

"This must inspire all mankind with a just detestation of those incendiaries who, from a spirit of envy and discontent, continually labour, by scandalous libels, to alienate the affections of my people, and to fill their minds with groundless jealousies and unjust complaints, in dishonour of me and my government, and in defiance of the sense of both houses of parliament.

"But I entirely rely upon your prudence and your concern for the peace and happiness of your country, to discountenance all such seditious practices, and to make my people sensible, that these wicked proceedings have no other view and end than to create confusion and distraction amongst us."

The parliament was then prorogued to the fourteenth of July.

I have already observed, that no transaction of any great moment passed in Great Britain this year. Seven chiefs of the Cherokee nation of Indians in America were brought to England by sir Alexander Cumin, and introduced to the king, at whose feet they laid their crown and regalia, and by an authentic deed acknowledged themselves subject to his dominion, in the name of all their countrymen, who had vested them with full powers for this purpose. They gave their assent in the most solemn manner to articles of friendship and commerce proposed to them by the government; and being loaded with presents suitable to their taste and inclination, were reconveyed to their own country.

England was at this period terribly infested with robbers, assassins, and incendiaries; the natural consequences of degeneracy, corruption, and the want of police in the interior government of the kingdom; in which last article the ministry were certainly unaccountably remiss. A new species of villainy now started up; a set of miscreants made a practice of circulating letters, demanding sums of money from persons, on pain of having their houses burnt down to the ground, and consequently themselves and families ruined. In one instance, they had the impudent barbarity to put these threats in execution, by setting fire to the house of a rich merchant of Bristol, who had refused to comply with their demands. In short, the peculiar depravity of the times became at length so alarming, that the government was obliged to interpose, and a considerable reward was offered for discovering the ruffians concerned in such execrable practices.

In the course of this year the common-council of the city of London agreed that all the fines arising from those persons who were nominated sheriffs, and declined that office, should be appropriated for building a mansion-house for the lord-mayors of the city.

The hospital of St. Bartholomew being taken down in order to be re-built, the foundation-stone was laid by sir Richard Brocas, lord-mayor, on the ninth of July this year.

On the twenty-first of January, 1731, the parliament met, when his majesty, in his speech at the opening of the session, told them, that the present critical juncture seemed in a very particular manner to deserve their attention: that as the transactions then depending in the several courts of Europe were upon the point of being determined, the great event of peace or war might

* Mr. Anderson, author of a judicious and elaborate Treatise on Commerce, lately published, tells us, that so unusual a quantity of cochineal induced him to take with him two physicians down to the company's vaults, whereby they were perfectly satisfied that this drug is an insect, in all respects the same with our lady-bird; and that it was purely by that insect's feeding on the fine red juice or sap of the Mexico shrub or tree, called the Prickly Pear, that it acquired its superior excellence, agreeable to what had been before asserted by several authors. Anderson, vol. II. p. 326.

be much affected by their first resolutions, which were expected by different powers with great impatience. He said, the continuance of that zeal and vigour with which they had hitherto supported him and his engagements, must at this time be of the greatest weight and importance, both with regard to his allies, and to those who might be disposed before the season of action to prevent, by an accommodation, the fatal consequences of a general rupture.

When the commons returned to their house, a motion was made for a loyal address to his majesty, by Mr. Campbel of Pembroke-shire; but the anti-courtiers insisted on restricting it to a simple promise to assist him only in such measures as should be absolutely necessary for procuring satisfaction to his allies, and providing for the interests of his people, expressing at the same time their hopes that his majesty would take care to prevent the breaking out of a war upon the Rhine or in the Austrian Netherlands; the preservation of which, in the hands that now held them, was of the greatest importance to these kingdoms, and the maintenance of which had cost the nation so much blood and treasure.

In support of this allegation the country party alleged, that the power of France was dangerous to the liberties, not only of England, but of all Europe: that evidence could be produced of that court having suffered the harbour of Dunkirk to be cleared and repaired, in direct violation of the treaty of Utrecht: that they had made great encroachments upon the English in the West Indies, the natural consequences of those pernicious connections which we had lately contracted with them: that for England to join with France in an attempt against the emperor, either in Flanders or upon the Rhine, would be acting against the very intention of that glorious confederacy which had humbled the power of France during the reign of queen Anne: that it would destroy that balance of power which had been so happily established, and had been the chief advantage that England or Europe had derived from that confederacy: that in any event it was extremely dangerous and inexpedient to promise, the very first day of the session, to support all his majesty's measures and engagements, before they knew what they were: and that, in fact, such an assurance rendered all their future deliberations fruitless and insignificant.

The minister and his friends found themselves hard pressed by these popular arguments: however, they endeavoured to shew that the worst consequences, both at home and abroad, might arise from this amendment being approved, since it would carry an implication of his majesty's intending something that was not necessary for the interest of England, or agreeable to the principles of public liberty; an insinuation which could not fail of discouraging the friends of the protestant succession at home, and animating their enemies abroad; and therefore the house ought to trust to his majesty's wonted prudence: and, finally, that the inserting such expressions in the address would have the appearance of encroaching on the royal prerogative, and dictating to his majesty in the operations of the ensuing war.

To this the members of the opposition replied, by asking how, if the French should be successful in making acquisitions from the emperor in Flanders, or upon the Rhine, which must be extremely prejudicial to public liberty, the king could, with all the power the parliament could give him, prevent the fatal consequences that must ensue?

Lord Hervey, eldest son to the earl of Bristol, who by this time began to make some figure in the house, and was a fast friend of the minister, took notice, in answer to the objections of the opposition, that the house of Austria, as well as that of Bourbon, might by its ambition destroy that balance of power which was so justly dear to England. He said, the conduct of the French at this time had nothing alarming in it: that he thought it would be highly absurd to pull down the house of Bourbon to raise that of Austria into the power of acting in the same manner the other had done: and that he entertained not the least doubt that his majesty had interest enough with his allies to establish a confederacy to oppose any measures that the court of France might adopt prejudicial to the desired equilibrium of power. As to the proposed alteration, he said, should it be adopted, this would be in fact proclaiming to all Europe that the emperor was left to act as he pleased; and if the allies should agree that he was not to be attacked on the Rhine or in the Netherlands, the king of Great Britain and his allies might as well submit at once to receive laws from the imperial court.

This debate, which was long and warmly agitated on both sides, ended in the address being voted in its original form; and such another, preceded by the like contest (headed by lord Carteret, who had now joined the country-party) was carried in the house of lords.

The anti-courtiers, however, resolved once more to revive the pension-bill. The motion was introduced with great solemnity by Mr. Shippen, and the bill made its way with very little difficulty through the commons; but when it was sent up to the lords, it was, as before, by them rejected. On this occasion Dr. Sherlock, then bishop of Bangor, who was among those who opposed it, made a speech on the occasion, by which he incurred a great load of popular odium. After advancing a great number of arguments, in which he endeavoured to demonstrate that this bill had a very bad tendency, he concludes with the following remarkable words: "Though this bill at first might seem to be a self-denying act, and to some particular members may perhaps prove so; yet the commons, considered as an house of parliament, will find in it, no doubt, a very great enlargement of power; and whatever tends to break the balance between the powers essential to this constitution, must sooner or later prove the ruin of the whole. An independent house of commons, or an independent house of lords, is as inconsistent with our constitution, as an independent, that is, an absolute king; and whoever loves the liberties and laws of his country, will no more desire to see the one than the other. Let bribery be punished; let corruption be punished; but let us not give so much strength to one part of the constitution as shall make it able to overpower the rest."

This speech was industriously circulated through the kingdom by the country-party, with their own notes and commentaries upon it; in which they endeavoured to prove, that his lordship only spoke the the sentiments of the minister, who had formed a subtle design to overturn the constitution, by destroying the independency of the two houses of parliament. It must be confessed that the prelate made use of a very unlucky phrase, though perhaps not in the sense that his adversaries applied to it.

The minority seeing every question carried almost without a division by the minister and his adherents, began to grow uneasy at the remissness of their friends, who did not give a proper attendance; and as of themselves they had no method of compelling them thereto sooner than their own convenience suited, this occasioned a new and diverting scheme of compulsion. A call of the house being ordered and held, two members, who were considered as of the country party, were, for non-attendance, moved by their friends to be taken into custody. The court-party, however, interfered warmly in their behalf, and they were excused: the same indulgence was extended to several others; some on account of their indisposition, others on pretence of their being on the road. This conduct of the court was certainly very ill judged, as it was against the most established rules of parliament, since the attendance of every member in the house is to be considered not as optional, but as a matter of indispensable duty. Besides, they constitute a part of the great council of the nation; and therefore the sovereign has an indubitable right, by the constitution of England, to insist that the full complement of his counsellors should attend his service, upon the high and arduous matters that come before the parliament, relating to the public. The courtiers themselves seem to have been sensible of their indiscretion; for, in order to compromise the matter, they agreed to the appointing of certain days, within which the absentees should attend; and upon neglect they were to be committed to the custody of the serjeant at arms attending the house.

This great preparation on the part of the minority was intended to strengthen a second attack they meditated upon the establishment of the Hessian troops in British pay; for after the house had been furnished with all necessary papers, a motion was made for referring the estimate of the twelve thousand Hessian troops to the committee of supply. This motion begat a very warm debate; and as there is somewhat new, and worthy of particular notice, in the following arguments, I shall introduce them here, for the reader's amusement. Mr. Daniel Pulteney, though a staunch Whig in his heart, yet on this occasion adopted a maxim of the Tories, which had not been heard of since the death of queen Anne. He said, that wars had happened on the continent of Europe, of which, tho' foreign to the interests of England, she had borne the expence. It was urged in reply to this, that commerce had connected England with the continent, though nature had disjoined her from it: that the English, by their influence on the affairs of the continent, had acquired many advantages in trade; and, in order to maintain these, they were sometimes obliged to interfere in foreign quarrels: that some of the countries of Europe, which consumed a great many of the English commodities, had so little communication with the sea, that they were inaccessible to our fleets; and therefore, if they laid the trade of the English under any hardships or inconveniences, or offered them any insults or indignities, the English had no other means of asserting their rights, or recovering their wrongs, than by employing some of the powerful states upon the continent to wreak their resentment: that this had frequently been found a very useful expedient to England; but that she could not any longer avail herself of it than while she was ready, in her turn, to perform the more friendly offices to these potentates. They alleged, that it was upon this very principle that the treaty of Hanover was concluded, and the Hessian troops were taken into British pay; and that those two measures had prevented the fatal effects which might have attended the ambition and obstinacy of the emperor: that upon the same principle likewise was founded the treaty of Seville, which, by our engaging for the introduction of six thousand Spanish troops into Italy, had effectually detached Spain from the emperor: that the latter, however, had filled Italy with his armies, in order to prevent the introduction of these garrisons. The Hessians, who were in our pay, it was said, were the only curbs the emperor had in Germany; consequently, that the dismissal of these forces at present would leave him at liberty to kindle a flame in Europe, which might cost Great Britain many millions to extinguish. Such were the arguments that determined this parliament to continue the establishment of the Hessian troops, as likewise the subsidy of the duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbützel*.

The two parties were at this time exasperated against each other to the highest degree of animosity and resentment. The court-writers charged the minority with sedition and defamation, and with employing every art that could alienate the nation from his majesty's person and government. The minority replied to this in several public papers and pamphlets, especially in one, entitled, The Country Journal, or, The Craftsman; by Caleb D'Anvers, Esq. a paper that soon discovered itself to be immediately directed against the minister. Lord Bolingbroke (whom Dr. Swift calls the greatest genius in Europe) and Mr. W. Pulteney were immediately suspected to be concerned in it; but the care of publishing it, and supplying it with materials, when none were communicated, was intrusted to Mr. Nicholas Amherst, formerly of St. John's College, Oxford, from whence he was said to have been expelled for his satirical wit, which he dealt about rather too freely upon his superiors. His writings on different subjects, both in prose and verse, had been very well received.

The minister, as I have already observed, was unpardonably negligent in his choice of writers: the best amongst them was Dr. Hare, bishop of Chichester, who wrote a vindication of the treaty of Hanover, under the title of "An enquiry into the reasons of the conduct of Great Britain, with regard to the present state of Europe:" in which he endeavoured to set forth the dangerous tendency of the first treaty of Vienna, and to prove from thence the absolute necessity of the counter-alliance formed at Hanover. This book seems to be written with a greater air of confidence, and intimate knowledge of facts which were a secret to the rest of mankind, than almost any other political piece that appeared during sir Robert Walpole's administration. Accordingly, it drew from the other side more answers, observations, and remarks, than perhaps were ever bestowed upon a single pamphlet.

The party-war was still carrying on with great acrimony on both sides, when the Remarks on the History of England began to be published about this time, under the name of Humphrey Oldcastle. The judges of writing were soon convinced, both from the stile of these Remarks, and the thorough knowledge of mankind discovered in them, that the author could be no other than lord Bolingbroke. The publication of them continued through this year, and to the twenty-second of May in the next, when that remarkable Craftsman came out, which contained the author's vindication of Mr. Pulteney and himself, and gave rise to more personal invective than had been common, or, perhaps, than was decent, in persons of such high rank and distinction.

But, previous to this, and during the present session of parliament, a quarrel happened between lord Hervey, then a member of the house of commons, and Mr. W. Pulteney, which occasioned a duel. The rise of this quarrel was as follows: A pamphlet had been published, it was thought, by the former, against the writers in the opposition, entitled, Sedition and Defamation displayed. In answer to which came out another, which the town ascribed to Mr. Pulteney, called, A proper Reply to a late scandalous Libel, entitled, Sedition, &c. As the author had used our nobleman with a pretty deal of contempt, it was on the presumption that Mr. Pulteney was the man, that his lordship sent him a challenge to meet him in the Green Park. They met accordingly; and several passes having been made on both sides, in which lord Hervey received two or three wounds, and Mr. Pulteney a slight one in his left hand, they closed in; and were disarmed by sir John Rushout and Henry Fox, esq. their friends who attended them. Such an affair as this could have no other tendency than to inflame all the adherents of the respective parties, and make them ready on the first occasion to expose private history, and whatever they knew or heard suggested of each other's characters.

It was about this time that two petitions were presented to the house of commons, representing the delays of justice occasioned by the use of the Latin tongue in proceedings at law. The first petition on this head came from Yorkshire; and the committee to whom they were referred, on Feb. 22, reported to the house, "That it appeared to them, that the proceedings in the law being in law-Latin, abbreviated and wrote in court-hands and characters, untintelligible, and not legible to the most part of the persons concerned, especially in criminal cases, were a great delay to justice, and occasioned most dangerous frauds: that special pleadings were very expensive, intricate, and dilatory, and highly prejudicial to the property of the subject: that the recovery of small debts, as the law was now practised, was so expensive, that many prudent people chose rather to lose their just dues than go to law for the recovery of them; a circumstance that tended to the destruction of credit, and the great detriment of trade: that the number of attornies admitted in the King's Bench amounted to eleven hundred and fifty-seven; and the number of those in the court of Common-pleas exceeded three thousand."

In consequence of this report, a bill was brought in for changing this practice complained of, and enacting, that all those processes and pleadings should be entered in the English language. Though one would imagine very little could be advanced against such a regulation, founded on the most obvious principles of common sense, the bill met with a warm opposition, on pretence that it would render useless the antient records which were written in that language, and introduce confusion and delay of justice, by altering the established form and method of pleadings. The bill however passed through both houses, and received the royal assent.

The Spaniards still continuing their depredations and cruelties in the West Indies, a great number of merchants, from different parts of the kingdom, presented petitions for redress to the house of commons, who referred them to the consideration of a grand committee. Their complaints, upon examination, appeared to be well-founded; whereupon a motion was made for an address to his majesty, desiring he would be graciously pleased to continue his endeavours to prevent such depredations for the future, and to procure full satisfaction for the damages already sustained, and to secure to the British subjects the full and uninterrupted exercise of their trade and navigation to and from the British colonies in America.

The opposition were by no means satisfied with this motion; they proposed an amendment to it, importing a desire that his majesty would take the most vigorous measures to procure satisfaction to our subjects for the losses they had sustained from the Spaniards, and to prevent the like insults for the future. In support of this amendment the party alleged, that there was very little probability that we should ever obtain any satisfaction from Spain by the means of negotiating; and that to delay matters any longer would, in fact, be giving up the British commerce in America: that the depredations complained of had been committed by virtue of express orders from the court of Spain, whose whole conduct evinced an intention to drive the English entirely out of the West Indies. Mr. Pulteney, sir W. Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Barnard were the principal speakers in this part of the debate.

They were answered by sir Robert Walpole, Mr. Pelham, and sir William Yonge, who urged, that the first proposed address was all that the house could properly, prudentially, or with any degree of decency, lay before the throne, in which the undoubted power of making peace or war was constitutionally vested. Sir Robert Walpole said, that orders had been sent by the court of Spain to their governors to put a stop to those depredations; and that his Catholic majesty having, in fact, by the treaty of Seville, engaged to make good the losses sustained by the British subjects from the Spaniards in America, it was evident that he could have no thought of a scheme of expulsion, as had been men-mentioned by the gentlemen who were for the amendment. It was moreover alleged, that the captures since the treaty of Seville had been very few, and those doubtful cases; and insisted, that before the house advised his majesty to proceed to hostilities, they should be very sure that the complaints on which they founded such a resolution were uncontrovertible; which could not be done, they said, without hearing both parties, whereas only one as yet had been heard. After a great debate, the amendment was rejected, and the address presented in its original form.

Great part of this session was taken up in relieving the subject from the abuses of the law, as also from the exorbitant and unreasonable rates exacted by the charitable corporation from the industrious poor, for the money they supplied them with upon goods pledged, &c. This affair was referred to a committee; and after proper examination of persons and papers, it appeared that the corporation had taken, for large sums they had lent, ten per cent. under colour and pretence of reasonable costs and charges: upon which a bill was brought into the house, and afterwards passed, for regulating the lending of money upon pledges, and for preventing usury and extortion.

The merchants trading to the British sugar-colonies, and the planters, having petitioned the house of commons, complaining against the British continent American colonies †, “for their carrying on a trade with the foreign sugar-colonies of the French and Dutch, from whence they were supplied with sugar, rum, molasses, &c. instead of those of our own sugar-colonies, as well as with foreign European goods and manufactures, contrary to the tenor or intention of the laws in being, and of the fifth article of the treaty between king James II. and the French king in the year 1686: and they alleged, that as this new method of trade (first begun to be complained of in the year 1715) increased and enriched the colonies of other nations, so it was injurious to the trade of this kingdom, and greatly impoverished the British sugar colonies; and therefore praying relief therein.” Whereupon a committee was appointed, upon whose report a bill was brought in, and passed the house of commons, “For the better securing and increasing the trade of his majesty’s sugar-colonies.” It was indeed dropped in the house of peers; yet, as being a subject of the greatest consequence to our American commerce and colonies, I shall exhibit an abstract of that bill, as it was sent up to the lords.

It enacted, “That no sugar, rum, or molasses, of the plantations of foreign nations, shall be imported into Great Britain or Ireland, or to any of the king’s dominions in America, under forfeiture of lading, ship, and furniture; and those who aided, abetted, or received, were to forfeit treble value thereof; masters of ships taking in any such foreign sugar, in order to be landed in Great Britain or British America, were subjected to a fine of two hundred pounds; and all masters of ships lading sugars, &c. at the British sugar-colonies, bound to any other part of the king’s dominions, shall, before he sails, deliver to the collector of the port, a true account of his lading, and take a certificate thereof, with the merchant’s name who shipped them, and of him to whom consigned; and when arrived at his intended port, shall take an oath, and sign a true manifest of his lading. And whereas great number of horses, and great quantities of lumber, had been exported from our continent colonies to the foreign sugar-colonies, whereby they were enabled more easily to carry on their said sugar-plantations; none such were to be transported hereafter to those foreign colonies; and when any such goods are to be shipped from the continent-colonies, the master shall give a bond for five hundred pounds that they shall not be carried to any foreign sugar-colony. A fine of three hundred pounds was inflicted on any governor, custom-house officer, &c. conniving at any fraudulent importation of foreign sugars, &c. Nothing in this act, however, was to extend to the restraining the usual importation of sugars from the dominions of the king of Portugal.”

During the course of the debates upon this bill, the friends of it clearly proved, that if a stop was not immediately put to the trade between New-England and the French sugar-colonies in America, the absolute ruin of the English sugar-islands must ensue. It appeared, that by New-England ships furnishing the French colonies with terres and timber, cut out of the king’s woods; and by the small duties paid upon French sugars in Martinico, compared to what was paid in Barbadoes and Jamaica, the French were enabled to undersell the English very much, no more than one per cent. being paid for exportation of all the produce of the French islands. It was farther proved, that the vast improvement in all kind of manufactures of linen, woollen, and iron, in and about Boston and New-England, enabled them to serve the French with all these commodities, and in return they had their molasses, sugars, rum, and silks, to the great prejudice of Great Britain.

On the other hand, it was attempted to be shewn, that the northern colonies, and consequently the mother-country, profited greatly by the intercourse complained of; and some hints were thrown out, that we might reject the disabling so large and so powerful a people. It was alleged in behalf of the northern colonies, that as they and Great Britain do actually take off all the sugar, rum, and molasses, which our sugar-isles do or can possibly produce; and that our said northern colonies do moreover take off vast quantities of rum and molasses from the French of Martinico, and do likewise get a great deal of them from Surinam, Guadaloupe, the Grenadoes, Cape François, Cayenne, &c. should all but our own sugar, rum, and molasses, be absolutely prohibited, many great inconveniencies would follow. In the first place, we should lose the employment of several thousand tons of shipping in the trade between the northern colonies and these foreign sugar colonies. Secondly, the northern colonies could not possibly be supplied with near the quantity of rum and molasses which they stood in need of for the carrying on many most profitable trades in which they are now engaged. Thirdly, this would put a most dangerous monopoly into the hands of our own sugar-planters, so as that the India and Turkey trades by the northern colonies could not afford to pay the rates which would be demanded, even supposing our islanders could make sufficient quantities of those goods for both the American and British consumption. Fourthly, it would greatly increase the French shipping and navigation, not only in bringing lumber, horses, &c. to their own sugar-islands, but in carrying from thence to Europe all their rum and molasses, where, no doubt, they could find markets for them, as they already do for their sugars, so as to have supplanted us, and to undersell us in Holland, and at Hamburgh, Cadiz, &c. Fifthly, if the complaint of the Barbadians be true, viz. that their lands are so far worn out, that it requires the labour of three negroes to produce as much sugar as could formerly be raised by the labour of one, they need but remove to Jamaica, where they may have excellent fresh land enough; and as the value of such new land is a trifle, when compared to the value of the stock required for a sugar-plantation, they have that entire to carry along with them to Jamaica; and the charge and trouble of their removing thither would be amply compensated by the abundant product of those new lands; and which, consequently, would enable them to undersell the French and Dutch plantations, the only seeming means left for our recovering the trade of the re-exportation of our sugars. Sixthly, that from the foreign sugar-colonies our northern colonies bring back considerable quantities of gold and silver along with their sugar, rum, and molasses, whereby they are enabled to pay their mother-country for the vast quantities of her product and manufacture which they take of her; and which, without this trade, so much complained of, they could not possibly do. Lastly, that the prohibiting the continent people from purchasing of the foreign colonies their sugar, rum, and molasses, or even laying the high duties on them, would utterly destroy a commerce of such great consequence to the northern colonies, as that without it they could not carry on their fisheries, their fur-trade, and their navigation, with the Indians; neither could they dispose of the product of their lands and labour, a great part of the profits whereof center in Great Britain, in payment of the manufactures, &c. they had from thence. Upon the whole, said the advocates for the northern colonies, the secret and real view of the sugar-islands is, to gain the absolute monopoly of sugars and rum, with respect to the subjects of Great Britain, to themselves, that so they may have it in their power to exact what prices they shall please from the buyers.

These arguments, however, being chiefly founded on speculation, were not deemed sufficient to outweigh those urged on the other side, particularly with regard to the vast disadvantages that Martinico, and all the French sugar-islands, must be under, were they not supplied with horses, tools, wood, and all kinds of utensils for carrying on their sugar-works; while all that the northern colonies receive in return may be supplied by the produce of our own sugar-islands. It was then strongly urged, that if they were not timely check-ed in their illicit practices, there might be danger of their setting themselves up as an independent state: in the mean time, it was said, the bill in question would have this good effect at least, that if it passed into a law, it would oblige the northern colonies to apply themselves to raising flax and hemp, and other naval stores, which must be of immense service to the mother country.

Notwithstanding all these plausible allegations on both sides, in a matter of so great importance to our commercial interests, there was nothing legally decided until two years later. The ministry were highly censured for the backwardness they shewed in this affair, which was so very interesting to the mother-country; for, as we before observed, the act for encouraging the sugar-colonies was dropped in the house of peers: but, indeed, when such material alterations are required to be made, in a long-established, or even connived course of any important branch of commerce, great and serious deliberation, and mature observation and consideration, seem absolutely requisite in a nation like ours, whose principal support depends so much on commerce and plantations †.

Such were the principal transactions of this session of parliament, which closed in the month of May, 1731, by a short speech from the throne.

The allies of Seville finding the emperor in earnest, and fully determined to stand in his defence, began to abate somewhat of their former high strain. The cabinets of Europe were again employed in framing expedients. Couriers were continually passing from court to court, and the public prints amused the nation with nothing but new plans or new reports of accommodation, whilst a large fleet lay in the road of Barcelona, and a numerous body of land-forces were assembled on the neighbouring coasts of Spain, ready to embark upon the first motion for the intended expedition. But his Imperial majesty having rejected all propositions made to him for acceding to the treaty of Seville; and seeming determined to abide extremities rather than consent to their measures, the time was worn out in negotiation only, and the Spanish armada retired to their harbours, without any action, like our fleet at Spithead the year before.

Thus did affairs continue in a doubtful situation between peace and war, as they had continued for several years past, till the beginning of the present year, 1731; about which time a private negotiation at Vienna, between Great Britain and the emperor, began to get air, and in less than three months afterwards a treaty of peace and alliance was actually concluded at Vienna between the emperor and the king of Great Britain. The truth is, that the depredations of the Spaniards in America, and their backwardness in executing the treaty of Seville, had provoked the English ministry to such a degree (owing in great measure to the severe reflections cast upon them, on account of their tameness, by the opposition, who had now the general voice of the nation on their side) that they made proposals to the court of Vienna, which the latter accepted. What these were, and the treaty concluded in consequence thereof, will be shewn hereafter.

† Parliamentary Debates. Proceed. House of Commons. Proceed. House of Lords. Tindal. Polit. Stat.

In the beginning of the year the duke of Parma died, after having made a will, in which he declared that his duchess was three months advanced in her pregnancy; intreating the powers of Europe to have compassion upon his people, and defer the execution of their projects until his consort should be delivered. In case the child should be still-born, prove a female, or, if a male, die after the birth, he bequeathed his dominions and allodial estates to the infant Don Carlos of Spain, and in the mean time appointed five regents to govern the duchy.

Notwithstanding this disposition, a body of Imperial horse immediately took possession of Parma and Placentia, under the command of general Stampa, who declared they should conduct themselves with all possible regularity and moderation, and leave the administration entirely to the regents whom the duke had appointed. They publicly proclaimed in the market-place, that they took possession of these duchies for the infant Don Carlos; and that, if the duchess-dowager should not be delivered of a prince, the said infant might receive the investiture from the emperor whenever he pleased, provided he came without an army.

Though these steps seemed to threaten an immediate war, the king of Great Britain and the States-general interposed their mediation so successfully with the emperor, that he desisted from the prosecution of his designs. On the sixteenth day of May, 1731, the secret negotiation between the courts of London and Vienna was perfected into a treaty.

By the first article of this treaty (known by the name of the treaty of Vienna) a mutual guaranty of all the territories belonging to the contracting powers is stipulated.

The second article stipulates a general guaranty of the pragmatic sanction in favour of the emperor's female heirs.

By the third article, his Imperial majesty consents to the introduction of the Spanish troops into the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia; and binds himself to use his utmost endeavours to obtain the consent of the empire for that purpose.

By the fourth article it is stipulated, that all parts of the treaty shall be duly and truly executed.

The fifth article entirely abolishes all navigation to the Austrian Netherlands; excepting the sending (once only) two ships from Ostend: and commissioners, by the same article, are to meet on the parts of both powers at Antwerp, for settling a tariff between Great Britain and the Austrian Netherlands.

By the sixth article it is agreed, that all points of difference amongst the contracting powers, or any of their allies, should be amicably adjusted; and that the present treaty is not to derogate from the force of any of the former treaties subsisting between either the contracting parties, or their allies, excepting so far as they are inconsistent with the present treaty.

By the seventh article, the English, touching their commerce in the kingdom of Sicily, are to be treated on the same footing as they were in the reign of Charles the Second of Spain, and as it is usual to treat a nation with which one is in strict friendship.

The eighth article fixes eight months after the ratification for the accession of the other powers who shall be invited into the treaty.

The ninth and last article allows six weeks for exchanging the letters of ratification.

Besides these, there was a separate article, which declared, "That the guaranty entered into by the contracting powers, should not extend to the emperor's dominions, which might be attacked by the Turks. At the same time his Britannic majesty declared authentically, that notwithstanding the introduction of Spanish garrisons into the strong places of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, yet that he had no intention to depart from what had been settled by the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, either with regard to the rights of his Imperial majesty and the empire, or to the security of the kingdoms and states which his Imperial majesty actually possesses in Italy; or, lastly, to the preservation of the quiet and dignity of those who were then the lawful possessors of those duchies, and therefore he renews to the emperor the guaranty of those countries. But to take away all suspicion of the emperor's trifling in this matter, he emitted a declaration, of the same force and date with the treaty, importing, "That if the pregnant duchess-dowager of Parma should be brought to-bed of a son, the introduction of the Spanish troops to that duchy should still take place; and that, if she should be brought to bed of a daughter, Don Carlos was immediately to be put into possession of the duchies of Parma and Placentia, by an eventual investiture from the emperor and the empire." And his Imperial majesty farther declares, "That in case the duchess-dowager should be brought to-bed of a daughter, he will immediately withdraw his troops from the duchies of Parma and Placentia, to give way to the peaceable possession."

Although the States-general were included in this treaty, neither France nor Spain were so much as mentioned in it; which seemed to be somewhat extraordinary, as to the latter at least, since the introduction of Spanish garrisons into Italy with the emperor's consent, made one of the principal stipulations of this new treaty: nay, what is still more surprizing, it was with extreme difficulty that they were brought into it at last; and even then not without insisting on several alterations in the act of approbation; one of which was, that the introduction of Don Carlos with six thousand Spanish troops into Italy, should be effectuated previously to the execution of any engagements on their parts, however they might stand prior to the treaty of Seville. The Dutch were still more backward in their accession, and did not accede at last without several restrictions. As for the court of France, they were so far from listening to any solicitations on this head, that they exerted their utmost endeavours to prevent the concurrence of Spain: nay, they expressed such resentment both against the treaty itself and the manner of negotiating it, that nothing less was apprehended by us from them than an invasion from Dunkirk, where they had actually assembled a large body of troops. To guard against attempts of this nature, the coasts of Kent were immediately covered with regiments of horse, foot, and dragoons, who were ordered to march thither from all parts of the kingdom; and the fluctuation which such an alarm naturally occasioned in our stocks, afforded the locusts of the alley a plentiful harvest.

These apprehensions being at length dissipated, and news arriving that general Stampa, with the imperial forces, had taken formal possession of the duchies of Parma and Placentia, in consequence of the relic of the deceased duke at length declaring that she was not with child, sir Charles Wager was dispatched about the latter end of August to the court of Spain, with a large squadron of English ships, in order to wait upon Don Carlos and the Spanish troops to his new dominions. The admiral's ship was fitted out in a most splendid manner for the reception of his royal highness; but after a course of pompous visits between the commander of the Spanish fleet and our admiral, on his arrival at Cadiz; and the same honours having been afterwards paid him at the court of Seville, his Catholic majesty was pleased to discharge him from the trouble of taking Don Carlos under his care, and required no more at his hands than to convey the Spanish troops to Italy, in conjunction with his own admiral. The combined fleet accordingly set sail from Barcelona in the month of October, and arrived at Leghorn, from whence our squadron afterwards returned to England.

As soon as the court of Spain received intelligence that their forces were safely landed, and that every thing relating to the introduction of Spanish garrisons in Tuscany was finished, the young prince was sent after them by land as far as Antibes, they chusing to let him travel through France, rather than accept of those magnificent accommodations which had been provided for him and his retinue on board our squadron, at so great an expence. His highness embarking on board the Spanish gallies at Antibes, landed at Leghorn on the twenty-seventh of December, and was received there with all possible marks of joy and respect, especially by the English factory, who erected a triumphal arch in honour of the day. The imperial general, Stampa, was no sooner informed of his arrival, than he withdrew his forces into the Milanese, and the infant took possession of his new dominions.

The English ministry exulted not a little in the completion of their schemes: they challenged the boldest of their enemies to mention a single circumstance necessary for the peace of Great Britain that had been neglected. It must be confessed, that this second treaty of Vienna prevented an immediate war, and served to keep things together for some time; but it certainly did not establish a firm and lasting peace: for, to speak in the mildest terms, a remarkable coldness ensued between us and France; and the preparations in the ports of Spain, for equipping another armament the very next spring, seemed to give our ministry such an alarm, that a fleet was fitted out here likewise in a great hurry, and rendezvoused for some time at the Nore, under the command of sir George Walton. This seemed to intimate that our court had some jealousy of the designs of the Spaniards; for as soon as soon as certain intelligence came that they were landed near Oran, the admiral was ordered to strike his flag, and the ships returned into harbour*.

The state of the nation at the end of this year was also far from being tranquil, notwithstanding the new alliances it had formed. The violence of party-pamphlets continued to such a degree, that even the most sacred repositories of friendship were broken up and exposed to every vulgar eye. This served only to exasperate matters, and to render party-controversies merely personal. It was generally supposed to be somewhat of that kind which occasioned the disgrace of Mr. W. Pulteney, whose name was in July struck out of the list of privy-counsellors by his majesty's command; he was also ordered to be put out of all commissions of peace; and all this on account of his being the supposed author of some writings highly reflecting upon the minister, and against the measures of the court.

In the month of October this year the duke of Lorraine paid a visit to England; and after having had several private conferences with his majesty, he returned to Holland in December in one of the royal yachts. Few people at this time suspected the motive of his visit, which was afterwards said to be to engage (by the desire of the emperor) his Britannic majesty's approbation of his becoming husband to that monarch's daughter.

The parliament of Great Britain meeting on the thirteenth of January, 1732, the king in his speech declared, "That the general tranquillity of Europe was now restored and established, and all his expectations on that head fully answered: that the share of credit and influence which the crown of Great Britain had had in accomplishing that difficult and disagreeable work, and which redounded so much to the honour and interest of the nation, as it was universally confessed abroad, would, he was confident, be agreeable to his people, and acknowledged with gratitude by his parliament: that from the time of concluding the quadruple alliance, the several courts of Europe had been employed in finding means to execute the measures which the contracting powers had concerted for securing the succession of Tuscany and Parma in favour of the infant of Spain; but the various, jarring, and contending interests, hard to be reconciled, and united, in effectuating a point of so much importance; the ambitious views and hopes of obtaining on every side farther advantages; and the natural jealousies and suspicions arising among the several powers concerned; all these opposite principles and purposes had kept in suspense and unexecuted, what the court of Spain had very much at heart, and had occasioned such troubles and disturbances as embarrassed the affairs of Europe for many years, and particularly affected the interest of this nation."

The rest of the speech is in the same congratulating stile; and it concludes in the following warm manner: "This happy situation of affairs, I promise myself, will inspire you all with such temper and unanimity, and such ardent zeal for the public welfare, as becomes a parliament sensible of the great blessings they enjoy: the duty and affection of my subjects is all the return I defire for my paternal care and concern for them: my government has no security but what is equally conducive to the happiness and to the welfare of my people; and their happiness has no foundation but in the defence and support of my government: our safety is mutual, our interests inseparable."

The opposition to the court measures appears to have been uncommonly spirited during the course of this session. When the commons returned to their house, the lord Tyrconnel, an Irish peer, made a motion for an address of thanks, in which they should declare their entire approbation of the king's conduct, acknowledge the blessings they enjoyed under his government, express their confidence in the wisdom of his councils, and declare their readiness to grant the necessary supplies. This motion was seconded by Mr. Clutterbuck, but violently opposed by sir Wilfred Lawson, Mr. Shippen, Mr. W. Pulteney, sir W. Wyndham, and Mr. Oglethorpe. They did not object against a general address of thanks, but exposed the absurdity and bad tendency of expressions which implied a blind approbation of all the measures of the ministry. Sir Wilfred Lawson observed, that notwithstanding the great things we had done for Spain, and the favours we had procured for the royal family of that kingdom, little or no satisfaction had as yet been received for the injuries our merchants had sustained from that nation.

Mr. Pulteney took notice, that the nation, by being guaranty to the pragmatic sanction, laid itself under an obligation to assist the Austrian family, when attacked by any potentate whatever, except the grand seignior. They might be attacked, he said, when it would be much against the interest of the kingdom to engage itself in a war upon any foreign account: that it might one day be for the interest of the nation to join against them, in order to preserve the balance of Europe, the establishing of which had already cost England such immense sums of money; and he expressed his apprehensions, that the court of Versailles would accuse the English of a breach of good faith, in concluding the treaty of Vienna without their participation.

Sir William Wyndham insisted upon the absurdity of entering into a strange variety of obligations, not only inconsistent with, but opposite to each other; obligations, the motives of which could not readily be conceived nor accounted for upon any known principles of sound policy; for by this conduct we were made to affront in their turns all the great powers of Europe; and not only so, but to set them at variance with each other; and this was done at a prodigious expence, at a time when the nation was loaded with debts and taxes; while, on the contrary, his Imperial majesty, by his wisdom and steadiness, had compassed his own ends.

Mr. Oglethorpe was of opinion, that many other things related more nearly to the honour and interest of the nation than did the guaranty of the pragmatic sanction: he instanced the obtaining reparation for the Spanish depredations, the procuring the complete demolition of the harbour of Dunkirk, and the putting the militia of our own country upon such a footing as might render them more useful in case of an invasion. He mentioned the hardships which the protestants of Germany suffered from the house of Austria; and expressed his hopes, that before the Dutch acceded to the treaty of Vienna, such explanations and concessions would be made by the emperor as should secure the future tranquillity of Europe.

The motion was defended by Mr. Pelham and Mr. H. Walpole, brother to the minister: the former was pay-master of the forces, and brother to the duke of Newcastle: he was liberal, candid, benevolent, and attached to the interests of his country, though frequently mistaken in the true nature of them, and at all times ready to support the measures of the ministry. On this occasion he asserted, that it was no way inconsistent with the dignity of that house to thank his majesty in the most particular terms, for every thing he had been pleased to communicate in his speech from the throne: that no expressions of approbation in the address could be any way made use of to prevent an enquiry into the measures which had been pursued, when the treaties should be laid before the house. He said, at the opening of a session the eyes of all Europe were turned towards Great Britain; and from the resolves of her parliament the neighbouring powers judged of the unanimity that would ensue between his majesty and his people: that their appearing jealous of his majesty's conduct would weaken his influence upon the councils of foreign states and potentates, and perhaps put it out of his power to rectify any false steps that might have been made by his ministers.

Mr. Walpole made a long speech, in which he justified the ministry in every step they had taken. He shewed that they could not, consistently with the national honour and interest, have sooner guaranteed the pragmatic sanction, inasmuch as they were not sure but the emperor designed Don Carlos for his son-in-law; in which case the extensive dominions he was to possess in Italy might have proved fatal to the repose of Europe. He denied that there was any thing to fear from the resentment of the court of Versailles, who were still desirous and willing to continue in the strictest friendship with us. He affirmed, that had his Most Christian majesty guaranteed the pragmatic sanction, Don Carlos might have met with invincible obstacles to his succession; and that, in all probability, neither the Dutch or Great Britain would have been able to persuade the emperor to give up the Ostend company, or to do them justice in other respects. After a long debate the question was put, the motion carried, and the address presented.

The next subject of importance which came before the commons was the number of land-forces. When the supply fell under consideration, sir W. Strickland, secretary at war, moved for seventeen thousand seven hundred and nine men for the service of the current year. He was opposed by Mr. (afterwards sir) Watkyns-William Wynn, who moved that the army should be reduced to twelve thousand men. A warm debate ensuing, was managed in favour of the first motion, by lord Hervey, sir Robert Walpole and his brother, Mr. Pelham, Sir Philip Yorke, attorney general, who was a better lawyer than a politician, and shone more as an advocate at the bar than as an orator in the house of commons. The last partizan of the ministry was sir W. Yonge, one of the lords commissioners of the Treasury, of whom a modern writer has given a character, which seems rather dictated by party-inveteracy than by that spirit of of impartiality and truth which ought to distinguish every historian. Mr. Wynne's motion was supported by the lord Morpeth, eldest son to the earl of Carlisle; by Mr. Walter Plumer, who spoke with great weight, though embittered with too great a proportion of severity; by sir W. Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, Mr. W. Pulteney, and Mr. Barnard.

The courtiers argued, that it was necessary to maintain such a number of land-forces as might defeat the designs of malcontents, secure the interior tranquillity of the kingdom, defend it from external assaults, overawe its neighbours, and enable it to take vigorous measures, in case the peace of Europe should be embroiled: they endeavoured to shew, that ever since the Revolution the government had never reduced its forces without having cause to repent it, by the encouragement which such a reduction gave to their foreign and domestic enemies. They expostulated on the wisdom of his majesty, and his tenderness for the liberties of his people; together with the jealousy of the parliament which would never suffer any army, raised by their consent, to subvert either the freedom or the property of the subject. It was moreover observed, that the forces now in pay could not be properly deemed a standing army, inasmuch as they were voted and maintained from year to year.

To these arguments the members in the opposition replied, that a standing force in time of peace was unconstitutional, and had been always thought dangerous: that a militia was as capable of discipline as a standing army, and would have more incentives to courage and perseverance: that the civil magistrate was able to preserve the power of the country; and that the number of malcontents was contemptible, though it might be considerably augmented by maintaining a standing army, and measures of the like arbitrary tendency. Other nations, it was said, had been enslaved by standing armies. History, ancient and modern, was produced for examples. The Roman army, who had subverted the liberties of their country, that of Cromwell, and of James II. were adduced as instances to heighten the parallel the opposers of the bill laboured to establish.

These remarks were answered by sir Robert Walpole, who said, that there could be no danger of this sort from the present army, which was commanded by men whose properties were too considerable to suffer them to head, or even to encourage any attempt against the civil constitution of their country: that all arguments drawn from past times, against a regular military force, were foreign to the purpose, considering the vast alterations which had been introduced into the civil system of Great Britain, and of all Europe: that England was now a commercial nation, and could not spare from her trade and manufactures a number of men sufficient to defend her as a militia, in case she was attacked by regular troops, great armies of which were now kept on foot by all her neighbours: that the maintaining of the proposed number of troops was not only dictated by prudence, but, if the matter was duly considered, by oeconomy likewise: that, should the army be reduced, the nation would be in the most imminent danger, from the designs of Jacobites and disaffected persons: and, finally, that it was well known that the papists and Jacobites were then, and always had been, the most forward in the cry for the reduction of the army.

Mr. Plumer complained, that the country was oppressed by an arbitrary method of quartering soldiers, in an undue proportion, upon those publicans who refused to vote in elections, according to the direction of the ministry. Mr. Pulteney asserted, that the money raised for the sustenance of eighteen thousand men in England would maintain sixty thousand French or Germans, or the same number of almost any other people on the continent. Sir W. Wyndham declared, that eighteen thousand of the English troops in the late war were maintained on less than two thirds of the sum now demanded for the like number. Besides, the expediency of reducing the number from eighteen thousand to twelve thousand, was insisted upon as the natural consequence even of his majesty's own declaration from the throne; by which he had given his parliament to understand, "that the peace of Europe was established, and that he had nothing so much at heart as the ease and prosperity of his people." If eighteen thousand men then, it was said, were sufficient, on the supposed eve of a general war in Europe (as was the case last year) it was surely reasonable to think that a less number would suffice when peace was perfectly re-established. Whatever solidity might be in these reasons, or however they might be the sentiments of the nation, they made no impression on the house, where the majority resolved that the standing army should be maintained without reduction*.

The minister, conscious of his own unpopularity, resolved at this time to make an attempt to recover his credit with the landed gentlemen of England. This was no other than a scheme to give them relief by reviving the duty upon salt, in order the more easily to lighten the burden of the land-tax. Accordingly in a grand committee of the house, sir Robert Walpole said, "That in raising the supplies granted, his majesty's intention was, that the burden should fall as equally as possible upon the subjects: that it had long lain upon the gentlemen of the landed interest: that no tax could be more general than that upon salt, or more tolerable to individuals, be they ever so poor; whereas the land-tax, which had continued for forty years, affected the land-holders only. He therefore moved, that the duties upon salt, which about two years before had been abolished, should now be revived, and granted to his majesty, his heirs and successors, for the term of three years." In order to sweeten this proposal, he declared, that the land-tax for the ensuing year should be reduced to one shilling in the pound.

Plausible as this proposal was, it did not operate so strongly with the house as the author expected. The country-party to a man inveighed loudly against it: they observed, that two years had elapsed since the king, in a speech from the throne, had exhorted them to abolish some of the taxes that were the most burdensome to the poor. The house was then of opinion, that the tax upon salt was the most burthenſome, and the moſt pernicious to the trade of the kingdom of all the impositions to which the poor were ſubjected, and therefore it was taken off; but that no good reaſon could be produced for altering their opinion ſo ſuddenly, and reſolving to grind the faces of the poor, in order to eaſe a few rich men of the landed intereſt.

Mr. Plumer, in particular, took upon him to answer the miniſter, and, in the courſe of his ſpeech, obſerved, that the character of a right tax was wanting in this: for, ſo far from taxing the luxuries, it taxed the moſt ordinary neceſſaries of life; that the motion, if approved, tended to diſtreſs the landed gentlemen more than the land-tax itſelf, inasmuch as by diſabling manufacturers from carrying on their trade, it would diſable tenants from paying their rents; and, moreover, it was highly impolitic, ſince the revival of it might alienate the affections of the people from his maſteſty. He deſired every landed gentleman that heard him, to conſider what he could make of his eſtate if we had no trade, no manufactures, nor any number of populous trading towns in England: he asked, who would be ſuch a fool as to deſire to be relieved of one ſhilling in the pound upon the land-tax, when he muſt pay as much another way, namely for the ſalt made uſe of in his family, and when at the ſame time he dimin-iſhes the yearly income of his eſtate much more than one ſhilling in the pound, nay more than any land-tax ever amounted to in England. The land-tax, he ſaid, was but an annual diminution of a gentleman's eſtate; he might be free of it, or part of it, the ſucceeding year: but if, by the decay of trade and the hardſhip that was laid upon the poor farmer, he ſhould be obliged to lower the rents of his eſtate, that would be a diminution which, it was to be feared, would endure for ever."

Some other gentlemen in the oppoſition obſerved, that while this tax was exacted in England, a great number of merchants ſent their ſhips to Ireland to be victualled for their reſpective voyages; that ſince it had been aboliſhed, many experiments had been ſucceſsfully tried with ſalt for the improvement of agriculture, which would be entirely defeated by the revival of this impoſition, which was likely to answer no one good purpoſe, but to the miniſter, who would now have it in his power to employ a great number of additional officers in the revenue, all of them wholly depending upon him, whoſe influence in elections they would proportionably increaſe.

Mr. Walpole, reſuming his diſcourſe, ſaid, that with regard to the objection, that the revival of the duty would be prejudicial to the commerce of England, he begged leave to obſerve, that the trade and commerce of England had never made ſo rapid a progreſs as during the thirty years that this tax laſted, and that the victualling of ſhips at Corke, in Ireland, in order to avoid paying the duty in England, was ſo far from being detrimental, that it was in fact beneficial to the kingdom; that as to another objection, as if the revival of the duty would hurt agriculture, the allegation itſelf was founded on a falſe fact, inasmuch as that ſpecies of the commodity which was proper for manure, might be had in any quantity free from duty.

Some other ſpeeches were made upon the ſubject, particularly one by Mr. Pulteney, who undertook to refute all the arguments of the miniſtry in favour of the tax. The queſtion, however, being put, was carried in the affirmative, but not without the moſt violent debates. The bill met with much the ſame treatment in the upper houſe, where it was warmly conteſted, but finally paſſed.

The reader will readily remember, that, in the laſt ſeſſion, ſome complaints had been made againſt the Charitable Corporation, to the houſe of commons: it now became a very ſerious affair. This company was firſt erected in the year 1707. Their profeſſed intention was to lend money at legal intereſt to the poor, upon ſmall pledges, and to perſons of better rank upon an indubitable ſecurity of goods impawned. Their capital was at firſt limited to thirty thouſand pounds, but, by licences from the crown, they increaſed it to ſixty thouſand pounds. In the month of October, of the preceding year, George Robinson, eſq. member for Marlow, their caſhier, and John Thompson, warehouse-keeper of the corporation, diſappeared in one day. The proprietors, alarmed at this incident, held ſeveral general courts, and appointed a committee to examine the ſtate of their affairs, when it ſoon appeared that a moſt pernicious ſcene of villany had been carried on, inasmuch as thirty thouſand pounds was all that could be diſcovered to answer a capital of near ſixty thouſand pounds, the remainder having been embezzled by means which could not be diſcovered. The proprietors hereupon preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, repreſenting, that by the moſt notorious breach of truſt in ſeveral perſons, to whom they had committed the management of their affairs, the corporation had been defrauded of the greateſt part of their capital, and many of the proprietors were reduced to abſolute beggary; they therefore humbly prayed, that, as they were unable to detect the combinations of thoſe who had ruined them, or to bring the delinquents to condign puniſhment, without the aid and aſſiſtance of parliament, that houſe would be pleaſed to examine into the ſtate of the corporation, and the conduct of the managers, and give ſuch relief to the petitioners as the houſe ſhould think proper.

This petition was very graciously received, and the houſe appointed a committee to conduct the enquiry. They ſoon diſcovered a moſt iniquitous ſcene of fraud, in conſequence of which, Mr. Robinson, ſir Robert Sutton, and ſir Alexander Grant, were expelled the houſe, for having had a conſiderable ſhare in theſe malpractices; and a bill was brought in to reſtrain them, with their accomplices, Dennis Bond, William Burroughs, George Jackson, Benjamin Robinson, Richard Wooley, and Thomas Warren, eſqrs. from leaving the kingdom, or alienating their effects.

While the committee was ſitting upon this black affair, they received a letter from one Belloni, a banker at Rome, informing them, that Thompson, the warehouse-keeper, was ſecured in that city, with all his papers, and confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo, and that the papers were tranſmitted to his (Belloni's) correſpondent at Paris, who ſhould deliver them up, on certain conditions ſtipulated in favour of the priſoner.

From ſeveral concurring circumſtances, and the characters of the perſons concerned in conducting this this intelligence, the committee inferred, that it was no other than an artifice to insinuate a favourable opinion of the pretender, as if he had procured the arrest of Thompson, from his zeal for justice, and affection to the English nation; the proposals contained in the letter were therefore rejected with disdain, and both houses concurred in an order, that the letter should be burned by the hands of the common hangman, at the Royal Exchange: and the lower house came to the following resolution: "That it was an insolent audacious libel, attempting, by false and insidious insinuations, to impose upon the parliament and people of Great Britain; and, by specious pretences, and professions of esteem, affection, and compassion, to amuse the unhappy sufferers of the Charitable Corporation, with vain and deceitful hopes of relief; that the said letter was, in itself, absurd and contradictory, conceived, at the beginning, in terms, and in the style of power and authority, or as proceeding from some extraordinary interest and influence, but concluding in the person and character of a private banker at Rome, who agreed upon certain conditions in behalf of John Thompson to deliver certain books and papers belonging to the said Thompson; that the conditions required and demanded in favour of Thompson, seemed at the same time to be vague, evasive, and uncertain, tending to procure advantages and indemnity to himself and his accomplices, without any prospect of benefit to the corporation: and that the whole transaction appeared to be a scandalous artifice, calculated purely to delude the unhappy, and partly to disguise and conceal the wicked practices of the professed enemies to his majesty's person, crown, and dignity."

Another, but a more daring and barefaced instance of the abuse of parliamentary confidence, happened to be discovered this session, by the unwearied application of lord Gage. Certain commissioners had been appointed to sell the English estates forfeited by the rebellion of the year 1715; and among others, the forfeited reversion of one that had belonged to the Derwentwater family, which was adjudged worth nine thousand pounds a year: this reversion had been sold, in a clandestine manner, by two of the commissioners only, to one Mr. Smith, a friend of theirs, for the trifling sum of one thousand pounds. This affair was no sooner known abroad, than it made a very great noise, and, by the indefatigable pains which lord Gage took, the whole mystery of iniquity was minutely detected; in consequence of which a bill was prepared in the lower house, to make the sale void. Dennis Bond, esq. (the same who was concerned in the Charitable Corporation affair) and serjeant Birch, commissioners for the sale of the forfeited estates, were declared guilty of a notorious breach of trust, and expelled the house, of which they were members. During this session, no less than five members of parliament were expelled for the most sordid acts of knavery; a melancholy proof of national degeneracy.

All the supplies were granted, and, among other articles, the sum of twenty-two thousand six hundred and ninety-four pounds, seven shillings, and six pence, for the agio or difference of money in the subsidies payable to the crown of Denmark, in pursuance of the treaty subsisting between the late king and that monarch; but this was not obtained without a violent dispute, in which Mr. Pulteney greatly distinguished himself. On this occasion some words happened between him and Mr. Pelham, which brought on a challenge, and both gentlemen went out of the house in order to terminate their dispute without delay; which being observed by the speaker, he ordered the serjeant at arms to follow them forthwith, and summon them to return to the service of the house: they complied, and Mr. Speaker then obliged each severally to declare that they would not prosecute any quarrel, or shew any farther resentment, for what had passed between them in the house; and here the affair ended. The misfortune was, at the time we now treat of, personal invectives were too common between both parties.

The pension-bill was revived this session, for the third time, and again rejected by the house of lords. Some efforts were likewise made towards restoring the trade of the sugar-colonies in America, but they met with so strong an opposition from the northern colonies, that they proved of little or no effect: an act, however, passed for encouraging the growth of coffee in his majesty's plantations in America.

It was not only in the house of commons that the minister had a strong opposition to encounter; the peers were far from unanimously approving his measures. On the rejection of the pension-bill, several lords entered very spirited protests. When the number of standing forces came to be debated, the earl of Chesterfield argued for the court motion. The earl of Oxford moved for the reducing them to twelve thousand effective men. The earl of Winchelsea observed, that a standing army rendered ministers of state more daring than otherwise they would be, in contriving and executing projects that were grievous to the people; schemes that never could enter into the heads of any but those who were drunk with excess of power. The marquis of Tweeddale, in reasoning against such a number as the ministry proposed, took occasion to observe, that not one shilling of the forfeited estates was ever applied to the use of the public; he likewise took notice, that the eighteen thousand men demanded as a standing force, were now modelled in such a manner, that they might be speedily augmented to forty thousand, on any emergency. The duke of Argyll endeavoured to demonstrate the danger of depending for the safety of the kingdom upon an undisciplined militia, a fleet, or an army of auxiliaries; then he represented the necessity of having recourse to a regular army in case of invasion; and, after all, acknowledged that the number proposed was no way sufficient for that purpose. All his arguments were answered by lord Carteret; nevertheless victory declared for the ministry.

The parliament having granted every branch of the supply, towards the payment of which they borrowed a sum out of the sinking fund, and passed divers acts for the encouragement of commerce and agriculture, the king, on the first day of June, gave the royal assent to the bills that were prepared, and closed the session, after having informed both houses, that the States-general had acceded to the treaty of Vienna, that he had determined to visit his German dominions, and to leave the queen regent in his absence: he accordingly set out for Hanover in the beginning of June. By this time the pragmatic sanction was confirmed by the diet of the empire, though not without a formal protest by the electors Palatine, Bavaria, and Saxony.

In this same year, a number of gentlemen of distinction and worth set on foot one of the most disinterested, charitable, and (to the public) beneficial designs, that was ever undertaken. Hitherto all our American colonies were professedly planted for the immediate benefit of the undertakers; but this was solely for a national and charitable purpose, without any other benefit to the undertakers than what results from the pleasure of doing good. Most of them were members of parliament, who having lately had occasion to observe the misery of the prisoners confined in our gaols for debt, were moved with compassion for the relief of such unfortunate objects, who, were they settled in some new colony in our plantations, might, instead of a burden and a disgrace, prove a great advantage to their country; and that, moreover, many persecuted protestants from beyond sea might take the benefit of such a colony, for setting up their residence there, with the free enjoyment of their civil and religious liberties.

There was still a great part of the charter-lands of South Carolina, situated on the southern part of that province, bordering upon Florida, remaining unplanted, which it was highly the interest of Great Britain to occupy and plant as soon as possible, lest either the Spaniards from Florida, or the French behind it, from their usurpation of Mississippi, should seize on and plant what they found so unoccupied; more especially as the latter people greatly lamented their not having any footing on any part of the eastern shores of North America, so as to communicate more easily with their sugar-islands, their voyages to and from the Mississippi colony being by no means so convenient for receiving thence supplies of provisions, lumber, &c. which they were, for that reason, obliged to take from our British continent-colonies. This vacancy then was judged absolutely necessary to be filled up as soon as possible.

These reasons were sufficiently urgent for gentlemen of so public-spirited a character and disposition to make the attempt. But first they were to be authorised by his majesty's perpetual charter, which they obtained in this same year, 1732, on the ninth of June, "empowering twenty-one gentlemen by name, and such others as they should, from time to time, elect into their body, to be trustees for establishing the colony therein named Georgia, in America, bounded between the most northern stream of the river Savannah, and the most southern stream of the river Alatomaha (an extent of upwards of one hundred miles) along the sea-coast; and going westward from the heads of the said rivers, in direct lines, to the South Sea; with the islands within twenty leagues of the sea-coast. The said trustees were thereby empowered to receive and manage the contributions of all persons and corporations inclined to give money for the transporting of people to, and settling them in, the said colony. This corporation was made capable in law to hold and purchase lands, &c. in Great Britain, to the value of one thousand pounds yearly, and in America to an unlimited value, for the said charitable purpose. Their common council was to consist of fifteen persons, with power to make them up twenty-four (as they afterwards were). Georgia was to remain for ever an independent province, save only that the government of its militia shall remain in the governor of South Carolina; but the government of the colony in other respects to be in the trustees for twenty-one years, when it was to be vested in the crown. Liberty of conscience and freedom of worship allowed to all its inhabitants, papists excepted. No trustee to hold lands or office in Georgia. The grants of lands to be registered in England, in the office of the auditor of the plantations."

It may be truly said that the trustees took all possible pains for executing the trust, and no one distinguished himself so much as Mr. (afterwards lieutenant-general) Oglethorpe, who had the principal share in first setting this undertaking on foot. They erected two good towns, Savannah and Frederica, at the north and south extremities of the province, besides several villages and small forts; and one in particular among the Indians, called Augusta, with a small garrison, for the protection of the Indian trade, two hundred and forty miles inland, up the river Savannah. They planted a common nursery-garden for white-mulberry trees, for the feeding of silk-worms. By the planting of Georgia, Carolina has felt the benefit of being able to run out (as they term it) much land, which till that new frontier barrier was established, they had no inclination to do, whereby those lands have been raised to five times their former value about Port Royal and towards the river Savannah.

Georgia produces a great variety of excellent plants and drugs, and orange trees in some parts of it; great plenty of horses and black cattle are raised, and the Saltzburghers (who went over there from Germany) have since raised more corn than the colony could consume. There is plenty of wild fowl, and also fish on its coasts; and since it has fallen under the government of the crown, it gradually increases in people and improvements. Upon the whole, Georgia cannot fail to be of great service to Great Britain on many accounts. The English navy may, in its harbours and bays, in case of a war, safely lie in wait for the Spanish galleons, or for the French from Mississippi, in their return to Europe through the dangerous gulph of Florida. The trustees erected a fort in the country of the Upper Creek Indians, almost four hundred miles from the sea, and not above forty miles from the nearest French fort in Mississippi, whereby all that tract of country is kept possession of for us.

We will now turn our eyes upon the situation of affairs on the continent. The States-general had succeeded in forwarding the project of a marriage between the eldest archduchess of Austria and the duke of Lorraine, by which means the indivisibility of the Austrian dominions, the great object of the pragmatic sanction, was secured, without subjecting Europe to any apprehensions of danger by her matching with a more powerful prince. They had procured a full and perpetual abolition of the Ostend company; and all their disputes with the emperor in East Friesland were adjusted to their entire satisfaction.

The court of Vienna seemed cordially to return to its ancient system of harmony and friendship with Great Britain; but carried its persecutions against its protestant subjects to such an height of cruelty, that the king of England was obliged to interpose in their behalf. France, by the bigotry of cardinal de Fleury, and the blind deference of the sovereign to that minister, was rent in pieces by religious religious dissensions, which, while they destroyed her own internal tranquility, rendered her incapable of disturbing that of her neighbours.

Spain having compassed her favourite point of settling don Carlos in Italy, now undertook an expedition against Oran, a town of some consequence, which lies opposite to Carthage, and which the Spaniards, after having possessed for two hundred years, had lost to the Moors in 1708. This expedition fully answered the purpose for which it had been undertaken, they not only taking Oran, but making themselves also masters of the strong fort of Mazalquivir. It was the armament fitted out for this expedition that had given that alarm to our court, of which I have already taken notice.

Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia, after having abdicated the throne in favour of his son Charles Emanuel, suffered himself to be persuaded by his wife, an ambitious woman, to engage in some intrigues for resuming the sovereign sway; but these being discovered by his son, the reigning king, he ordered his person to be secured at Montcalier, and conveyed to Rivoli, under a strong guard: his wife, the countess of St. Sebastian, was conducted to Ceva.

The dispute that had long subsisted between the king of Prussia and the young prince of Orange, touching his succession to the estates possessed by king William III. (in quality of prince of Orange) was at last adjusted by a formal treaty, signed at Berlin and Dieren.

I shall close this short review of the affairs of Europe this year, with an interesting event that happened in Prussia, where the prince-royal (the present famous king of Prussia), nephew to his Britannic majesty, had fallen under the displeasure of his father; a reconciliation, however, was happily effected this year, by the prince-royal consenting to marry the princess of Bevern, a match which, though rather disagreeable to himself, was the price he was obliged to pay for being re-admitted into favour with his father. The virtues of this lady, however, were such, that when the prince succeeded to the throne, he voluntarily shared with her his royalty.

The Dutch were alarmed about this time with an apprehension of being overwhelmed by an inundation, occasioned by an extraordinary species of worms which bred in the piles and timber-work that supported their dykes, and threatened the destruction of those props of their common-wealth. They prayed, they fasted, they humbled themselves in the most extraordinary manner before heaven, in order to avert a calamity which they knew not how otherwise to guard against: at length they were delivered from their terrors by an hard frost, which effectually destroyed these dangerous enemies. At the close of this year, M. Dieden, plenipotentiary from the elector of Hanover at the imperial court, received the investiture of Bremen and Verden from the hands of the emperor*.

The history of England at this period, cannot but be very dry and unentertaining to the reader, as it furnishes no domestic occurrences worth mentioning, consisting chiefly in an annual revolution of debates in parliament, in which the same arguments are perpetually recurring on the same subjects.

His majesty being returned from his German dominions, the session of parliament was opened on the sixteenth of January, 1733, by a speech from the throne, wherein the king declared, that the situation of affairs, both at home and abroad, rendered it unnecessary for him to lay before the two houses any other reasons for calling them together, but the ordinary dispatch of the public business, and his desire of receiving their advice in such affairs as should require the care and consideration of parliament. When an address of thanks came to be proposed, importing the entire satisfaction of the house at the present situation of affairs, as well foreign as domestic, the country members observed, in opposition to it, that there appeared very little reason for the nation to be satisfied with the present posture of affairs; for, in the first place, it was very well known that the French were actually busied in repairing the fortifications of Dunkirk, in direct violation of the most solemn treaties; that the British merchants were still left exposed to the cruel and insolent depredations of the Spaniards; that the commerce of England daily decreased; and that every session of parliament opened a new scene of villany and imposition: the address, however, was carried by the court party by a considerable majority.

The pension-bill was once more revived, and again lost in the house of peers. All the reasons formerly advanced against a standing army were now repeated, and a reduction of the number warmly insisted upon; but to very little effect, the army being voted on the present establishment. The next debate of note was with regard to the Spanish depredations, when sir Wilfred Lawson made a motion to address his majesty, to know what satisfaction had been made by Spain for the depredations committed on the British merchants. This motion occasioned a violent debate; the minister would gladly have evaded it, but he could not do it with decency, or even without danger. His tenderness for the court of Spain had made him indulge them in various delays, as to the execution of the treaty of Seville, with regard to their harassing the English in America. Sir Robert Walpole was sensible this conduct of his had given the opposition an advantage against him; but he acted on this occasion with great address and no less honour, by frankly owning that his majesty had nothing to lay before the house upon the motion which had been made, as many unforeseen accidents had prevented the commissaries from entering upon business sooner than the month of February last: however, he hoped affairs would be settled in such a manner as to give full satisfaction to every member of that house, and full reparation to every one of the subjects of Great Britain, who had met with a real injury from the Spaniards. This apology, however, was treated with great contempt by the members in the opposition, and the minister, though he could have carried the question, suffered it to go against him, rather than inflame the minds of his adversaries too much, whom he well knew possessed the confidence of the nation. The address was accordingly presented, and an answer came from the crown, which was little more than a copy of the apology which the minister had made in the house.

The warm dispute between the British American sugar-colonies and the British northern colonies, which had lasted from the year 1731, concerning the trade of the latter with the French, Dutch, and Danish sugar-colonies, of which we have already treated, was now reconsidered by the house, and at length finally terminated by the prudent temperament of an act for the better securing and encouraging the trade of his majesty's sugar colonies in America, which laid a duty upon all rum, sugar, and molasses, brought from the northern colonies.

While the commons were deliberating upon the supply, sir Robert Walpole moved, on the twenty-third of February, that five hundred thousand pounds should be issued out of the sinking fund for the service of the ensuing year. It is not to be supposed that a motion of this nature could pass without being severely animadverted upon by the members in the opposition: accordingly sir William Wyndham, Mr. Pulteney, and sir John Barnard, exerted all their force of argumentation to expose the minister for his iniquitous practices of pillaging so sacred a deposit, solemnly appropriated to the discharge of the national debt. Sir Robert heard and answered with amazing temper and coolness, all the invidious reflections, the bitter sarcasms, and the personal invectives with which his opponents loaded him; he knew that the opposition might justly be termed "vox & preterea nihil," a mere empty sound, and that all their objections would vanish before his superior influence. The motion was approved by the majority, and the sum accordingly taken for the use of the crown.

A ferment very dangerous to the minister was, however, now working in the nation. He had begun, so long ago as the year 1724, to encrease the number of excises, by changing the customs on coffee, tea, and chocolate, to an inland duty; he had brought the salt duty, after he had detached it from the sinking fund, and remitted it a short time (to soothe the people), under the same regulation. This last alteration gave some alarm, though the first had passed off very easily; but the scheme which the minister now meditated, and of which he made no secret, namely, an excise upon the two articles of wine and tobacco, had impressed the people with the notion that little less than a general excise was intended. Never in the memory of man was the nation so alarmed at the designs of a minister as in the present case. The court-writers had endeavoured to prepare the people for this new inland duty, by a pamphlet entitled "Some general Considerations concerning the Alteration and Improvement of the Public Revenues;" but for some months before it was proposed in the house, it became the chief subject of contention between the court and country-writers; and the Craftsman in particular gave such a history and picture of excises in his weekly essays, as raised in the people most terrible apprehensions concerning the extension of them. These papers were collected together, and published under the title of "Arguments against Excises." They had their effect, and an universal clamour was raised against the ministerial proposal even before it had been offered to the public. When the parliament met, it was every week expected that sir Robert Walpole would lay his scheme before the commons, and very broad hints were thrown out upon that subject; and in the debates occasioned by the minister's motion for issuing and applying five hundred thousand pounds out of the sinking fund, for the service of the current year, Mr. Pulteney happening to say, that "Though he was aware of the motion now made by that honourable gentleman sitting near him, yet he was in hopes, that what he had now moved for, was not all that he was to open that day in the committee," and then mentioning the excise project, and painting it in the most frightful colours, almost all the gentlemen who spoke after, made a digression from the point under consideration to that in expectation, and anticipated the proposition before it was made. In all probability, however, it was made the sooner on this occasion, the country gentlemen insisting on it while the house was full, and before the members were tired with attendance. The call of the house having been fixed to the seventh of March, sir Robert Walpole then proposed that day sevensnight for resolving into a committee of the whole house, to consider of the most proper methods for the better security and improvement of the duties and revenues charged upon, and payable from, tobacco and wine.

On the fourteenth of March the commissioners of the customs and of the excise attending, pursuant to an order of the preceding day, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer opened and explained his scheme in a long studied speech. He began by taking notice of the arts which had been used to prejudice the people against his scheme before it was known. He affirmed, that the clamours occasioned by these prejudices had originally arisen from smugglers and unfair traders, who had enriched themselves by cheating the public; and that these had been strenuously assisted by another set of men, fond of every opportunity to stir up the people of Great Britain to mutiny and sedition. He expatiated on the frauds that were committed in that branch of the revenue arising from tobacco; upon the hardships to which the American planters were subjected by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill usage they had met with from their factors and correspondents in England, who, from being their servants, were now become their masters; upon the injury done to the fair trader, and the loss sustained by the public in respect to the revenue. He asserted, that the scheme he was about to propose, would remove all these inconveniencies, prevent numberless frauds, perjuries, and false entries, and add two or three hundred thousand pounds per annum to the public revenue. He entered into a long detail of frauds practised by the knavish dealers in those commodities; he recited the several acts of parliament that related to the duties on wine and tobacco; he declared he had no intention to promote a general excise; he endeavoured to obviate some objections that might be made to his plan, the nature of which he at length explained. He proposed to join the laws of excise to those of the customs: that the farther subsidy of three farthings per pound, chargeable upon imported tobacco, should be still levied at the custom-house, and payable to his majesty's civil list, as heretofore: that then the tobacco should be lodged in warehouses, to be appointed for that purpose by the commissioners of the excise; that the keeper of each warehouse, appointed likewise by the commissioners, should have one lock and key, and the merchant importer have another, and that the tobacco should be thus secured until the merchant should find vent for it, either by exportation or home consumption: that the part designed for exportation should be weighed at the custom-house, discharged of the three farthings per pound, which had been paid at its first importation, and then exported without farther trouble: that the portion designed for home consumption should, in the presence of the warehouse-keeper, be delivered to the purchaser, upon his paying the inland duty of four pence per pound weight to the proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant would be eased of the inconvenience of paying the duty upon importation, or of giving bond and finding securities for the payment, before he had found a market for the commodity: that all penalties and forfeitures, so far as they formerly belonged to the crown, should for the future be applied to the use of the public: that appeals in this, as well as in all other cases relating to the excise, should be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majesty, and in the country by the judge of assize upon the next circuit, who should hear and determine such appeals in the most summary manner, without the formality of proceeding in courts of law and equity.

Such was the substance of the famous excise scheme, the proposing of which occasioned the most interesting debate that could happen in a British house of commons. It held till two of the clock next morning, and was managed and maintained by all the ablest speakers on both sides the question. Sir Robert Walpole was answered by Mr. Perry, one of the members for the city of London. Sir Paul Methuen joined in the opposition. Sir John Barnard, another representative of the city of London, distinguished himself in the same cause: he was supported by Mr. Pulteney, sir William Wyndham, and others of the country party; while sir Philip Yorke (now appointed lord chief justice of the King's Bench, and ennobled in the course of the ensuing year), warmly espoused the minister's scheme; as did also sir Joseph Jekyll, master of the Rolls, assisted by the lord Hervey, sir Thomas Robinson, sir William Young, Mr. Pelham, and Mr. Winnington, which last was far the most eminent for talents and address of all the ministerial advocates.

Those who argued against the scheme, accused the minister of having misrepresented the frauds, and made false calculations as to the hardships under which it had been said the planters laboured. They affirmed, that the planters had never thought of complaining, till put upon it by letters and applications from London: that the scheme was so far from being calculated to relieve the planters, that it would expose the factors to such grievous oppression, that they would not be able to continue the trade, consequently the planters would be utterly ruined; and, after all, it would not prevent the frauds against which it was said to be provided: that from the examination of the commissioners of the customs, it appeared that those funds did not exceed forty thousand pounds per annum, and might be in a great measure abolished by a due execution of the laws in being, consequently this scheme was unnecessary, would be ineffectual in augmenting the revenue, destructive to trade, and dangerous to the liberties of the subject, as it tended to promote a general excise, which was in all countries considered as a grievous oppression. They suggested that it would produce an additional swarm of officers and warehouse-keepers appointed and paid by the Treasury, so as to multiply the dependents on the crown, and enable it still farther to check the freedom of elections: that the traders would become slaves to excisemen and warehouse-keepers, as they would be debarred all access to their own commodities except at certain hours, when attended by those officers; that the merchant, for every quantity of tobacco he should sell, would be obliged to make a journey, or send a messenger to the office for a permit, which could not be obtained without trouble, expence, and delay; and that if a law should be enacted in favour of this scheme, it would in all probability be some time or other used as a precedent for introducing excise laws into every branch of the revenue, in which case the liberty of Great Britain would be no more.

After a very warm debate, the question being put, upon a motion made by the minister, that the present duties on wine and tobacco should, from and after the twenty-fourth of June next, cease and determine, it was carried in the affirmative by two hundred and sixty-six against two hundred and five.

The other resolutions subsequent to this, for altering the customs to an inland duty on those commodities, and appropriating this inland duty to the same uses as the customs, were passed without a division. Thus did the excise scheme triumph for the first day; and even on the sixteenth, upon the report of the committee, after another long debate, it was agreed to by much the same majority, when it was ordered that a bill should be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions. As the history of this bill will be ever memorable in Great Britain, I shall give an abstract of it from the Historical Register for the year 1733, with the arguments for and against it, as the only means of giving a just notion of the whole affair.

This famous bill was brought in on the fourth of April, and read the first time, after which Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, by his majesty's command, acquainted the house, that his majesty consented to their making such alterations as they should think fit for the public service, in relation to the subsidy on tobacco, then payable on account of his majesty's civil list. It was next objected, that some parts of the said bill were not within the resolutions of the house pursuant to which the said bill had been ordered to be brought in, and therefore it was moved, that the bill should be withdrawn, which passed in the negative, two hundred and thirty-two against one hundred and seventy-six. Then a motion was made for adjourning, which likewise passed in the negative. At last it was resolved that the bill should be read a second time, on that day sevensnight; two hundred and thirty-six against two hundred. Next day after bringing in of this bill, a motion was made for the printing such a number of copies as should be sufficient for the use of the members of the house; but, upon the question, the Noes had it by one hundred and twenty-eight against one hundred and twelve.

As this bill very much concerned the trade and commerce of this nation, the lord-mayor of the city city of London (John Barber, esq.) procured a copy of it soon after it was brought into the house of commons, and having laid it before the common-council, it was there resolved to petition the house against it; and a petition being immediately drawn up, and agreed to, the same was presented to the house of commons on the tenth of April. The petitioners herein express themselves as follows: "That they presume, in all humility, to express to the house, as they had already done in some measure by their instructions to their members, the universal sense of the nation concerning any farther extension of the laws of excise: that the burden of taxes already imposed on every branch of trade, however cheerfully borne, was severely felt; but the petitioners apprehended that this burden would grow too heavy to be borne, if it was encreased by such vexatious and oppressive methods of levying and collecting the duties, as, they are assured by melancholy experience, the nature of all excises must necessarily produce: that the merchants, tradesmen, and manufacturers of the kingdom, had supported themselves under the pressure of the excise laws now in force, by the comfortable and reasonable expectation, that those laws, which nothing but public necessity could be a motive to enact, would be repealed in favour of the trade of the kingdom and of the liberty of the subject, whenever that motive should be removed, as the petitioners presume it effectually was, by the undisturbed tranquility which the nation enjoyed at home, and the general peace which was so firmly established abroad: that if this expectation should be disappointed; if the excise-laws, instead of being repealed, were extended to other species of merchandize not yet excised, and a door opened for extending them to all; the petitioners cannot, in justice to themselves, to the merchants, tradesmen, and manufacturers of the whole kingdom, and to the general interest of their country, conceal their apprehensions, that the most fatal blow, which ever was given, would be given on this occasion, to the trade and navigation of Great Britain: that that great spring, from which the wealth and property of the subject flowed, would be obstructed, and the mercantile part of the nation would become not only less able to trade to advantage, but unwilling to trade at all; since no person, who could enjoy all the privileges of a British subject out of trade, even with a small fortune, would voluntarily resign some of the most valuable of those privileges, by subjecting himself to the laws of excise: that the petitioners are able to shew, that these apprehensions are founded both in experience and reason; and therefore they hope, that the house will be pleased to hear them by their counsel against the bill."

It has always been a privilege enjoyed by the city of London, that any petition from them is presented to the house by their sheriffs, and brought up by the clerk of the house, and read at the table, without asking the leave of the house for that purpose; whereas all other petitions must be presented by a member of the house, and cannot be by him brought up, or read at the table by the clerk, till leave be first asked and obtained of the house. Accordingly, the petition was brought up and read at the table; and as soon as it was read, sir John represented how much the city and citizens of London, as well as all the other trading parts of the nation would be affected by the bill for altering the method of raising the duties payable upon tobacco, and how just reason they had to insist upon being heard by their council against it; concluding with a motion for granting them leave to be heard by their counsel, if they thought fit.

In opposition to this motion it was insisted on, by the minister and his friends, that it had always been the practice of that house, never to receive any petition, much less to admit counsel to be heard, against any bill for imposing of taxes upon the subject; for that, if such a thing was to be admitted, it would be impossible ever to pass any such bill, because there would be so many different petitions presented against it, by those who were to be subject thereto, that it would be impossible to hear counsel separately upon every such petition within the usual time of the continuance of one session of parliament; and that in refusing to admit counsel to be heard, there could be no inconvenience, because every man, and every body of men, had their representatives in that house, who certainly would represent their case to the house, if any particular hardship was to be put upon them by any bill then before the house.

To this it was replied, that the house had never pretended to any particular custom of refusing petitions, except against those bills which were called money-bills, that was to say, such bills as were brought in for raising money for the service of the current year; and that even as to them there were many precedents where the house had admitted the parties whom they thought to have a real interest therein, to be heard by their counsel against the passing of such bills: that the admitting of counsel, even in such cases, could never prevent the passing such bill, because the house could always order all parties petitioning to be heard at one time, and could give such directions, that it would never take up many days to hear every thing that could be objected by every one of the parties petitioning: that though every part of the nation had their representatives in that house, yet it was very well known, that speaking in public was not the talent of every man; from whence it might happen that the particular persons or part of the nation which was then to be aggrieved by what was passing in the house, might not have any such members as were proper to lay their case fully and clearly before the house; and that therefore, even as to money-bills, it was proper to admit parties to be heard against them, when it appeared that they were very particularly interested therein.

But as to the case then before them, there was not the least pretence for refusing the desire of the petition; because the bill against which it was presented, was no money-bill; on the contrary, it was even insisted on by the advocates for it, as one of the greatest arguments in its favour, that there was no new duties to be imposed; it was a bill only for altering the method of collecting the taxes already imposed; and therefore it could never be pretended that there was any practice or custom of the house to refuse parties interested to be heard against such a bill: that if there had been such a custom introduced, it ought not to be observed, especially when such a considerable body as the lord-lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London came with an humble petition to be heard against the bill, which they thought would not only be highly injurious to them in particular, but destructive to the trade and commerce of the whole nation.

In this debate there were many precedents brought by Mr. Sandys, Mr. Gibbons, and Mr. Bootle, where the house had received petitions, and admitted counsel to be heard against many bills; and there were likewise precedents brought by sir William Young, and Mr. Winnington, where the same had been refused, the reading of which took up a great part of the day.

After the debate had lasted some time, upon putting the question for allowing the petitioners to be heard by their counsel against the bill, there was a division, and the question had a negative put upon it, two hundred and fourteen against one hundred and ninety-seven: after which it was ordered, that the petition should lie upon the table until the said bill should be read a second time.

The strain in which the petition of the city of London was drawn up, could not fail of having great effect with the public, especially as it was seconded by others, in the like style, from Bristol and all the capital towns in the kingdom. The truth is, the minds of the people were wrought up to such a pitch of fury and resentment, as threatened little less than a general rebellion. While the bill was depending with the commons, the house was surrounded with such immense crowds of people, and these too so noisy and riotous, that it was at the imminent hazard of their lives that any who favoured the scheme could either enter or come out. This occasioned sir Robert Walpole to conclude a speech he made in the course of the debate with the following remarkable, though unguarded, expressions. After having declared, that he did not look upon the clamours without doors against the scheme, to be the voice of the nation, "Gentlemen (continued he) may say what they please, of the multitudes now at the door, and in the avenues leading to this house: they may call them a modest multitude, if they will; but, whatever temper they were in when they came hither, it may be very much altered now, after having waited so long at our door: it may be a very easy matter for some designing seditious person to raise a tumult and disorder among them; and when tumults are once begun, no man knows where they will end: he is a greater man than any I know in the nation, that could with the same ease appease them; for this reason I must think, that it was neither prudent nor regular to use any methods for bringing such multitudes to this place, under any pretence whatever: gentlemen may give them what name they think fit: it may be said, that they come hither as humble supplicants; but I know whom the law calls sturdy beggars, and those who brought them down hither could not be certain, that they might not have behaved in the same manner."

It is hardly to be expressed how great a ferment this part of the minister's speech threw the house into; it was with much difficulty they could be brought into such a temper as to be able to resume the debate: at length sir John Barnard stood up, and said, that merchants of character had an undoubted right to come down to the Court of Requests and lobby of the house of commons, in order to solicit their friends and acquaintance against any scheme or project which they might think prejudicial to their commerce; that when he came to the house he saw none but such as deserved the appellation of Sturdy Beggars as little as the honourable gentleman himself, or any gentleman whatever; that it was well known, that the city of London was sufficiently apprized of what was that day to come before the house: where they got their information he knew not; but he was very certain, that they had a right notion of the scheme which had now been opened; and they were so generally and zealously bent against it, that whatever methods might have been used to call them hither, he was sure it would have been impossible to have found any legal methods to have prevented their coming thither.

Although the power of the minister was then very great, tho' he had the success of this scheme very much at heart, and tho' there was no doubt that, had he pushed it, he might have got the bill passed into a law: yet, observing that the whole nation was now alarmed, and beginning to be in fear of his life, he thought proper to drop the design, by moving the next day, April 11, when the bill was about to be read the second time, that such second reading might be postponed to the twelfth day of June next. Though by this motion it evidently appeared that the bill was to be dropped, yet some gentlemen, who had from the beginning appeared strenuously against the whole scheme, were not satisfied with letting it drop in so easy a manner, and therefore they were for having it rejected; but this proposition did not come to a motion, much less to the question, so that the first motion was agreed to without opposition; and upon the Friday after, which was the day appointed for the house to resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to consider farther of the most proper methods for the better security and improvement of the duties and revenues then charged upon and made payable from tobacco and wines, it was resolved, that the house would, upon the fourteenth day of June next, resolve itself into the said committee: so that part of the scheme which related to the duties upon wine was never laid before the house.

Such was the conclusion of a project, which the populace was taught to believe threatened no less than the utter extinction of their liberties and properties; but which, since the rage of party has subsided, has been considered by many sensible and experienced persons in a more favourable light; nay, the most exceptionable parts of this project have, though in another shape, been since passed into a law, and that too at the request and application of those very persons who were most forward in opposing the measure.

However, the miscarriage of the bill was, at the time we are speaking of, celebrated with public rejoicings in London and Westminster; the Monument was illuminated, and the minister burned in effigy by the populace.

There having been great crowds of people about the house of commons on the eleventh of April, and some of them having behaved in a very tumultuous manner, the next day complaint was made to the house, by several members who had voted in in favour of the scheme, "That a tumultuous crowd of people had assembled the night before, and several days during the session, in the Court of Requests and other avenues to that house, and that they themselves, and several other members of the house, had been last night, in their return from the house, menaced, insulted, and assaulted, by a tumultuous crowd of people in the passages to the house*." Whereupon it was ordered and declared, nemine contradicente, "I. That the assaulting, insulting, or menacing any member of that house, in his coming to or going from that house, or upon account of his behaviour in parliament, was an high infringement of the privilege of that house, a most outrageous and dangerous violation of the rights of parliament, and an high crime and misdemeanor. II. That the assembling and coming of any number of persons, in a riotous, tumultuous, and disorderly manner, to that house, in order either to hinder or promote the passing of any bill, or other matters, depending before that house, was an high infringement of the privilege of that house, was destructive of the freedom and constitution of parliament, and an high crime and misdemeanor. III. That the inciting and encouraging any number of persons to come in a riotous, tumultuous, and disorderly manner, to that house, in order either to hinder or promote the passing of any bill, or other matter depending before that house, was an high infringement of the privilege of the house, destructive of the freedom and constitution of parliament, and an high crime and misdemeanor."

Then it was ordered, "I. That the members of that house who served for the city of London should signify the same to the lord-mayor of London. II. That the members of that house who served for the county of Middlesex, should signify the said resolutions and declarations to the sheriff of Middlesex. III. That the members of that house, who served for the city of Westminster, should signify the said resolutions to the high bailiff of Westminster." Which orders were accordingly signified by their respective members, who next day reported their having done so to the house†.

After the miscarriage of the excise-scheme, the house unanimously resolved to enquire into the frauds and abuses in the customs, and a committee of twenty-one members was chosen by ballot for this purpose. The subsequent debates of this session were occasioned by a bill to prevent the infamous practice of stock-jobbing, which with great difficulty made its way to the house of lords, who made some amendments, in consequence of which it was laid aside; and by another bill, establishing a lottery to raise five hundred thousand pounds, for the relief of those who had suffered by the Charitable Corporation. After having undergone some alterations, it passed through both houses, and received the royal assent.

His majesty having at this time determined for some wise reasons of state, to bestow his eldest daughter, the princess royal, upon the prince of Orange, he sent a message to the commons, on the eighth of May, acquainting them with the same. He said, he made no doubt that this match would be acceptable to all his good subjects, and therefore promised himself the assistance and concurrence of the house in enabling him to give such a portion to his eldest daughter, as should be suitable to the present occasion, and might contribute towards supporting with honour and dignity an alliance that would tend so much to the farther security of the protestant succession on the throne of these realms, and the farther strengthening the protestant interest on the continent of Europe.

In reply to this message, the commons returned a most warm and affectionate address, and immediately voted, that out of the money arising from the sale of lands in the island of St. Christopher's, his majesty should be empowered to apply the sum of eighty thousand pounds as a marriage-portion for his eldest daughter.

The last affair in this session which engaged the attention of the commons, was a question concerning the constitution of their house. Lieutenant-general Wade, member for Bath, had been appointed governor of Fort William, Fort George, and Augustus, in Scotland; the point therefore in dispute was, whether his accepting those offices had vacated his seat in parliament? The anticourtiers were strenuous in maintaining the affirmative; and in support of their opinion they produced a number of precedents, and then moved, "That the accepting a commission of governor or lieutenant-governor of any fort, citadel, or garrison, upon the military establishment of Great Britain, by any member of the house who was an officer of the army, should vacate his seat as member of parliament." The question, however, being put, was carried by the court, ninety-six against eighteen; and this determination has been regarded as decisive of all succeeding cases of the like nature.

Several warm attacks were made on the minister in the house of peers, during the course of this session; particularly on the thirtieth of May, a motion was made to resolve, "That it is the opinion of this house, that the produce of the sinking fund should be applied for the future towards reducing such taxes as are most grievous to the subject, oppressive to the manufacturer, or detrimental to trade." This motion occasioned a long and warm debate, in which all the arguments which have been already recited for taking money from the sinking fund, were repeated, as also those against it. The lords, however, which supported this motion (amongst whom the lords Carteret and Bathurst distinguished themselves) said, that a great difference lay between the interest of the creditors of the public and the interest of the nation; for though the former might find it for their interest not to draw their money out of the public funds, yet it never could be the interest of the nation that taxes should be perpetuated, which must be the case, if the money of the sinking fund continued to be alienated. In reply to this, the lords of the court-party said, that the taking money from the sinking fund was in fact no alienation of it from the purposes of its first establishment, and that the interest of the nation could not be more effectually

consulted, than by easing the landed interest, which was done by applying part of the money of the sinking fund to the service of the current year. The motion being rejected, among other reasons, for being a motion for a resolution very improper for a house of peers to come to, a strong protest was entered by eighteen lords, in which they very clearly and impartially stated all that had been urged for the motion; but the most remarkable was the close of the protest, and which was directly levelled at the minister. It ran thus:

"We insist with great earnestness and concern on this point, from our observation of what has lately passed on the occasion of attempts being made to extend the cruel and arbitrary methods practised under the laws of excise, and naturally and necessarily, as we apprehend, flowing from them. If any new law of this kind has passed elsewhere, we persuade ourselves it could not have prevailed in this house: but we think it the more incumbent upon us, after such an attempt, and such national resentment expressed against it (both which are of public notoriety), to promote as effectually as we are able, the quiet and happiness of his majesty's reign, by cutting off any hopes or fears which may be still entertained, that such a project will some time or other succeed; and to this good and laudable end we conceive, that nothing would have contributed more, than such a solemn declaration of the sense of this house, as is contained in the question."

The affairs of the South Sea company were at this time run into great disorder: the lords of the opposition moved, and carried their motion, that the directors of that company should lay an account of the produce of the forfeited estates which had belonged to the former directors, who had been mulcted by the parliament. From this it appeared, that the large sums of money arising from those forfeited estates had been distributed among the proprietors by way of dividend, even before recourse was had to parliament for directions in what manner that produce should be applied. Lord Bathurst therefore moved for a resolution of the house, that the disposal of this money by way of dividend, without any order of a general court for that purpose, was a violation of the act of parliament made for the disposal thereof, and a manifest injustice done to the proprietors of that stock. This motion, however, was defeated by a majority of members in the court interest; and then the house ordered, that the present and former directors of the South Sea company, together with the late inspectors of their accounts, should attend and be examined. They were accordingly interrogated; but as no direct proof could be established of any embezzlement, and as the discussion of the matter would have been attended with more bad than good consequences, the majority thought proper to postpone the scrutiny*. A bill, however, passed, for converting a farther part of the capital stock of the South Sea company into annuities, redeemable by parliament.

The persecution against the protestants in Germany, particularly the Saltzburghers, still reigning, it was thought, by many of the public-spirited gentlemen concerned in the scheme for settling the colony of Georgia, that it would be good policy to grant those unhappy people an asylum in the British dominions in America, particularly in that infant colony, which, through the indefatigable pains of Mr. Oglethorpe, wore a very promising aspect: a petition was accordingly presented to parliament for that purpose, who were pleased to give encouragement to the proposal, and even to grant ten thousand pounds to the trustees, out of the sale of the lands in the island of St. Christopher's, for carrying it into execution.

On the eleventh of June, the public business being by that time all dispatched, the king put an end to the session with a short but severe speech against the authors of the heats and animosities that had been lately spread through the nation.

It is by no means foreign to this history, to observe, that this same year, 1733, a new and most laudable corporation was erected for promoting English protestant working schools in Ireland. Mr. Anderson, author of the Origin of Commerce, tells us, that he having been at this time somewhat useful in corresponding with Dr. Maule, then bishop of Dromore, for promoting the charter of the corporation, received from that bishop the following well vouched account of the number of people, both protestants and papists, in all Ireland; a matter sufficiently curious to claim a place in the body of this work.

By the bishop's books, and other authentic vouchers, it appeared that there were at least two millions of people in that island, of which there are very near six hundred thousand protestants, and somewhat above one million four hundred thousand papists, or nearly five papists to two protestants. The following is a list of the total of both religions in the four great divisions, called provinces, of Ireland, viz.

old marshal Schomberg, said, "This island is well worth fighting for."

We are now to attend foreign affairs. The court of Spain, this year, fell upon a project for erecting an East India company for trading to the Philippine Islands directly from Cadiz, by the Cape of Good Hope; and although it concerned all the other European nations trading to India, yet it more especially concerned the Dutch to oppose it, as it was directly contrary to the latter part of the Vth article of the treaty of Munster, anno 1648, between Spain and them; and as the same article had been lately successfully made use of against the Ostend company of the Spanish or Austrian Netherlands, it might be yet more strongly opposed to the erection of this new company, viz. "Moreover it is stipulated and agreed, that the Spaniards shall confine their navigation in the East Indies in such manner as it is at present possessed by them, without having it in their power to extend the same any farther. As also the inhabitants of the Netherlands shall abstain from frequenting those places which belong to the Castilians in the East Indies." Now the East India trade, as then possessed by Spain, was practised solely from New Spain to the Philippines, and back to the port of Acapulco; but no East India trade at all from Spain by the way of the Cape of Good Hope: wherefore the Dutch at this time most justly and zealously, and in the end effectually, opposed so palpable a contravention of that treaty. But it is probable I may have occasion to mention this subject again, and therefore shall at present say no more of it.

On the fifth of February this year (1733) died Augustus II. king of Poland, whose death opened a new and dreadful scene of war in Europe, the neighbouring princes interesting themselves strongly in the choice of a new sovereign. The elector of Saxony, son to the late monarch, and Stanislaus, whose daughter was married to the French king, declared themselves candidates. The emperor, the czarina, and the king of Prussia espoused the cause of the Saxon: it was natural for the king of France to support the pretensions of his father-in-law; and no sooner was he informed that the emperor had assembled a body of forces in Silesia, than he ordered the duke of Berwick to advance to the Rhine with a numerous army, and take measures for entering Germany, in case the Imperialists should attempt to penetrate into Poland, on the frontiers of which they, and a large body of Russian troops, were now hovering.

In the mean time Stanislaus, who was still at the court of France, found means to transport himself privately into Warsaw, the capital of Poland, where he continued undiscovered till he found it for his interest to appear in public. As the day of election drew nigh, the Russian and Prussian ministers delivered their several declarations, by way of protest, against the eventual election of Stanislaus, as a proscribed person, and one rendered for ever incapable of wearing the crown.

About the middle of August, the Russian general Lascki entered Poland, at the head of fifty thousand men: the diet of the election was opened with the usual ceremony. Prince Winozawiski, chief of the Saxon interest, retired to the other side of the Vistula (or Wiezer) with three thousand men, including some of the nobility who adhered to the party of Augustus. The primate of Poland, who always acts as regent during an interregnum, endeavoured to reconcile all differences among the grandees, in order to proceed peaceably to the new election: Stanislaus was unanimously chosen king, and appeared in the electoral field, where he was received with loud acclamations. Augustus's party protested against the election, and, being now increased to ten thousand men, they joined the Russian army, which had advanced by hasty marches. Stanislaus, sensible of his inability to withstand such powerful enemies, retired, with the primate and French ambassador, to Denmark, leaving the palatine of Kiow at Warsaw. This general attacked the Saxon palace, which was instantly surrendered, and the soldiers and inhabitants plundered the houses belonging to the grandees who had declared for Augustus, as likewise the hotel of the Russian ambassador.

While these transactions passed, the Poles, who had joined the Muscovites, finding it impossible to pass the Vistula before the expiration of the time fixed for the session of the diet, erected a colo, or great council, at Cracow, where the elector of Saxony was chosen, and proclaimed by the bishop of that place, king of Poland, by the name of Augustus III. on the sixth day of October. The two armies then crossed the river, and the palatine of Kiow retiring towards Cracow, they took possession of Warsaw, where, in their turn, they plundered the palaces and houses belonging to the opposite party.

Mean while the French king, incensed at the part the emperor had acted against his father-in-law, entered into a treaty with the courts of Madrid and Turin, by which they agreed jointly to declare war against the emperor. These three powers had their respective interests, but they all concurred in one view, namely, the weakening the house of Austria.

The dukes of Savoy had been a long time gradually encreasing their dominions, by sometimes assisting the emperors, and sometimes declaring against them. The king of Sardinia, Charles Emanuel, hoped to procure the duchy of Milan, and it had been promised him both by the ministers of Versailles and Madrid. Philip V. king of Spain, or rather Elizabeth of Parma, his consort, aspired at more considerable establishments for the royal offspring than Parma and Placentia. Lewis XV. sought to aggrandize his own glory by pulling down his enemies. Never was negotiation more speedily concluded, than that which united these three monarchs, and Europe was now filled with manifestoes by all the parties at variance.

England could not declare herself without the concurrence of the United Provinces; and that cautious republic shewed no great readiness to launch into an expensive and ruinous war, merely for the sake of supporting the emperor's quarrel. In vain did the Imperial ministers solicit, with the greatest earnestness, both our court and the States-general, to take the most speedy and vigorous measures to prevent their ally from being crushed by the power of his enemies, and the ballance of power in Europe thereby utterly disjointed: we both stood by, unconcerned spectators of the rapid progress of the French, who passed the Rhine in the month of October, under the duke of Berwick, and laid siege to Fort Kehl, which he soon reduced; while another body of French forces, under marshal Villars, Villars, joined by the king of Sardinia, subdued Pavia, Pizzighitone, Cremona, Secco, Frezzo, with the fort of Fuentes; and not long after marshal de Villars ended a glorious career, at the age of eighty-two, after having reduced the important city of Milan.

The emperor, dreading the effects of such a powerful confederacy against him, offered to accommodate all differences with the crown of Spain, under the mediation of the king of England; and Mr. Keene, the British minister at the court of Madrid, made proposals for that purpose. Philip expressed his acknowledgements to the king of England; but declared that the emperor's advances came too late, and that his own resolutions were already taken. In the mean time he sent a powerful army into Italy, under the duke of Montemar, who reduced the whole kingdom of Naples, which was bestowed upon the infant don Carlos, who had already been acknowledged hereditary prince of Tuscany. Thus did the emperor Charles VI. lose almost all Italy, by giving a king to Poland; and a son of the king of Spain obtained, in two campaigns, the Two Sicilies, which had been so often before taken and retaken, and had been the constant objects of the attention of the house of Austria for above two centuries. All this time the other potentates of Europe looked on without intermeddling: the Venetians declared they would take no share in the war in Italy; the Dutch soon entered into a neutrality with France; and we, in concert with those states, employed ourselves in mediations, instead of affording the desired assistance.

On the seventh of November, this year, his serene highness the prince of Orange arrived, in the Fubbs yacht, at Greenwich; proceeded, in one of the king's barges, to the Tower, and from thence, in one of his majesty's coaches, to Somerset-house; and the next day was received by the royal family with the greatest respect. Soon after his highness was taken ill, which retarded his marriage for some time.

Not long after the rising of the parliament, the court party lost one of its ablest advocates in the earl of Chesterfield, who, being disgusted at the conduct of the minister, resigned his place of steward of his majesty's household. The duke of Montrose relinquished his office of lord privy-seal of Scotland; and his example was followed by lord Clinton, one of the lords of his majesty's bed-chamber, and lord-lieutenant of the county of Devon. About the same time the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham were deprived of their posts in the army. These removals and resignations gave great uneasiness to the public, which was, however, in some measure allayed by some promotions in the law, which were universally agreeable. Mr. Talbot, solicitor-general, one of the most accomplished lawyers and upright judges in the kingdom, was constituted lord high chancellor of Great Britain, and created baron Talbot of Hensoll; sir Philip Yorke, attorney-general, was advanced to the office of lord chief-justice of the court of King's Bench, and honoured with a peerage, by the title of lord Hardwicke: the place of solicitor-general was then bestowed on Mr. (afterwards sir) Dudley Ryder, and that of attorney-general on Mr. (afterwards sir) John Willes.

The year 1733 was distinguished by the death of many persons of high rank: George Byng, lord viscount Torrington, so famous for the defeat he gave the Spaniards in 1718, died on the seventeenth of January, and was succeeded by sir Charles Wager as first lord of the admiralty: on the twenty-second of the same month died the earl of Pembroke, who had gone through the greatest offices of state since the Revolution: on the nineteenth of March died lord Raymond, lord chief-justice of the King's Bench: on the seventh of May died the earl of Cholmondeley; and in October died Henrietta, the young duchess of Marlborough, by which that title devolved to her sister's son, the earl of Sunderland; and about the same time the duchess of Ormond departed this life.

This year, indeed, was ushered in with an epidemic disorder, much like a cold, which attacked all sorts of people, and proved fatal to great numbers, particularly those in years, insomuch that in one week, the last in January, the Weekly Bills were at the amazing height of fifteen hundred and eighty-eight, being more by six hundred than had died in any one week since the great plague.

It may not be altogether useless to remark, that his majesty having, in the course of this year, by proclamation, prohibited the passing or circulating of the old and much worn-out gold coins of the realm, of twenty-five and twenty-three shillings, commonly called Broad Pieces, and the halves and quarters thereof, he also, for the ease of his people, directed his receivers of taxes, and also the officers of his mint, to receive them at four pounds one shilling per ounce troy, during one whole year; and that such of them as should be so brought to the mint, should be coined into the modern current gold coins of the kingdom. But it being apprehended that the advantage of so good an allowance as four pounds one shilling per ounce might be a temptation for bad persons to counterfeit the said old coins, a law was passed afterwards, making such a practice high-treason, and forty pounds reward was offered to such as should discover the counterfeiters thereof.

On the 17th of January, 1734, the parliament met, and the session was opened with a speech from the throne as usual, in which, among other things, his majesty told the two houses, "That though he was no way concerned in the war which had broke out in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the contending powers, he could not remain an idle spectator of the present events, or be indifferent about the consequences of a war undertaken and supported by such a powerful confederacy. He said, he had thought proper to take time to examine the facts alledged on both sides, and to wait the result of the councils of those powers which were more immediately interested in the consequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, more particularly with the States-general of the United Provinces, such measures as should be thought most adviseable for the common safety, and for restoring the peace of Europe; that he should order the estimates to be laid before them, of such services as demanded their present and immediate care: that the augmentation, which would be proposed for the sea-service, would be very considerable; but he was confident, they would think it reasonable and necessary: that he must particularly recommend to their care the debt of the navy, which had been every year laid before them; but, from the present circumstances stances of the times, he believed, they would be persuaded, that it now required some provision to be made for it; a thing that could not well be longer postponed, without manifest detriment to the public service: that, as these extraordinary charges and expences were unavoidable, he made no doubt but they would effectually raise the supplies necessary for defraying them, with that readiness and dispatch, and with that just regard to the true interest of his people, which this parliament had hitherto shewn upon all occasions: that he hoped they would proceed in all their deliberations with such temper and unanimity, and such expedition in the public business, as might give him the sooner an opportunity of taking the sense of a new parliament: that he flattered himself his present resolutions would meet with their hearty concurrence and approbation; and, whatever insinuations might be thrown out against the conduct of the government, he was confident a little time would effectually remove all groundless jealousies, and make it appear, that Great Britain ought always to act that part which the honour and interest of the nation called upon it to undertake."

The motion for an address of thanks produced, as usual, a debate in both houses, which, it must be confessed, appears to have proceeded more from a spirit of contradiction and cavilling, than from any reasonable cause of objection.

On the twenty-third of January the commons agreed to address his majesty for a copy of the treaty of Vienna in 1731, with the secret and separate articles, and the States-general's act of concurrence; and on the same day sir John Rushout moved for another address, desiring that the letters and instructions relating to the execution of the treaty of Seville should be submitted to the inspection of the commons.

This motion introduced a long and violent debate. Sir W. Yonge observed, that the treaty of Seville being prior to that of Vienna, letters and instructions relating to the former could have no connection or concern with the latter: that nothing could be more improper than to call for papers which might reveal the nature of any negotiation that was then upon the carpet: that nevertheless, if the house should think fit to take the treaty of Seville under their consideration, it might then be proper to call for any particular paper that might give light to their deliberations; but if they want to confine their present enquiries to the treaty of Vienna, the motion now made was altogether improper.

Sir W. Wyndham on the contrary declared it his opinion, that the impossibility of carrying the treaty of Seville into execution had given rise to the stipulations contained in the treaty of Vienna; and that they could not pretend to judge of the propriety of the latter, without having the papers that related to the former laid before the house.

After a hard struggle this motion was overruled; but the opposition, far from being discouraged by this defeat, resolved to return to the attack with double vigour. Accordingly, on the twenty-fifth day of January, Mr. Sandys, a gentleman who had for some time appeared strenuous in the opposition, and had a surprising perseverance in wrangling, moved, that the house should examine the instructions which had been sent to the British minister in Poland some years before the death of king Augustus, that they might be the better able to judge of the causes which produced this new rupture among the powers of Europe. The intention of this motion was to come at the truth of a report which had pretty confidently prevailed, that the British ministry had not only favoured the election of Stanislaus, but had even entered into a secret engagement with France, to assist her in supporting him on the Polish throne.

This motion was violently opposed by all the court-party, and insisted on with no less vehemence by those in the opposition. In the debate the several speakers gave into the most unwarrantable and ungentleman-like personalities, the repetition of which would disgrace a national history; and they were carried on both sides so far, that the speaker was obliged to inform the gentlemen, that they had lost sight of the question, which he again read. Then sir W. Wyndham, who was always decent and parliamentary, stood up to support Mr. Sandys's motion by clear argumentation. He began by observing, that this motion implied no disrespect to his majesty, but only tended to canvass the conduct of the minister, and that the papers called for might be necessary for that effect: that this he said, in order to obviate the arguments that might possibly be urged in favour of the ministry, as if the motion was unnecessary and disrespectful, because his majesty at the opening of the parliament had told them, that he was in no wise engaged in the war, and had no concern except by his good offices in those transactions, which had been declared to be the principal causes and motives of the rupture: that, in a constitutional sense, the speech of the king was to be considered as the speech of the minister; and that the house had even a right to enquire, whether his majesty's declarations were or were not agreeable to truth: that it was well known the States-general had concluded a treaty of neutrality, without the knowledge or consent of England; a circumstance which seemed to imply a distrust of the British power, or at least a suspicion that they could not with safety place any confidence in the councils of the British ministry.

Sir Robert Walpole stood up in person to answer this gentleman, and refute his allegations. He said, he did not deny that the king's speech was to be considered as the speech of the minister; but still he thought it ought to be treated with decency, as it was stamped with the sanction of his majesty's name; and that in any event it was both unjust and unparliamentary to arraign it of falsehood, without producing any one charge against it, except such as were founded on bare surmises and vain suppositions. He took notice, that all the late motions about papers were calculated to plunge the nation precipitately into war in a quarrel and at a conjuncture when there was no great occasion to deliberate. "I believe, continued he, it will appear that our present situation is one of the very best that the nation could possibly be in, with relation to the present posture of the affairs of Europe. The gentleman who spoke last thought proper to mention the states of Holland, and to affirm they have done something for their own security: it is true they have done something; they have entered into a treaty of neutrality, whereas we have remained entirely inactive; but on that very account I look upon the English to be in a much better condition than the Dutch: by that neutrality they have engaged not to act at all, nor to concern themselves in the present war: we are still at liberty, and may on any event take that part which shall then appear most for the interest of Great Britain."

In the course of the debate Mr. Pulteney reflected on the scandalous decisions, as he called them, of the majorities in parliament, and inveighed with great severity against the majority who had rejected the two late motions, and whom, he supposed, were influenced and directed by the minister. This charge, added to the assertions which were daily advanced with the utmost confidence, in the legion of pamphlets and papers which at this time swarmed throughout the nation, that every member who voted for the minister was a mercenary hireling, and sold his voice for the sake of place or pension, in possession or expectancy, made sir Robert think it necessary to seize this occasion to exculpate himself and his friends from so black a charge. This he endeavoured to do in a speech, from which I shall here give the reader an extract, by way of specimen of this great man's talent for oratory.

"An honourable gentleman, sir, who spoke some time ago, took indeed a great deal of liberty in talking of majorities; but I would have gentlemen to know, that when they talk of such majorities at present, they speak of their equals as members of this house, of their equals on any ground in England: let gentlemen but cast their eyes round the house, and they will find a number of gentlemen superior to the highest number of their minority, who can as little be suspected of corruption, as any of those who generally appear on the minority of the question.

"It is easy for gentlemen to represent the measures lately taken by the government, as unwise, inconsistent, and the like; but when the day comes for enquiring into them, which I as heartily wish for as any in this house, I believe those measures will appear in a quite different light; and those gentlemen who may, perhaps, have hearkened to every little whisper of some of the foreign ministers at this court, which is, I believe, the only foundation for what they have asserted, will find themselves at last sorely disappointed. Whenever such an enquiry shall be resolved on, I doubt not but the majority of this house will agree to call for every paper that can be thought necessary for giving a full information of the present state of the nation: but this is not the question at present, nor are we now to enquire, whether his majesty has had any share in those transactions which have given occasion to the present war; and therefore, I cannot think we have, at present, any thing to do with any instructions to his majesty's ministers in Poland, or elsewhere.

"His majesty, it is true, expects the assistance of his parliament; but for what? He does not immediately expect such an assistance as to enable him to take any part in the present war; he wants only such as may enable him to put the nation in a proper posture of defence; and surely we may determine what will be necessary for that end, without enquiring into any of our foreign negotiations. It is for this reason, sir, that I think the house has done right in rejecting all the motions hitherto made for letters and instructions relating to our foreign affairs; and for the same reason, I make no doubt but they will likewise reject the present motion."

After these and some other speeches the question was put, when the motion was overpowered by the majority; and this was the fate of several other proposals made by the members of the opposition. Sir John Barnard presented a petition from the druggists, and other dealers in tea, complaining of the insults and oppression to which they were subjected by the excise-laws, and praying relief. Sir John and Mr. Perry, another of the city members, explained the grievous hardships which those traders sustained, and moved that the petition might be referred to the consideration of the whole house. They were opposed by sir W. Yonge and Mr. Winnington, and other friends of the minister, and very warm debates ensued thereupon; but in the end the minority were baffled, who seemed to display the most consummate talents in satire, argument, and reasoning, for no other purpose but to add to the triumph of those they opposed.

Great debates also arose about a motion for an addition of one thousand eight hundred men to the number of land-forces which had been continued since the preceding year; in which the opposition exhibited greater proofs of personal animosity against the minister than of a real attention to the interests of their country, or the safety and advantage of the kingdom. The augmentation, however, was carried in despite of all their efforts; but they resolved, in return, to clog the wheels of administration with every rub they could possibly throw in its way. With this view, less patriotic than invidious, they laid hold of the dismissal of the duke of Bolton and the lord Cobham from their respective regiments, to raise a furious outcry against the minister, as if these noblemen had been set aside merely because they had refused to concur implicitly with all the court measures. On the thirteenth of February the lord Morpeth, eldest son of the earl of Carlisle, made a motion in the house of commons for a bill to prevent the officers of the army from being deprived of their commissions, otherwise than by the judgment of a court-martial to be held for that purpose, or by address of either house of parliament. Even the friends of this motion were struck at first hearing it, with a sense of the absurd manner in which it was expressed, which indeed tended to little else than the establishing a stratocracy, or absolute despotism in the army, as it took from the sovereign the power of removing from his command even the general of the forces, however dangerous or disloyal the designs or conduct of such general might be: the motion was therefore amended, and restricted to "officers not above the rank of colonels." Extravagant as this motion was, it was sustained with great vigour and address by the ablest speakers among the minority: the noble lord who made it had recourse, in defending it, to the government of foreign countries, and particularly mentioned the example of Holland and Sweden. In the former country, he said, no officer could be broken without the sentence of a court-martial; and in the latter none could be removed from his commission without the consent of the senate. He was seconded by sir John Rushout, Rushout, who observed, that there were then upwards of forty officers of the army members of that house; and said, that by the house agreeing to the motion, it would effectually secure the independency of those gentlemen upon the minister, which would not a little contribute to the freedom of votes, as well within that house as without, on the occasion of elections. And here it will be proper to hint to the reader; that this was supposed to be the last session of the present parliament; and therefore the anti-courtiers endeavoured to weaken the influence of the minister as much as possible, in order to break the powerful majority which had so long put a negative upon their most favourite motions.

These arguments were answered by Mr. Clutterbuck, colonel Bladon, Mr. Winnington, sir Thomas Robinson, and other gentlemen of the court-party, who all vehemently opposed the motion, which they treated as absurd and extravagant, and the most bare-faced attempt to unhinge the constitution, and introduce a commonwealth; that had ever been made since the commencement of the civil wars under Charles I. Should this motion, they said, be approved, the whole of the British constitution would soon be at the mercy of the army: that at present the officers depended on the king for their commissions, and the army itself upon the parliament for its countenance and pay; but if the parliament should once make the officers independent of the crown; and give them a sort of freehold in their commissions, they would soon make both king and parliament dependent on them: for could it be supposed, that if both king and parliament should be inclinable to make a reduction of the army hereafter; those gentlemen, with swords in their hands, would willingly comply, and retire to their respective habitations at the desire of the commons? Would they not rather tell the commons that their commissions were for life? They were their freehold, made so by a law of the parliament, and that they could not be deprived of them unless they had been guilty of some crime, which could only be determined by a court-martial? and in that case gentlemen might easily guess what redress the nation could expect from a court-martial, every member of which must necessarily be personally interested in opposing the will of king and parliament in the matter of military reduction.

The debate was concluded by sir Robert Walpole, who, after affirming that the motion aimed at reducing the government to a military constitution, said, that he knew great endeavours had been of late used to make it believed abroad, that this was a divided nation, and the people disaffected; and that, should this proposition receive the sanction of the legislature, it would induce foreigners to give credit to what they had heard; for they would naturally infer that the parliament had no confidence in the king, and had therefore taken from him that power which his predecessors enjoyed. This, he observed, might produce a multitude of evils, especially at this juncture; and therefore, he thought, they should all say on this occasion what their forefathers said on another, "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari."

The debate being closed, the question was put, and carried in the negative without a division. The opposition however had another stroke in reserve; for no sooner was the opinion of the house declared on this motion than Mr. Sandys made another for an address to the king, desiring to know who addressed his majesty to remove the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham from their respective regiments. He was seconded by Mr. Pulteney and sir W. Wyndham; but the ministry foreseeing another tedious dispute, called for the question, and the motion was set aside by the majority.

The next source of contention was a bill for securing the freedom of parliament, by limiting the number of officers in the house of commons. It was read a first and a second time; but when a motion was made for its being committed, it met with a strong opposition, and produced a warm debate, which issued in a question that, like the former, underwent a negative.

Many great inconveniencies to commerce, and frequent frauds, having long notoriously prevailed by means of stock-jobbing in the city of London, a bill was brought in to prevent that infamous practice, by prohibiting and rendering void all bargains for stocks bought or sold, for a future time, by persons on one hand not possessed of such stock, and on the other, by many not of circumstances or ability to pay for such stock, whereby many unwary persons, and their innocent families, have been undone. This bill was proposed by the minority, and the passive conduct of the ministry, who suffered it to pass into a law, with little or no opposition, seems in some degree to invalidate a charge generally alleged against sir Robert Walpole, and perhaps too implicitly believed; namely, that the principal part of his income, and that of his family, arose from trading in the stocks; and that, as he was in the secret of affairs both at home and abroad, he made use of his knowledge to influence the funds in the manner he thought most advantageous to himself and his dependents.

But the subject which of all others in the course of this session produced the most violent debates between the two parties, was, a motion made by Mr. Bromley for repealing the act for septennial parliaments.

In support of this motion he alleged, that the reasons for prolonging the sitting of parliaments from three to seven years, were now at an end: that the people in general looked upon septennial parliaments as a grievance and innovation in the constitution: that he begged leave to remind the house of the act made in the sixteenth of Charles II. which wisely provided against the too long continuance of one and the same parliament, by ordaining that a new parliament should be called once in three years, or oftener if need required: that this act was expressly confirmed by the bill of rights: that from the time of the Revolution to the first year of the late king, no parliament had sat above three years, and some only one session: that he thought triennial parliaments were more grievous than annual ones, and consequently septennial parliaments must be doubly more grievous than those which lasted only three years: that supposing he should be mistaken in this point, which nevertheless he could never admit without due conviction, the argument in the preamble to the septennial bill was altogether inapplicable to the present times: the act against bribery and corruption, he said, would necessarily remedy that evil, as it would prevent corruption in the elections;

but nothing but the frequent return of new parliaments could prevent it in the elected. In order to effectuate this desirable purpose, he moved, that leave be given to bring in a bill for repealing the septennial act, and for the more frequent meeting and calling of parliaments.

Sir John St. Aubin, knight of the shire for Cornwall, and a gentleman of considerable influence in the house, stood up to second this motion. In the course of his speech he gave an historical detail of the duration of parliaments from the time of Henry VIII. shewed how triennial parliaments came to be lost by the revival of the septennial act; and endeavoured to prove that septennial parliaments were better adapted than triennial ones for the purposes of a wicked minister; and that, in proportion to the frequency of parliaments, they were more advantageous both to the king and people.

These and many other arguments were used in favour of this motion, which was opposed by the whole weight of court influence: the ministry in particular insisted on the great increase of popery and Jacobitism in the kingdom, as a reason against weakening the hands of government at this time: they called upon those on the other side of the question to produce a single instance in which the administration had encroached upon the rights and liberties of the people since the septennial act had taken place; or to shew that his present majesty had ever endeavoured to extend any branch of the royal prerogative beyond its legal bounds.

Sir John Willes, the new attorney-general, made a long and learned speech in favour of septennial parliaments, in which he endeavoured to prove, that the transition from triennial parliaments to septennial was in itself a right measure, and agreeable to the true principles of the English government: nay, he insisted that even the triennial act was not obtained upon the principles of liberty, but merely with design to distress king William and the friends of the Revolution, which, he said, had the effect looked for by the proposers of this alteration, by drawing that monarch into several engagements, equally disadvantageous and disgraceful to him and his people, and were afterwards made a handle by his enemies to depreciate and revile his government. With regard to the objection made by some gentlemen, that the elected during a long parliament were apt to lose their dependence on their constituents, a thing which could never happen if parliaments were annual, he begged leave to remark, that although all the members of the house had undoubtedly a dependence upon the people for their election; yet after they were chosen, and had taken their seats in the house, he thought that dependence ceased, at least in so far as regarded their behaviour in parliament, the whole power of the electors then devolving upon the members, who, in every question that came before the house, were to regard only the public good in general, and to determine according to their own judgments; otherwise they could not be said to act freely, nor could such parliaments be called free parliaments.

This doctrine of the independency of members upon their constituents after elections, gave so much offence to sir John Barnard, that he thought proper to answer it in a particular speech, in which he accused the attorney-general of advancing a doctrine altogether new. He declared, that he valued himself more upon the honour of sitting in that house, as one of the representatives of the people, elected such by their free and uncorrupted choice, than he should do on the greatest honours the crown could bestow; and that he thought the dependence he had, and should always acknowledge to have, on his constituents, preferable to any mercenary dependence on the greatest sovereign in the universe. At last, the subject being entirely exhausted, the question was put and carried in the negative by a great majority.

On the twenty-eighth of March sir Robert Walpole delivered a message from the crown to the house of commons, importing, "That as the war which had lately broke out in Europe still continued to rage, his majesty hoped he might be enabled to augment his forces, if such augmentation should be found necessary between the dissolution of this parliament and the election of another." This message, introduced as it were by surprise into the house, at the latter end of a session, when a great many members had retired to their country seats, could not fail of alarming those who thought unfavourably of the minister: they considered it as a stroke aimed at the vitals of our liberties; they made a suitable stand against it; they disputed every inch of the argumentation: nor did they recede till, borne down by the weight of superior numbers, they perceived all farther contest vain. The result was, the voting and presenting an address to his majesty, signifying the compliance of his faithful commons with his royal request. In consequence of another message, the house prepared and passed a bill, empowering his majesty to settle an annuity of five thousand pounds for life on the princess-royal, as a mark of his paternal favour and affection*.

The opposition was carried on with equal ardour in the house of peers as it had been in the house of commons, and with no better success. The leading speakers against the measures of the administration were, the lords Bathurst and Carteret, the earls of Chesterfield and Abingdon. The duke of Marlborough made a motion for a bill to regulate the army, much to the same purpose with that which had been rejected by the commons; and after a warm dispute, it also underwent a negative. The like fate attended a motion made by lord Carteret for an address to his majesty, to acquaint the house by whose advice the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham had been dismissed from their respective commands, and what crimes were laid to their charge to occasion such dismissal.

The house of peers were also a good deal busied this session in matters concerning their own body. Those who had framed the act of union had, by an unaccountable oversight, neglected to establish any proper judicatory for trying the validity of any claim to a Scottish peerage, excepting the court of session of Scotland, which many of the English peers thought was an encroachment upon their rights. It was therefore moved to resolve, "That no peer who hath claimed or shall claim right by succession to any peerage of Scotland, other than a descendant from the body of a peer or peers, who has been in possession of the peerage claimed since the twenty-fifth of April 1690, shall be admitted to vote at any election of a peer or peers, to sit in parliament for that part of Great Britain called Scotland, until his right and title be determined in this house." This was certainly a very excellent motion, and it had been greatly to be wished that it could have been complied with; but it was directly repugnant to the articles of union, as well as to the right of succession to the peerage in Scotland.

It had been an evil long complained of, and, as should seem, with but too good foundation, that the great majority of the Scottish representatives, who always voted for the ministry, was owing to the exertion of an undue influence in the elections: the lords of the upper house therefore made several attempts to prevent this evil for the future. Among other things, they moved to resolve, "for the better freedom of the election of a peer or peers to sit in the parliament of Great Britain on the part of Scotland, that the election shall be by way of ballot." This motion, however, being proved contrary to the articles of union, was likewise rejected. The anti-courtiers then made another more directly to the purpose: it was introduced by the earl of Marchmont, who moved to resolve, "That it is the opinion of this house, that any person or persons taking upon him or them to engage any peer or peers of Scotland, by threats, promises of place or pension, or any reward or gratuity from the crown whatsoever, is an encroachment on the freedom of elections, and highly injurious to the honour of the peerage." This motion was supported by the earls of Chesterfield, Winchelsea, and Stair; the lords Willoughby de Broke, Bathurst, and Carteret. These were opposed by the dukes of Newcastle and Argyle, the earls Cholmondeley and Paulet, lord Hervey (now called up by writ to the house of peers as baron Hervey of Ickworth) and by the lord-chancellor Talbot. Unexceptionable, and perfectly constitutional and absolutely necessary as a law of this kind appeared to be to every candid and impartial person; yet as it carried with it too close a restriction on ministerial operations, the motion was rejected upon a previous question (for the main question would not have borne a debate) by a majority of seventy-three against forty three peers present, and of twenty-six against seventeen proxies. A protest however was entered in favour of the motion, signed by thirty-two peers.

The other debates and protests of the peers this session turned upon the king's message, demanding a power to augment the forces during the recess of parliament; as also against a bill for enabling his majesty to apply the sum of one million two hundred thousand pounds out of the Sinking Fund for the service of the current year. The house also took under consideration the state of our American colonies, and the encouraging those manufactures thereof that could no way interfere with the trade of Great Britain, or which may be of use to the mother-country.

Pursuant to an order of their lordships while deliberating on these matters, the lords commissioners of trade and plantations laid before the house the following representation, exhibiting an exact and curious state of the trade, people, and strength of our sugar-colonies in the West Indies, which I shall here insert, together with the judicious remarks of that accurate commercial writer Mr. Anderson.

I. "JAMAICA, though having nineteen parishes, had but seven thousand six hundred and sixty-four white people on it, even although its militia consisted of three thousand men, horse and foot, dispersed all over the uninhabited part of the island. They had six forts, and of late had no fewer than eight independent companies of the king's forces, each consisting of one hundred men."

Here Mr. Anderson observed, that the diminution of the white people of Jamaica was owing to the great decay of their private or illicit trade to the Spanish main, that trade having drawn thither many white people, who made handsome fortunes in a few years, and returned therewith to the mother-country; and thus the Spanish money they got in Jamaica did at length center in England. From Jamaica our people privately carried all sorts of our manufactures, &c. to New Spain, which it is well known can only be legally carried thither by the flota and flotilla from Old Spain. They also carried thither great numbers of negroes.

"Our exports to Jamaica, at a medium of four years, from Christmas 1728 to Christmas 1732, were to the value of one hundred and forty-seven thousand six hundred and seventy-five pounds two shillings and three-pence halfpenny; and our imports were five hundred and thirty-nine thousand four hundred and ninety-nine pounds eighteen shillings and three-pence halfpenny: the annual excess of our imports from Jamaica is three hundred and ninety-one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four pounds fifteen shillings and eleven-pence three farthings.

II. "BARBADOES had eighteen thousand two hundred and ninety-five white people. Its militia consisted of one troop and two regiments of horse, and of seven regiments of foot; in all, four thousand eight hundred and twelve men. In this island are no fewer than twenty-one forts and twenty-six batteries, mounted with four hundred and sixty-three cannon."

All our sugar isles together, according to Mr. Anderson, are thought annually to produce eighty-five thousand hogsheads of sugar, each hogshead containing one thousand two hundred weight, or in all one million two hundred thousand cwr. of which Great Britain was thought to consume annually seventy thousand hogsheads, or ninety-four millions eighty thousand pounds of sugar. It is computed that three hundred sail of ships go annually from Great Britain to the sugar-islands (besides those which go thither from our continent-colonies) and about four thousand five hundred seamen are employed in navigating them; and there is annually exported thither the value of two hundred and forty thousand pounds in British manufactures.

III. In all the British Leeward Islands, viz. St. Christopher's, Antigua, Nevis, and Montserrat, (with their dependencies, Barbuda, Anguilla, Spanish-town, Tortosa, and the rest of the Virgin Isles) there are ten thousand two hundred and sixty-two white people, and their militia consists of three thousand two hundred and eighty-four men."

But the before mentioned writer adds, that by an account of these Leeward Islands in the year 1736, their strength was as follows :

In Antigua	1500 men	2 forts	7 batteries.
St. Christophers	1340 men	3 forts	6 batteries.
Montserrat	360 men	1 fort	1 battery.
Nevis	300 men	1 fort	1 battery.

In all 3,500 men

And in Anguilla	80 men
Spanish Town	72 men
Tortosa	120 men

3,772 white men in all the Leeward Islands.

IV. "The islands called the Bahamas are the next in those seas of any importance to Great Britain, where Providence is the only island as yet of any consideration to us, or that is peopled in any degree; and here they have five hundred white people, out of whom they have formed six companies of militia, beside one independent company in his majesty's pay. On this island are two forts.

V. "In the Bermudas there were, a few years since, five thousand white people, out of which there are one thousand white men (besides officers) for their militia. They have one fort and six batteries."

Nothing is said of Newfoundland in this report, which indeed is properly no colony, it having scarcely any soil capable of cultivation; and the forts and people there are chiefly, if not solely, for the protection and accommodation of our important cod-fishery on the adjacent shoals called "The Banks of Newfoundland." These garrisons are also requisite for preventing any other European nation from getting possession of that island; which possession would render our fishery there extremely precarious on a rupture with any such nation, as it would also our communication with our northern colonies on the continent. Newfoundland therefore, on these accounts, is of very great importance to us *.

When the lords had gone through the whole course of their enquiries relative to the commercial interests of our colonies respecting Great Britain, it was resolved to make no alteration in the disposition of their manufactures, from an apprehension that it might interfere with the trade of some of our allies on the continent, and our connections with them †.

The public business being now dispatched, his majesty went to the house of peers on the sixteenth day of April, 1734; and having given his assent to such bills as were ready, among which was a bill for naturalizing the prince of Orange, took leave of this parliament with the warmest acknowledgements of their zeal, duty, and affection. The parliament was then prorogued, afterwards dissolved, and another convoked by the same proclamation.

On the fourteenth of March this year the nuptials of his serene highness the prince of Orange with the princess-royal were celebrated with great magnificence, which occasioned great rejoicings both in town and country, and addresses of congratulation from all parts to their majesties and the prince and princess, it being a match very agreeable to the nation in general. On the twenty-second of April the prince and princess embarked in one of his majesty's yachts for Holland, and soon after their arrival his serene highness set out to make the campaign under prince Eugene on the Rhine; and during his absence the princess came to her father's court, and resided here till the prince her consort returned from the Imperial army, when she went to meet him.

The war in 1734 was carried on by the confederates with great success against the emperor. Two most bloody battles at Parma and Guastalla were fought with doubtful success. Don Carlos took possession of Naples, and was declared king thereof and of Sicily; which last was soon reduced also. Upon the Rhine the French took Philippsburgh, before which their general, the duke of Berwick, natural son of king James II. lost his life in the trenches. Dantzick was reduced to the obedience of Augustus III. after a grievous siege by the Russian army; and that prince was universally acknowledged king of Poland, while his rival and competitor Stanislaus escaped with great difficulty, in the disguise of a peasant, into the territories of the king of Prussia.

In the mean time, nothing was omitted by the ministry towards putting the nation in a posture of defence, to which they were principally induced by the doubtful behaviour of some of the allies. The court of Spain suffered the eldest son of the pretender to serve in the army of Don Carlos, by whom he was treated with distinguished marks of respect: nay, that prince made no scruple publicly to declare that, whenever the situation of his affairs would permit, he would support with all his power the interests of the abdicated family.

The conduct of the French also at this juncture was such as bespoke no very friendly sentiments in respect to Great Britain, they having published about this time a severe edict, compelling all British subjects either to quit France or enlist in their armies; and the persons of many Englishmen were actually seized and held in durance. This produced a spirited memorial on the part of our court, which lord Waldegrave, our minister at Paris, was ordered to deliver to the French council, who, when they saw us earnest upon the affair, thought proper to excuse themselves, by alleging, they only meant to execute their edict against British and Irish vagabonds, and such as had no visible means of subsistence.

In June this year the lord Forbes waited upon his majesty at Kensington from Russia, with the copy of a treaty of commerce he had concluded with the czarina, greatly to the advantage of the British nation, as will appear from the following abstract:

* Anderson, vol. ii. p. 350, 351.

† Journal of the House of Lords. Historical Register, &c.

"The fourth article of this treaty stipulates, that the subjects of Great Britain may carry to Russia all sorts of merchandize, and may transport them from thence by land to Persia, on paying a duty of three per cent. and may likewise bring back from Persia, through Russia, all sorts of merchandize, on again paying the said duty, without being obliged to open their bales.

"The seventh article declares, that in case of shipwreck, all manner of assistance shall be given, without offering the least violence to the ship's company or effects.

"By the ninth article, the British merchants in Russia are exempted from being obliged to show their books to any one whatsoever, except it be to prove something in dispute. And for the greater ease and encouragement of the British commerce, it is agreed, that for the future the English manufactures shall pay no greater duty on importation than is specified.

"This treaty to be in force for fifteen years from the year 1734."

On the nineteenth of September this year a treaty was also concluded with the king of Denmark. The ministers employed in negotiating it were, on the part of his Britannic majesty, the duke of Newcastle and the lord Harrington (who then were the two secretaries of state) and sir Robert Walpole; and on the part of Denmark, the sieur de Johnn, the Danish resident.

"The first and second articles of this treaty are general professions of friendship, and renewals of all former treaties between the two nations.

"By the third article, his Danish majesty, at the desire of our king, engages to hold in readiness one thousand horse and five thousand foot for three years, to be transported over to England in case his Britannic majesty's dominions should be threatened with an invasion.

"By the fourth article, his Britannic majesty engages to pay to the king of Denmark, for every horseman eighty crowns, and for every foot soldier thirty crowns; one half to be paid on signing the treaty, and the other half when the troops shall be delivered; over and above which, king George engages to pay to the king of Denmark an annual subsidy of two hundred and fifty thousand crowns during the time the treaty subsists: but if the troops should pass into the pay of the king of Great Britain, then his Danish majesty is to receive a yearly subsidy of one hundred and fifty thousand crowns while they are in his Britannic majesty's service.

"By the sixth article, these troops are not to be sent to Italy, nor obliged to serve on board a fleet, nor to be transported beyond sea, but to be employed for the defence of the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland; in which event they have the same pay that English troops have.

"The seventh article stipulates, that the said troops shall be immediately sent back to Denmark, with a month's pay, in case the king of Denmark's dominions are attacked; and his Britannic majesty engages, in such event, to give his Danish majesty all the assistance the case shall require by sea and land: the king of Denmark also binds himself in the like engagement of assistance towards the king of Great Britain.

"The eighth article determines in what case such assistance, may be demanded and is to be given; namely, if either of the parties be actually attacked by force of arms, without that party having before used open force against him who attacks.

This treaty to be void at the end of three years, unless renewed *."

Nothing material passed in England during the course of this year, if we except the contest for electing members to sit in the approaching parliament, which turned entirely in favour of the minister, whose influence at this period seemed to be all-powerful.

On the fourteenth of January 1735, the new parliament met, when the commons again made choice of Mr. Onslow for their speaker. After some days spent in the usual formalities of qualifying the members, &c. his majesty on the twenty-third opened the session with a most gracious speech from the throne, in which he told the two houses, That having undertaken, in concert with the States-general, to mediate between the powers at war, he had met with so good success, that a plan would speedily be offered to the consideration of all parties engaged in the war, as a basis for a general negotiation of peace. He also acquainted them that he had concluded a treaty with the crown of Denmark; a matter, he conceived, of great importance in the present conjuncture; and which, being attended with some expence, he would order it to be submitted to the consideration of the commons. At the same time he put them in mind, that while a war was raging in Europe, it would be proper in all events (though it might be attended with some expence) for Great Britain to keep herself in a posture of defence.

The address of thanks occasioned a dispute, as usual, which ended, as may be readily conceived, in favour of the court; and the address was voted and presented.

The next subject of debate was concerning a motion made in a committee of the whole house on supplies, February the seventh, for encreasing the number of seamen to thirty thousand effective men, for the service of the current year. The minority affirmed, that twenty thousand, the number employed last year, were fully sufficient: that the unnecessary naval armaments of Great Britain during last summer had occasioned the ruin of Dantzick, inasmuch as they prevented the French from sailing in time to relieve it: that the Spaniards, from the apprehension that the English fleet was designed to act against them in the Mediterranean, had obliged the French ministry to keep their ships at Brest, instead of sending them to Dantzick, until they could discover the destination of the English squadron.

The ministry replied, that gentlemen were greatly mistaken if they imagined the French to have been ever serious in their design either to relieve Dantzic, or to assist Stanislaus in mounting the throne of Poland: that it was true they had last year equipped a fleet, under pretext of relieving Dantzick, and had circulated a report that this was their real intention: that nevertheless, it was certain that the French fleet was not only detained at Brest all summer, but orders were given by the courts of Versailles and Madrid to fit out, in all their ports, all the ships that could possibly be got ready: that his majesty having come to the knowledge of these orders, had judged it indispensibly necessary to increase his sea forces with the additional number of seven thousand men; an expedient which, in all probability, had defeated the designs which the French and Spaniards had formed against these kingdoms: that both these powers, far from relaxing their preparations, were at this very time strengthening their marine with the utmost industry; so that the addition of seven thousand men to the naval force of Great Britain must be thought by all impartial persons a reasonable augmentation; and that this measure would appear the more necessary when it was considered, that in a free country like ours, where there was no register for seamen, by which the fleet might be instantly supplied with men, the government was obliged, on any sudden emergency, to have recourse to pressing; a most disagreeable expedient in a country of liberty. After this and a great deal more had passed to the same purpose, the question being put, was carried in the affirmative for thirty thousand seamen, the office of ordnance being included.

On the twenty fourth of February sir W. Wyndham moved, that the estimates of the navy for the ensuing year might be referred to a select committee. He was seconded by Mr. Sandys, and supported by sir Joseph Jekyll and Mr. Pulteney; but after some debate the motion was carried in the negative.

On the twenty-eighth, the treaty concluded last year with Denmark came under consideration in a grand committee, when Mr. H. Walpole moved, "that the sum of fifty-six thousand two hundred and fifty pounds should be granted to his majesty, as a subsidy to the king of Denmark, pursuant to the said treaty, for the service of the ensuing year." This demand was vehemently opposed by the gentlemen in the country interest, as both unreasonable and unnecessary, at a time when Denmark had rather greater reason than England for maintaining the balance of power in Europe. They said, the money would be much more properly applied in gaining over the elector of Bavaria, in detaching the king of Sardinia from his engagements with France, or in enabling the Poles to chuse such a king as might have prevented the breaking out of the war; and in short, that the subsidy was no more than a bribe given by England to induce a foreign prince to follow his own interest. The debate having had its free course, the question was put, and the motion approved by the majority.

A bill was afterwards brought in for limiting the number of officers in the house of commons; but on the second reading was rejected, after a learned debate; in the course of which the opposition was strengthened by the coming over of lord Polwarth, eldest son to the earl of Marchmont, a nobleman of clear, keen, and elegant elocution.

In the course of this session the mutiny-bill received a material alteration. By this act, any justice of the peace had it formerly in his power to throw a poor fellow into gaol, if, after receiving the inlisting money (while perhaps he was drunk) he refused to take the oaths, even though he offered to return the money: but now a clause was inserted, importing, that every officer who should hereafter enlist any man to serve in any regiment, should, within a certain number of days, carry the person enlisted before one of the next justices of the peace, where the man should be at liberty to declare his dissent to such an act, and his having repented of what he had done; and upon his so doing, and returning the officer the inlisting money, and the expences incurred in the progress of the affair; such justice should forthwith discharge him: and that an officer guilty of any failure or neglect in this particular should be liable to the same penalties which were inflicted on those chargeable with false musters. At the same time, to prevent any abuse of this indulgence, another clause was added, ordaining, that if any person should receive inlisting money (knowing it to be such) and should afterwards abscond or refuse to go before a magistrate, to declare his assent or dissent to the enlisting, such person should be deemed to be enlisted to all intents and purposes †.

An affair of a very serious nature was at this time depending before the house of commons. The magistrates of the royal burgh of Haddington had been seized and imprisoned in a distant gaol, without being admitted to bail, by a warrant from one of the Scots judges; but another judge had ventured to take their bail, and set them at liberty. The injured parties presented a petition to the house of commons; and the case appeared so flagrant, that a motion was made to refer it to the consideration of a committee of the whole house. This was opposed by the minister and his friends, from what motive is hard to say, unless we may suppose that the unjust judge had such an interest in the country, as to make it necessary to screen him at all events. However, the motion was thrown out by the majority, which did the minister no service. The minority, though often baffled, seized every opportunity of renewing the struggle, and on the fourteenth of March moved, that part of an act of the parliament of Scotland, made in 1701, entitled, "An act for preventing wrongous imprisonments, and against delays in trials," might be read, which was accordingly done, and a bill afterwards brought in by Mr. Dundas, lord Polwarth, and Mr. Sandys, for explaining and amending the above act. This act was all the natives of Scotland had in lieu of the Habeas Corpus act, though, as we have seen, it did not screen them from oppression; yet when the bill, after passing the commons, was sent up to the lords, it was thrown out there, through the opposition made to it by the earl of Ilay, who undertook to prove, that the Scots were on a footing with their neighbours in England in this respect.

On the tenth of April a petition of the then late general assembly of the church of Scotland was presented to the house and read, praying the house "to pass a bill for repealing an act of parliament passed in the tenth year of queen Anne, restoring the right of patronage in Scotland, so far as it concerns the power of patrons to present ministers to vacant churches, in order to restore the church of Scotland to the rights and privileges she was possessed of at the union of the two kingdoms." A bill was ordered in upon this petition, and went through a first reading; but when it came to be read a second time, it was opposed chiefly by the desire of the Scotch members themselves, who, being most of them patrons, thought the bill was an invasion upon their rights. In fine, the bill was postponed for a month, which was the same as dropping it.

This session the commons endeavoured to rectify the laws relating to the poor of England, which they found in some respects to be defective, and attended with difficulty and charge in the execution. Upon mature consideration, therefore, they came to the following resolutions on this subject; "That in each county a number of proper persons should form themselves into a body-politic for erecting and governing hospitals and work-houses, for the maintenance and encouragement of the poor, for the reception of foundlings and other infants, and for the punishment of vagrants and other disorderly persons; and that all the laws relating to the poor should be reduced to one act of parliament." But it being late in the session before this report was made to the house, nothing was done in this important matter*.

But the attention of the public was chiefly engaged by an affair of a very delicate and interesting nature, which came before the upper house in the course of this session. This was a petition subscribed by the dukes of Hamilton, Queensberry, and Montrose, by the earls of Dundonald, Marchmont, and Stair, representing, that undue influence had been used in carrying on the election of the sixteen peers for Scotland.

This petition was delivered by the duke of Bedford on the fifteenth of February, who at the same time proposed a day for taking it into consideration; which proposal was readily agreed to. Nevertheless, the affair was of such an unprecedented nature, that the house seemed to be divided in opinion about the manner in which they ought to proceed. The duke of Newcastle observed, and certainly with great justice, that it was doubtful whether the house had even a power of receiving such a petition, nothing in the articles of union, he said, giving a British house of lords a right to interfere in the election of the Scottish peers; nor indeed had they otherwise any such right, unless some particular charge was stated and offered to be proved. On the other hand, the friends of the petition urged that it was general, and the facts contained in the allegations were of a very bad complexion, and such as ought to be punished if they were proved. However, as it seemed to be uncertain what was the scope and design of the petition, a motion was made and assented to, that it should be adjourned to a short day, before which the petitioners should be ordered to declare, "whether they intended to controvert the election of the sixteen peers, or the election of any, and which of them."

This order being communicated by the lord-chancellor to the petitioners, they in a few days delivered in a declaration, importing, "That they did not intend to thwart the election or return of the sixteen peers for Scotland; but they thought it their duty to lay before their lordships the evidence of such facts and undue methods as appeared to them to be dangerous to the constitution, and might in future elections equally affect the right of the present sixteen peers, as that of the other peers of Scotland, if not prevented by a proper remedy."

This declaration being read in the house, the court-party objected to it as unsatisfactory. Its meaning, they said, was equally vague and undetermined with that of the petition; and therefore the duke of Devonshire made a motion, "That the petitioners might be ordered to lay before the house in writing, instances of those undue methods and illegal practices upon which they intended to proceed, and the names of the persons they suspected to be guilty." This motion was warmly opposed by the earls of Chesterfield, Abingdon, and Stratford, and the lords Bathurst and Carteret. Lord Chesterfield concluded a speech he made on this occasion, with the following expressions: "Supposing, my lords, we should get information that several barrels of gun-powder had been placed under this house, in order to blow us up, would it not be very foolish to delay going to search for and remove the gun-powder, till we should be informed by what means, at what time, and by whom the powder was placed there? The case before us is the very same; there is a sort of metaphorical gun-powder placed under this house, which will in time blow us up, if it be not removed; and in such a case are we to trifle away our time in enquiries after the names of the persons who placed it there, and the methods by which it was conveyed?" Beautiful as this comparison was, it had no effect, any more than the reasoning of the other friends of the petition, with the majority of the house, who voted the declaration unsatisfactory; that the consideration of the matter should be delayed for eight days longer; and that the petitioners should be ordered to lay before the house in writing, &c. as expressed in the above motion.

On the day appointed the petitioning lords presented a remonstrance to the house, in which they observed, "that as they had no intention to state themselves accusers, they could not take upon them to name particular persons who might have been concerned in those illegal practices; but who they were would undoubtedly appear to their lordships, upon their taking the proper examination: that, nevertheless, they begged leave to acquaint their lordships, that the petition was laid before them, upon information that the list of the sixteen peers for Scotland had been framed, previous to the election, by persons in high trust under the crown: that this list was shewn to peers as a list approved by the crown; and was called the king's list, from which there was to be no variation, unless to make way for one or two particular peers, on condition they should conform to measures: that peers were solicited to vote for this list, without the liberty to make any alteration: that endeavours were used to engage peers to vote for this list, by promise of pensions and offices, civil and military, to themselves and relations, as well as by offers of money: that sums of money were actually given for this purpose: that pensions, offices, and releases of debts owing to the crown, were granted to peers who concurred in voting for this list, and to their relations: that, on the day of election, a battalion of his majesty's troops was drawn up in the Abbey-court, contrary to custom, and without any other apparent cause than that of overawing the electors: that these instances of undue practices would, they hoped, be abundantly sufficient to satisfy their lordships, that they had just cause to pray the house to take this matter into their serious consideration, and to provide such remedy as might be effectual for preserving the right and freedom of elections; such right of electing being the only right that now remained with the peers of Scotland, in lieu of a constant and hereditary seat in parliament."

This remonstrance gave rise to another violent dispute. The lords in the opposition endeavoured to make the most of a particular fact mentioned therein, which was the holding under arms a battalion of soldiers during the time of the election, which they represented to be a most scandalous, arbitrary, and flagrant infringement of the rights and liberties of the subject, and of that independency which is ever to be preserved in all elections. The court lords, who made no scruple to acknowledge the fact, alleged in defence of such a step, that it was both legal and prudent: that the soldiers were drawn out by the authority of the civil magistrate, as a preventative against riots and tumults among the populace, who had been inflamed by the opposite party to a pitch of resentment that threatened the most fatal consequences, if not timely checked. In fine, the remonstrance was voted unsatisfactory, the petition dismissed, and the whole affair entirely suppressed †.

Notwithstanding this discouragement, the minority renewed their attacks on every fresh occasion; but all their motions were successively rejected by the invincible power of a majority.

The public business being at length finished, and the supplies granted (which this year amounted to upwards of three millions) the session was closed on the fifteenth of May, 1735, by a speech from the throne; in which the king was pleased to acknowledge, that the plan of pacification which he had formed with the States-general had not yet proved effectual; but added, that he was still determined to persist in the same pacific measures, and to use his utmost endeavours for composing the troubles of Europe. He thanked the parliament for the power they had given him to augment his forces by sea and land; acquainted them with his intention to visit his German dominions; and told them, that he should constitute the queen regent of the realm during his absence. Immediately after the prorogation, his majesty embarked for Holland in his way to Hanover, from whence he did not return till the twenty-sixth of October following.

A committee of inspection into the state of the South-sea company's commerce to the Spanish West Indies having been appointed by their general court out of the stock-holders, it appeared by the accounts which that committee published about this time, that the entire balance of that trade from the beginning (or of their ten years American or Asiento trade) amounted to no more than thirty-two thousand two hundred and sixty pounds eighteen shillings profit to the company. This was, by the proprietors of the stock, thought (and indeed it was) a very inconsiderable profit, being but three thousand two hundred and twenty-six pounds for each year of that trade. This made the stock-holders very earnest to accept of an equivalent formerly offered by the court of Spain: but those proprietors or stock-holders considered only their own private advantage by that equivalent: for as the king and his ministers must have been consulted before the company could be permitted to accept of such equivalent, there was a more important and extensive consideration to be duly weighed, viz. whether by the illicit and very profitable trade carried on by that company's supercargoes, factors, captains, and other servants employed by them in the Spanish West Indies, and also under their wings from Jamaica, &c. the nation was not a greater gainer, upon the whole, than they could be by the proposed equivalent, and the carrying back the trade to the channel of Cadiz, where, without doubt, our merchants had also a great interest in that trade? But I shall have occasion to consider this subject hereafter.

Great complaints came over from Nova Scotia at this time, and particularly from the British settlement at Canis, a place of great consequence to our fishing-trade in those parts; that although the late king had sent thither four companies of soldiers, yet there had been no money laid out in fortifying that place: that they were particularly apprehensive of the French encroachments in their neighbourhood, who always pay great attention to their own fortifications; and that by our shameful neglect of Nova Scotia, our fishery there was almost dwindled to nothing. Notwithstanding these remonstrances and representations, our ministry seemed quite to disregard, or rather to be quite ignorant of, the great importance of that province.

At this period the affairs of Europe were in a very delicate and critical situation. The emperor complained loudly of the tame and pacific conduct of our court, which, from the treaties subsisting between Great Britain and the empire, he expected would have espoused his cause. His Britannic majesty, however, gave the world an instance about this time, that it was from no personal pique to the emperor that he took no part in his affairs, relative to the war now carrying on; for having received certain advice that the French had formed a strong party at the Ottoman Porte, who were labouring to bring the Divan to declare war against his Imperial majesty, king George, conjunctly with the States-general, sent orders to their respective ministers at that court to use their utmost endeavours to counteract the French in their scheme; which these ministers did so effectually, that the grand seignior was brought to lay aside all thoughts of attacking the emperor, who, sensible of the friendly office done him, sent his Britannic majesty his hearty thanks upon the occasion.

Nor was it in this instance only that our court acted the part of mediator, with a view to the maintenance of the balance of power, which at this time seemed to be in danger of being ruined. A misunderstanding had lately arisen between the crowns of Spain and Portugal, occasioned by affronts mutually offered to their ambassadors at each court. The affair could not be amicably compromised, and the king of Spain began to make preparations for a war with Portugal, which so alarmed his most Faithful majesty, that he instantly made the most earnest application to the British government for protection from the designs of his enemies. Agreeable to the plan we had framed of universal pacification, we readily promised our assistance, and resolved, by a timely and powerful relief, to overcome the Spanish court, and frustrate their designs. Accordingly, in the month of May this year, sir John Norris was dispatched with a fleet of twenty-eight ships of the line to the river Tagus, where he was received by the king of Portugal and the inhabitants of Lisbon as their guardian and deliverer. The Spanish court inveighed in the most haughty and acrimonious terms against this interposition of the English, and threatened to pour a numerous army into Portugal over land; but when the first transports of their resentment were subsided, they thought it most adviseable, for their own interest, to lay aside their hostile preparations.

Mean while, the powers at variance upon the continent began to grow heartily tired of the war, though neither cared to own their sentiments. Conferences for peace had for some time been carried on at the Hague, under the auspices of his Britannic majesty and the States-general, though at the same time the latter had renewed, for another year, their treaty of neutrality with France. Couriers were continually passing between London and Versailles; and although the king of Great Britain could not claim the merit of having absolutely compleated the desired work of peace, yet he undoubtedly smoothed the way to it by the plans he proposed: but as the two courts of Versailles and Vienna had already been disgusted by certain proceedings of the congress who were to consider of these plans, the two belligerent powers fell upon a more simple and effectual means of terminating their differences. An armistice was proposed by the emperor, and agreed to by the court of France, which soon after terminated in the conclusion of certain preliminary articles, by which France engaged to restore to the empire all the places she had taken from it in the course of the late war. It was also stipulated that the emperor should possess the Mantuan, Parma, Pla-centia, and the Milanese. Don Carlos was acknowledged king of Naples and Sicily; John Francis, duke of Lorraine, who afterwards married Maria-Theresa, eldest archduchess of Austria, was assigned the duchy of Tuscany after the death of the reigning duke, when Lorraine was to be annexed to the crown of France.

King Stanislaus renounced the kingdom of Poland, which he had twice obtained, and which his allies were unable to secure to him. He was, however, still to retain the title of king; but he was to be further indemnified, more upon the account of France than of himself. Cardinal de Fleury, the French minister, was at first satisfied with the district of Bar, which the duke of Lorraine was to give to Stanislaus, with a reversion thereof to the crown of France: and Lorraine was not to be ceded till its duke should be in full possession of Tuscany. This was making the cession of Tuscany depend greatly upon chance, and it was making very little use of the great successes, and the most favourable conjuncture that had ever offered in favour of France: the old cardinal therefore resolved to make a bold push: he demanded Lorraine upon the same conditions with the district of Bar, and obtained it, at the expence only of three millions five hundred thousand livres (or about sixteen thousand pounds sterling) granted to duke Francis till he should be possessed of Tuscany.

Thus was Lorraine for ever annexed to the crown of France, after having been many times attempted without success; a king of Poland was transplanted to Lorraine; the second son of the king of Spain was removed to Naples; but the duke of Lorraine was the chief gainer by this arrangement, since he afterwards became grand duke of Tuscany, and son-in-law to the emperor, whose eldest daughter, Maria-Teresa, he espoused; an alliance to which he was indebted for the imperial diadem to which he afterwards succeeded. By this plan of pacification Leghorn was to be declared a free port; France was to guaranty the pragmatic sanction; and England, Holland, Portugal, and Vienna, were to be solicited to guaranty the present treaty, to which the kings of Spain and Sardinia were to be invited to accede; the latter of these monarchs was to enjoy Vigevanasco, Novara, and all its dependencies.

Such was the issue of this short but bloody war, which at its first breaking out threatened all Europe with the most fatal consequences, but which at last was happily terminated by the timely interposition of his Britannic majesty, and the utter inability of the emperor to support a burthen so far above his strength*.

In the month of October king George returned from Hanover, and on the fifteenth day of January, 1736, opened the parliament with a speech, in which he acquainted them, that the plan of pacification formed by the French and Imperialists was in substance the same with that which had been concerted between him and the States-general, tho' they had thought proper to communicate it as a new project; that he had agreed to this plan, which had been imparted to the kings of Spain and Sardinia, who, it was hoped, would likewise be persuaded to accede to it. He told them, that he had already given orders for a reduction of his forces, both by sea and land; but said, he flattered himself they would think it reasonable to continue some extraordinary expences till the peace of Europe should be more fully established.

When his majesty was retired, a motion was made in the upper house for an address of thanks to the speech, importing, that the house beheld with pleasure, in their present situation, the happy effects of the extraordinary supplies granted of late years by parliament, together with their congratulations on the plan of pacification. But the earl of Strafford opposed this address, as he said, in his opinion, the peace was a very bad one for Europe, seeing it would leave France in possession of Lorraine, by which means she could at any time find an easy accession into the very heart of Europe. After some altercation, however, the address was voted, drawn up, presented, and most graciously received. The example of the lords was followed by the commons, who met with the like favourable reception.

The lower house having determined some controverted elections, proceeded to take into consideration the supplies for the year; and sir Charles Wager moving that fifteen thousand men should be employed for the service of the ensuing year, the proposal was approved without a division.

The drinking of geneva, and other distilled spirituous liquors, had for some years past encreased to a surprising degree, especially among the people of inferior rank, insomuch, that not only thousands had already perished through this abominable practice, and great numbers been rendered wholly unfit for labour or service; but their morals had likewise been so debauched, that a general dissoluteness prevailed amongst them. These pernicious liquors, of which gin was that principally drank, were not only sold by distillers, but retailed in the smallest quantities by every petty chandler-shop or coal-cellar in the metropolis; by which means journeymen, apprentices, and servants, were drawn in to intoxicate themselves with this bewitching drug. In a word, there was the greatest reason to apprehend that the public welfare and safety, as well as the trade of the nation, would be greatly affected by this practice, which was so dangerous to the health, strength, peace, and morals, and even threatened the extinction of the English species among the common people. Induced by these melancholy considerations, the justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex presented a petition to the house of commons, setting forth the above evils, and praying that the house would take the matter into their serious consideration, and apply such remedy as to them in their wisdom should seem most proper.

This affair being carefully examined by the house, a motion was made for resolving, that a duty of two shillings per gallon should be imposed upon all spirituous liquors; and that fifty shillings should be paid to his majesty for a licence, to be taken out yearly by every person who should vend, barter, or utter, any such spirituous liquors.

The gentlemen in the opposition adduced many weighty objections to the high duties proposed to be laid by this motion. Mr. Pulteney in particular observed, that they amounted to a prohibition; and as this extended to rum, he was apprehensive it might prove of fatal consequence to the British sugar islands, which were already in a declining condition: that many thousands depended for their livelihood upon the British distillery; and that it was absurd to argue against the use of a thing from the abuse of it.

In answer to this, the promoters of the motion urged, that nothing but the extreme danger of the nation, from the excessive use of spirituous liquors, could have induced them to desire such a bill to be brought in: they were fully sensible, they said, of the difficulties to which great numbers of his majesty's subjects would be reduced by the duties proposed to be laid on such liquors; but the interest of individuals ought to give way to the general interest; and where the preservation of the community was visibly and so essentially concerned, the hardships of some few particular persons must be overlooked: that with respect to rum and brandy, it was very certain those liquors had often been drank to a very great excess, notwithstanding the high duties laid upon them, and were as pernicious both to the health and morals of the people as any home-made spirit: that if any sorts of spirits should be exempted from the duties now proposed, the retailer would sell the most pernicious stuff under that denomination; and the distiller would compound them in such a manner, that it would be impossible to detect the imposition. After these and some other speeches on each side of the question, the resolutions were approved by the majority, and a bill was brought in, for imposing the above-mentioned duty. While this bill was depending, great numbers of petitions were received from the traders of the sugar-colonies and the merchants of Bristol and Liverpool, representing the hardships to which they would be exposed, by a law which amounted to a prohibition of rum and spirits distilled from molasses. In consequence of these remonstrances, a mitigating clause was inserted in favour of the composition known by the name of punch; and distillers were permitted to exercise any other employment. When sir Joseph Jekyll, according to order, presented the bill to the house, sir Robert Walpole acquainted them, by his majesty's command, that as the alterations proposed to be made by that bill in the duties charged upon all spirituous liquors might in a great degree affect some part of the civil list revenues, his majesty, for the sake of remedying so great an evil as was intended by that bill to be prevented, did consent to accept any other revenue of equal value, to be settled and appropriated in lieu of his interest in the said duties.

The usual essays, with the usual success, were made this session for a pension-bill, and other constitutional acts for securing the independency of parliaments. The king was empowered to borrow six hundred thousand pounds, chargeable on the Sinking Fund, for the service of the ensuing year; and the sum of seventy thousand pounds was voted for making good the deficiencies that might happen in the civil list by the gin act.

Mr. Walter Plumer, a very sensible member of the opposition, in a speech which did him much credit, moved for the repeal of some clauses in the test act, which he represented as a species of persecution, in which the protestant dissenters were confounded with the Roman catholics and professed enemies to the establishment. Lord Polwarth and Mr. Heathcote spoke strenuously in favour of this motion; but sir Robert Walpole as strongly opposed it, as being dangerous to the established church. In this opinion he was joined by Mr. Shippen; and the question being put, was carried in the negative. A petition being preferred by the body of people called quakers, desiring to be relieved from the severe prosecutions they were liable to in the exchequer, ecclesiastical, and other courts, for the non-payment of tithes, church-rates, and other ecclesiastical dues, which, from a principle of conscience, they could not pay; a bill was prepared for their relief, which, after several debates and alterations, at length passed the house, and was sent up to the lords, where it was thrown out on a division.

While these matters were deliberating in the great assembly of the nation, the public attention was engaged by an event which has proved of the utmost happiness and advantage to Great Britain; I mean the marriage of his late royal highness Frederick prince of Wales to the princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha, from which union is sprung our present illustrious and beloved sovereign George III. The ceremonials preparative to these nuptials being passed, the lord Delawar was sent in the beginning of March to fetch the princess over, who arrived at Greenwich on the twenty-fifth of April, and two days after the marriage was celebrated*. This match proved highly pleasing to the nation in general; accordingly, the two houses of parliament, the city of London, and almost every county town and borough throughout England, expressed their satisfaction in addresses to their majesties and the princely pair. It was on this occasion that Mr. Pitt, then a young member in the house of commons, gave the first proofs of that eloquence, and those superior abilities, by the help of which he has since made so conspicuous a figure in the British annals: he seized the opportunity of the motion for an address to their majesties on the nuptials of the prince of Wales, to pronounce a most elegant panegyric on their royal highnesses, in which he was seconded by sir George Lyttleton, who likewise displayed himself as an orator to great advantage.

The spirit of bequeathing lands, &c. to pious and charitable uses, had lately been carried to a dangerous height, even to the exclusion or disinheriting of the lawful heirs and poor relations. Gifts, or alienations of lands, tenements, &c. in mortmain, or into dead hands, are prohibited and restrained by Magna Charta, and by divers other wholesome laws, as prejudicial to the common utility. Nevertheless, this public mischief had of late so greatly increased, that it was thought necessary to put a check to it by some farther regulations. For this purpose a bill was brought into the house of commons by sir Joseph Jekyll, master of the Rolls, to restrain the disposition of lands in mortmain, whereby they became unalienable. As this bill, which afterwards passed into an act, may in some manner concern several of our readers, we shall here subjoin a short abstract thereof, for the information of those who may not have the collection of statutes at hand to refer to.

It is then hereby enacted, "That no manors, lands, tenements, rents, advowsons, or other hereditaments corporeal or incorporeal whatsoever, nor any sum or sums of money, or any other personal estate whatsoever, to be laid out or disposed of in the purchase of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall be given, granted, or assigned, or any way whatsoever conveyed or settled to or upon any person or persons, body-politic or corporate, or otherwise, for any estate or interest whatsoever, or in trust, or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever, unless such gift, conveyance, appointment, or settlement of any such lands, tenements, &c. (other than stocks in the public funds) be made by deed, signed, sealed, and delivered, in the presence of two or more creditable witnesses, twelve calendar months at least before the death of such donor or testator, and to be inrolled in Chancery six calendar months next after the execution thereof."

The two universities were greatly alarmed when they heard that a bill of this nature was depending in the house: they presented petitions against it, as did also the colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, and divers hospitals that subsisted by charitable donations. An exempting clause was accordingly inserted in favour of the two universities and the colleges above mentioned; but the petitions of the hospitals, and other charitable societies, were rejected.

The subjects of debate in the upper house were exactly the same with those in the lower. On the twentieth day of May, 1736, the king closed the session with a speech, in which he told both houses, "That a farther convention, concerning the execution of the preliminaries, had been made and communicated to him by the emperor and his most Christian majesty; and that negotiations were carrying on by the several powers engaged in the late war, in order to settle a general pacification. He expressed great concern at seeing such seeds of dissension sown among his people: he declared it was his desire, and should ever be his care, to preserve the present constitution in church and state, as by law established: he recommended a spirit of harmony and concord among all the protestants of the nation, as the chief support of that happy establishment; and acquainted them with his intention to visit his German dominions." Agreeable to this declaration, the parliament was no sooner prorogued than the king set out for Hanover.

Among the acts passed this session was one for naturalizing her royal highness the princess of Wales, and another "for building a bridge cross the river Thames from the New Palace-yard, or the Wool-staple, in the city of Westminster, to the opposite shore in the county of Surry." This noble structure, hitherto the most beautiful and uniform of its kind in all Europe, its vast magnitude considered, by the parliament's bounty in granting several lotteries, and at different times several sums of money for it, was at length completed, much to the honour of the nation, the conveniency of inland commerce, and the accommodation of all ranks of people. The several statutes made concerning it did also provide for the removing of many old and decayed houses, and the erecting of those noble and spacious new streets named Bridge-street, George-street, and Parliament-street, beside the adorning of both the Palace-yards, greatly to the ornament of the ancient city of Westminster, which, instead of its former dirty and narrow streets, now lifts up its head with grandeur and majesty on every side.

For two years past the general courts of the South-sea company had fruitless debates concerning an equivalent proposed by Don Geraldino, the agent from the Spanish court, to that company, in lieu of their annual ship, which seemed rather calculated to amuse the company than to give them any due satisfaction; wherefore that company's court, held on the eleventh of August this year, 1736, took that matter again into consideration, as also the company's farming their introduction of negroes into particular parts of the West Indies, and the several demands made by Geraldino before the Spanish court would grant its cedula or permission for their sending out their annual ship; when it was finally resolved, that the several matters above should be referred to the court of directors, to do therein as they should think to be most for the interest of the company.

So exceedingly remiss was the administration in the due execution of the laws, and in their attention to the proper regulations of civil government, that Licentiousness roved bare-faced and uncontrouled throughout the kingdom, and the public peace was daily disturbed by the most audacious riots and tumults. In the month of July there was a desperate rising of the weavers in Spital-fields, on account of several artists in that branch of commerce who had come over from Ireland; and by living more frugally, and being less addicted to the abominable practice of drinking spirituous liquors, to the destruction of their healths and substance, were enabled to underwork the English considerably. This tumult could not be suppressed without the interposition of the civil power, assisted by parties of the horse and foot guards and trained bands, and the effusion of some blood. This riotous disposition of the populace filled the government with great apprehension of the consequences of the gin act taking place on the twenty-ninth of September: on that day therefore a double guard mounted at Kensington; the guards at St. James's and Whitehall were reinforced; a guard was placed at the Rolls (sir Joseph Jekyll, then master of the Rolls, having been the principal promoter of the bill); a detachment of life-guards and horse-grenadiers paraded in Covent Garden; and every other imaginable method was taken to suppress any tumult that might happen on the occasion: but, contrary to expectation, every thing remained very quiet and tranquil.

A most daring insult, however, was committed whilst the courts of justice were sitting in Westminster-hall. The gin act, mortmain act, Westminster bridge act, and the act for borrowing six hundred thousand pounds from the sinking fund, inclosed in a brown paper parcel, were blown up with gun-powder in the great hall, and partly burnt; for which fact one Nixon, a non-juring clergyman, was apprehended, and being fully convicted thereof, was sentenced to pay two hundred marks, to be imprisoned for five years, and to give security for his good behaviour for five years afterwards, and to be brought up to the several courts then sitting, with a label on his breast denoting his crime.

But the most extraordinary affair this year, and which drew very serious consequences after it, was that of captain Porteous, commander of the city guard of Edinburgh, which was as follows: One Willson, a smuggler, a fellow of a bold and resolute spirit, had been tried and condemned by the lords of session in Scotland, for robbing one of the officers of the revenue, and having afterwards been guilty of one of the most daring actions that ever was attempted, that of rescuing out of the hands of justice his brother-convict, in the time of divine service, and in the midst of his guards. The magistrates of Edinburgh redoubled their usual precautions for executing the sentence against this desperate criminal. When the executioner was cutting him down from the gallows, he was pelted (as is customary in that country) with stones and dirt, by the boys and rabble. Some of the stones happening to strike Porteous, who attended the execution with the city-guards, he being a hot-headed brutal man, ordered his soldiers to fire among the populace, which they did; and several persons were thereby killed, and others wounded; and all this without the orders of the magistrates then attending. Hereupon Porteous was committed to prison, tried for murder, convicted upon full evidence, and received sentence to be hanged, which was to be put in execution on the eighth of September; but upon his petition to the queen, then regent, and as the smugglers were at this time remarkably numerous, and seemed to set both civil and military power at defiance, her majesty thought proper to indulge him with a respite for six weeks; which respite arrived at Edinburgh on the second of September. This occasioned a most tragical catastrophe: the common people of Edinburgh resented this lenity shewn to a criminal who was the object of their detestation, which they looked upon as an encouragement to oppression; and being stimulated by the relations and friends of those who had been murdered, they formed a resolution to execute themselves the sentence which the law had denounced against the murder, and that on the very day the judges had fixed for that purpose. Accordingly, on the seventh of September, a well-conducted party of men entered the city of Edinburgh about ten at night, and by surprize seized all the fire-arms, &c. belonging to the city-guard, locked up the city gates, beat an alarm, burnt the door of the prison where Porteous was confined, after endeavouring in vain to force it open, dragged him from his apartments, and hanged him upon a dyer's pole near the Grass-market. From the boldness, secrecy, and success of this extraordinary enterprize, it was universally believed that persons of more than vulgar rank were concerned in it, especially as, after the execution was over, they left the arms and drums on the spot, and quietly departed, having offered not the least violence to any other person.

In the beginning of this year the British nation sustained an unspeakable loss in the death of lord-chancellor chancellor Talbot, who had for several years executed that high office with admired ability and irreproachable integrity. He died universally lamented, in the month of February, at the age of fifty-two, and was succeeded by lord Hardwick.

On the sixteenth of the same month there was the highest spring tide in the river Thames that had been known in the memory of man; the judges, counsellors, and other persons, were carried out of Westminster-hall in boats, which plied both there and in the Palace-yards. All the cellars in Westminster were filled with water; the privy-garden and parade in St. James's park were overflowed, as was in several places Tower-wharf; and the cellars and offices both above and below bridge, upon the banks of the river, were full of water.

I shall close this account of domestic events (which indeed are very few, and little interesting) with observing, that his majesty, in compliance with the common practice of courts abroad, erected this year a new military post of honour, under the title of Field-marshal of the armies of Great Britain. The two first officers who were invested with that high office were, the duke of Argyll and the earl of Orkney, as being the two eldest generals upon the establishment.

Let us now take a view of foreign events during the course of this year.

On the first day of February was celebrated the marriage between Francis of Lorraine and Maria-Theresa, the eldest daughter of the emperor Charles VI. now empress-queen of Hungary and Bohemia; and, to compleat the public tranquillity, the interposition of the British fleet under sir John Norris, in favour of the crown of Portugal, brought the king of Spain into terms with his Portuguese majesty.

Prince Eugene, who had acted as the imperial plenipotentiary in settling the preliminaries of peace between the emperor and France, did not live to see the fruits of his negociation come to perfect maturity, he dying at Vienna in the month of April, at the age of seventy-three, leaving behind him the character of an invincible hero, an accomplished general, and a consummate politician.

About this period a very extraordinary personage started up in Europe, and for some time created great speculation and discourse. The republic of Genoa held the sovereignty of the island and kingdom of Corsica, but had exercised their authority with so much tyranny, that the inhabitants had thrown off their yoke, and taking up arms, had defeated several parties of troops their quondam masters had sent to reduce them. In this conjuncture Theodore Baron Stein, a man of a bold and enterprising genius, assisted by some persons in England, landed in the island of Corsica in an English ship, where he was received with open arms by the insurgents, who were prepossessed in favour of his appearance, which was very commanding and respectable; and in a little time he prevailed so far with the Corsicans, that having engaged all the credit he had or could procure for arms and ammunition, which were landed in Corsica, the inhabitants proceeded to elect him their sovereign; and he was regularly crowned king of Corsica in an open plain, by the name of Theodore the First, king of Corsica; and some small pieces of money with that inscription were actually coined: but all these promising appearances were soon after blasted. He had been extremely lavish of his succours both of men and money. Month after month elapsed, and no such succours appeared. His new subjects began to suspect him of having imposed upon their too ready belief. Some of the principal of them took the liberty to expostulate with him upon this head. Incensed at their presumption, Theodore ordered them to be tried and executed by the sentence of a court-martial of his own appointing. This proved the sentence of his own degradation: he soon found the affection of his new subjects began to cool towards him. The Corsicans are noted for never forgetting or forgiving an injury. Theodore, troubled for the consequences of their resentment, prudently chose to leave the island; but this was not to be done without the safeguard of some plausible pretext: he therefore feigned an invitation from some foreign powers with whom he was to hold a conference, and promising to return with large supplies of arms and money, which, he said, his presence was necessary to procure, he abandoned his kingdom, and never set foot in it again; but, after a variety of romantic adventures, ended his days a prisoner for debt in the King's-Bench prison in England.

On the first of February, 1737, the British parliament assembled, when the session was opened by commission, his majesty being indisposed, in consequence of the fatigue he had suffered in a tempestuous passage from Holland. The lord-chancellor, as one of the peers authorised by this committee, made a speech in his majesty's name to both houses. He acquainted them, "That with regard to foreign affairs, the respective acts of cession being exchanged, and orders given for the evacuation and possession of the several countries and places by the powers concerned, according to the allotment and disposition of the preliminary articles, the great work of re-establishing the general tranquillity was far advanced; but his majesty was of opinion, that great attention ought to be paid to the final conclusion of the new settlement, which was to dispose of such considerable parts of Europe: that though there was the most promising appearance of a general lasting tranquillity; yet common prudence called upon the British nation to avoid an indolent security, and too great a disregard to future events: that, in a word, she ought to be provided against all attempts that might be made against her peace by any of her enemies: that his majesty had, as soon as the circumstances of affairs would permit, made such a reduction of the public expences as was consistent with the quiet and safety of his kingdoms, the security of commerce, and the honour and interest of the nation: that he could not, without surprise and concern, observe the many designs and contrivances carried on, in various shapes, and in different parts of the nation, tumultuously to resist and obstruct the execution of the laws, and to violate the peace of the kingdom: that these disturbers of the public repose, conscious that the interests of his majesty and his people were the same, and sensible of the harmony that subsisted between him and his parliaments, had levelled their sedition against both, and, in their late outrages, had either directly opposed, or at least endeavoured to render ineffectual, some acts of the whole legislature: that the consideration of the height to which these these audacious practices might rise, if not timely suppressed, afforded a melancholy prospect, and required particular attention, lest they should affect private persons in the quiet enjoyment of their property, as well as the general peace and good order of the whole community."

This speech was answered by very loyal addresses from both houses, expressing their abhorrence of the outrages complained of, and their resolution to support his majesty in all his endeavours to re-establish the general tranquillity. After this, the commons having heard council on the controverted elections, proceeded to take the supply into consideration. They voted ten thousand men for the sea-service; they continued seventeen thousand and upwards for the land-service. The money was raised by the land and malt taxes, and one million was granted out of the sinking fund.

The subject which occasioned debates of the most consequence in the lower house was a motion made by Mr. Pulteney for an address to his majesty, that he would be pleased to settle one hundred thousand pounds per annum upon his royal highness the prince of Wales. Such a provision, he said, was conformable to the practice of antient times; it had been enjoyed by his present majesty in the life-time of his father, and was a settlement both reasonable and necessary to ascertain the independency of the apparent heir to the crown. This motion was seconded by sir John Barnard, and supported by a variety of instances from the English history, to shew the expediency and rectitude of such a measure.

The motion was certainly a very popular one: his royal highness and his amiable consort had endeared themselves to the whole nation by their many virtues. The members of the opposition were sensible of this, and endeavoured to strengthen their own interest by uniting it with that of the princely power. At the same time, they hoped that the minister, by opposing this measure (which they well knew he would) would compleat the measure of his unpopularity. His royal highness, on the other hand, could not but entertain a grateful sense of the generous services intended him, and thought himself obliged in honour to stand by his friends who had so warmly espoused his interest. The minister was apprehensive of the consequences that might ensue from thus separating the dependence of the son upon the father, and giving to the party adverse to his administration so respectable and popular a head: he therefore used his utmost endeavours to prevent his royal highness from consenting to the motion being made, but to no purpose.

However, when it came before the house, sir Robert opposed it with great firmness, though with a becoming decency to the illustrious object. He represented it as an encroachment on the prerogative of the crown, as an officious intermeddling in the affairs of the royal family, and as an insidious attempt to set the king and prince at variance; and indeed it should seem, that his majesty had already received intimation of, and had highly resented, this step of the prince and his friends; for sir Robert in the midst of his harangue told the house, by his majesty's command, that on the preceding day the king had sent a message to the prince by several noblemen of the first quality, to the following purport: "That upon his royal highness's marriage he had immediately taken into his royal consideration the settling a proper jointure upon the princess of Wales; but that his majesty's sudden going abroad, and his late indisposition since his return, had hitherto prevented the execution of those his gracious intentions: that from this short delay, however, his majesty did not conceive that any inconvenience could arise, especially as no application had been made to him upon that subject by his royal highness: that his majesty had now given orders for settling a proper jointure upon the princess of Wales, suitable to her high rank and dignity, which he would in proper time order to be laid before the parliament, in order to be rendered more certain and effectual: that although his royal highness had not thought fit to desire his majesty that his annual allowance of fifty thousand pounds, which was now paid him monthly, rather than quarterly, according to his royal highness's own request, might be rendered less precarious; the king, to prevent the bad consequences which, he apprehended, might follow from the undutiful courses which, his majesty was informed, the prince had been advised to pursue, would grant to his royal highness, for his majesty's life, the said fifty thousand pounds per annum, to be issued out of the civil revenues, over and above the prince's revenues arising from the duchy of Cornwall, which his majesty thought a very competent allowance, considering his own numerous issue, and the great expence which did and must necessarily attend an honourable provision for the whole royal family." To this message the prince returned a verbal answer, desiring their lordships to lay him with all humility at his majesty's feet; to assure him that he did, and ever should, retain the utmost duty for his royal person: that he was very thankful for any instance of his majesty's goodness to him or to the princess, and particularly for his majesty's gracious intention of settling a jointure upon her royal highness; but that as to the message, the affair was now out of his hands, and therefore he could give no answer to it: that his royal highness afterwards used many dutiful expressions towards his majesty, adding, "Indeed, my lords, it is in other hands; I am sorry for it;" or words to that effect.

Sir Robert then proceeded to demonstrate, that the annual sum of fifty thousand pounds was as much as the king could afford to allow for the prince's maintenance; and he expatiated upon the bad consequences that might ensue from rendering the heir-apparent independent of the reigning sovereign: he particularly insisted, that the parliament had no right to interfere in the creation or maintenance of a prince of Wales: he allowed, indeed, that the parliament had addressed or petitioned the king upon the death of Edward the Black Prince, that his son, afterwards Richard II. might be created prince of Wales; but that measure, he said, was in all probability directed by the king himself.

These objections did not pass unanswered. Mr. Pulteney observed, that in regard to the latter instance, there was great reason to believe that Edward III. would not have been so forward to create his grandson Richard prince of Wales, had he not been in a manner compelled to it by his parliament, since it was notorious that Edward, in the decline of life, had fallen into a sort of love-dotage, and and was entirely governed by his mistress Alice Pierce, and his second son the duke of Lancaster, with whose respective views such a preferment evidently clashed. The supporters of the motion also observed, that the sum of fifty thousand pounds was not equal to the prince's unavoidable annual expence, exclusive of those acts of charity and munificence ever expected from persons in such exalted stations; not to mention that the several deductions for land-taxes and fees reduced that fifty thousand to forty thousand, or a very little more. As to the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, they demonstrated, that they did not exceed ten thousand pounds per annum, in all making about fifty-two thousand pounds a year; whereas, by his majesty's own regulation, the expence of the prince's household amounted to sixty-three thousand pounds yearly. They asserted that the produce of the civil list exceeded nine hundred thousand pounds, which was more by one hundred thousand pounds a year than his late majesty had enjoyed: they shewed, that in the first year of the late king, his whole household expence, and that of the civil government, was very little more than four hundred and fifty thousand pounds a year. The parliament, they said, had added one hundred and forty thousand pounds annually for acts of charity and bounty, together with the article of secret service-money, and allowed one hundred thousand pounds for the maintenance of the prince of Wales.

His majesty's message, as reported by sir Robert Walpole, made various impressions on the house. Some considered it as a wicked attempt of the minister to divide the royal family, while others were induced to think that his royal highness had suffered himself to be too easily led away by the insinuations of some self-interested persons in the opposition. The debate was vehement and long; the best speakers on both sides exerted all their abilities in supporting their respective opinions; but the question being at last put, the motion was rejected, by a majority of thirty voices (two hundred and thirty-four against two hundred and four.)

The house having resolved itself into a committee to consider of the national debt, a state thereof was delivered in on the eighteenth of March, when it was found to amount to forty-seven millions eight hundred and fifty-five thousand nine hundred and forty-eight pounds three shillings and three pence halfpenny. Several of the members thinking that the interest paid for this debt was too high, sir John Barnard moved, "That his majesty should be enabled to raise money either by sale of annuities, or by borrowing at an interest not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards redeeming old South-sea annuities; and that such of the annuitants as should be inclined to subscribe their respective annuities, should be preferred to all others."

Evidently calculated as this motion was for public utility, as later experience has happily proved, the ministry and their friends raised a powerful opposition to it; but the excellent patriot who proposed it enforced his plan with such strong and unanswerable arguments, that they were obliged for the present to yield to the motion; and accordingly, on the thirteenth of March, sir Charles Turner reported from the committee, "That it was their opinion, that all the public funds redeemable by law, which carried an interest of four per cent. should be reduced according to the respective provisos or clauses of redemption contained in the acts of parliament for that purpose, or, with consent of the proprietors, should be converted into an interest or annuity not exceeding three per cent. nor redeemable till after fourteen years; and that his majesty should be enabled to borrow from individuals, or public bodies, any sum of money, at an interest not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards reducing the national debt." Several resolutions were founded on this report, and a bill was immediately prepared, and read a first and second time; but a motion being made for having it committed, this was over-borne by ministerial influence, and the bill miscarried.

The next remarkable contest in the lower house was occasioned by a bill sent down from the lords for punishing the magistrates of the city of Edinburgh, on account of the murder of captain John Porteous, of which we have already given a narrative.

When his majesty's speech at the opening of the session was under consideration in the house of peers, that part of it which related to riots and tumults was formally taken notice of by lord Carteret, who observed, that notwithstanding the power with which the civil magistrate was invested, the military force had been employed in suppressing the late disturbances; none of which, he said, had proceeded from any disaffection to the government, but from very different causes. He represented the murder which had been committed by the populace at Edinburgh, as of the most atrocious nature; and said, that the conspiracy by which it had been effected was the more alarming, as it had not been attended with any of those disorders so common to a rising of a headstrong and riotous populace, which afforded the greatest reason to believe that it had been framed and conducted by persons of rank and consequence. Upon the whole, his lordship was of opinion, that the house ought to make the most diligent inquiry into this affair, in order to discover the delinquents, and bring them to condign punishment; and even to punish the city of Edinburgh, if it should appear that the inhabitants and magistrates had not exerted their utmost endeavours to suppress the insurrection. His lordship then moved, "That the provost and bailies of Edinburgh, in the year 1736; that the person commanding the city-guard at the time of the riot in which captain Porteous was murdered; that the commander in chief of his majesty's forces in Scotland at the time of the said riot; should all of them be ordered to attend the house on a day appointed; and that an humble address should be presented to his majesty, desiring that the different accounts and papers relating to the murder of captain Porteous might be submitted to their inspection."

These documents being accordingly produced and examined, and all the witnesses arrived, including three Scottish judges*; and the house having procured all the intelligence that could possibly possibly be obtained, a bill was brought in to disable Alexander Wilson, esq. lord provost of Edinburgh, from enjoying any office or place of magistracy in Edinburgh, or elsewhere in Great Britain; for imprisoning the said Alexander Wilson; for abolishing the city-guard; and for taking away the gates of the Nether-bow port, so as to open a communication between the city and the suburbs in which the king's troops were quartered.

This bill was strenuously opposed by the duke of Argyll, and the other Scottish lords, as a proceeding harsh, unprecedented, and unjustifiable: nevertheless it was passed, and sent down to the commons, where it produced a long and violent debate; and the opposition made to it in the committee of that house was so vigorous, that the whole of it was saved only by the casting vote of colonel Bladon, the chairman. At length it was reduced to a simple act, "disabling Alexander Wilson, the lord-provost, from enjoying any office or place of magistracy in the city of Edinburgh, or elsewhere in Great Britain; and for imposing a fine of two thousand pounds upon the city for the benefit of Porteous's widow." Thus altered, the bill was returned to the lords, by whom it was approved, and soon after received the royal assent. Another bill was also brought in and passed, appointing rewards for the discovery of any of the parties concerned in the murder of Porteous, and punishing those who should knowingly conceal them. Notwithstanding all which, and though many thousands were concerned in that affair, and several actually tried for the same, yet nothing transpired that could serve to elucidate the grand object of enquiry, the murder of Porteous.

To the account of the proceedings of this session it may not be improper to subjoin a view of the play-house bill, which was now passed into a law. It seems the minister and his friends had been highly provoked at the unreserved manner in which they had been satirised upon the stage; and sir Robert Walpole having gotten into his hands a manuscript comedy, which was fraught with the bitterest sarcasms upon the administration, he produced it to his friends, who immediately joined with him in a design to suppress, for the future, all personified satire on men in power. For this purpose a bill was brought in for limiting the number of play-houses, and for subjecting all dramatic performances exhibited on the stage to the inspection of the lord-chamberlain of his majesty's household, without a licence from whom they should not be suffered to be acted.

This measure, however, was violently opposed by all the anti-courtiers, who represented it as a direct violation of the liberty of the press, and the subjecting true genius to shackles, which in all human probability it would never be able to shake off. Their arguments were of little avail; for, notwithstanding their utmost efforts, the bill passed by a considerable majority.

While this bill was depending in the house of lords, a speech was made against it by the earl of Chesterfield, in which all the powers of eloquence were displayed to the utmost advantage, both in composition and delivery. This speech gives a true idea of the nature of a restraint of the kind proposed, and will prove an entertaining relief to the reader from the dull repetition of parliamentary transactions, with which this period of our history is unavoidably loaded.

After speaking of the precipitancy with which the bill had passed the house of commons, and of its being pushed into an almost empty house of lords at the end of a session, his lordship proceeds: "I have gathered from common talk, while this bill was moving in the lower house, that a play was offered to the theatre in order to be exhibited, which, if my account be right, was truly of a most scandalous and flagitious nature. What was the effect? Why, the manager to whom it was offered not only refused to act it, but carried it to a certain person in the administration, as a sure method to have it suppressed. Could this be the occasion of the bill? Surely no. The caution of the players could never occasion a law to restrain them: it is an argument in their favour, and a material one, in my opinion, against the bill. It is to me a proof that the laws are not only sufficient to deter them from acting what they know would offend, but also to punish them in case they should do it.

"My lords, I must own I have observed of late a remarkable licentiousness on the stage. There were two plays acted last winter (his lordship meant Pasquin, and king Charles I.) that one would have thought should have given the greatest offence; and yet they were suffered without any censure whatever. In one of these plays the author thought fit to represent religion, physic, and the law, as inconsistent with common sense. The other was founded on a story very unfit for theatrical entertainment at this time of day; a story so recent in the minds of Englishmen, and of so solemn a nature, that it ought to be touched upon only in the pulpit. The stage may want regulation; the stage may have it; and yet be kept within bounds, without a new law for that purpose. I cannot think but great men are generally more solicitous to guard their own characters from public contempt than to maintain the principles of public virtue, decency, and order.

"One of the greatest goods we can enjoy is liberty; the best things have their alloy. Liberty has its alloy: licentiousness is the alloy of liberty; it is the natural excrescence, the ebullition of vigorous liberty. When I touch the one, it is with a fearful, with a trembling hand, lest I should unwarily do a violence to the other. Is a play a libel upon any one? The law is sufficient to punish the offender, and the injured person in this case has a very singular advantage; he can be under no difficulty to prove who is the publisher of it. The player himself is the publisher, and there can be no want of evidence to convict him.

"When we complain of the licentiousness of the stage, I fear we have more reason to complain of bad measures in our polity, and a general decay of woolpacks. Some Scottish lords maintained, that they had a right to sit next to the judges of England; but after a long debate this motion was rejected, and the judges of Scotland

virtue and good morals amongst us. Ridicule and satire have their use; in such a circumstance they have a direct tendency to correct the guilty, while the innocent have nothing to fear from them. Just conduct exempts every person from the consequences of satire; for satire unjustly cast, reverts upon the censurer, and ridicule ill applied, makes the person who uses it ridiculous.

"My lords, if it were necessary a bill of this kind should pass, I am of opinion, the method proposed in this, to restrain the licentiousness complained of, will not answer the purpose; for if it does not extend to the restraint of printing (which I hope it never will), it cannot produce the desired effect. When my lord chamberlain has marked a play with his refusal, may it not be printed? will it not be printed with double the advantage, when it shall be insinuated that it was refused for having some strokes of wit or satire in it, that were not suffered to come on the stage; and will not the printer set the refusal in his title, as a mark of value? Is it not natural to be fond of any thing that is forbidden? and will it not be more likely to have its effect among the people by this means, when the printed play may cost but a shilling, and the seeing it acted will cost three or four? Does not the satire remain in print to be read and considered, when the offence in acting is over and forgot? I do not doubt but there are people, who would sit down and write a play on purpose to have it refused, and that will be the only merit belonging to it; for I must observe to your lordships, that although it is very difficult to write one that is fit to be acted, yet it is easy enough to write one that is fit to be refused.

"When this is the case, will it not be said, Shall we suffer a play to be printed after it has been forbid to be acted? shall we prevent the administration from being abused in Drury-lane, and allow it to be abused all over the nation? What can be said in answer to this? I own, I think one restraint as reasonable as the other. When this point is once gained, another step will undoubtedly follow; it will be said, Shall we prohibit the printing of a libel in the form of a play, and permit a libel not in the form of a play to be published? This restraint, which appears to me as reasonable as the two former, puts an end to the liberty of the press, which we all seem to think of such vast importance; and therefore I cannot but be against the first step, which must lead us to the last.

"Besides, my lords, we ought in all points to be tender of property. Wit is the property of those who are possessed of it, and very often the only property they have. Thank God, my lords, this is not our case; we are otherwise provided for. I must own, I am not for laying any restraint upon wit; but by this bill wit is to be delivered out to the public by retail; it is to be excised, my lords, and there is to be a remarkable distinction in this excise from all others, that the lord-chamberlain is to have all the several offices vested singly in himself; he is to be the gauger, surveyor, judge, and jury, without allowing any recourse to those important officers, the commissioners of appeal!"

After saying more concerning the hardships of this act to authors, and paying an elegant compliment to the then lord chamberlain, in whose impartiality and judgment his lordship declares he has the greatest confidence, he concludes thus: "My lords, from laws of this nature I suspect very ill consequences, nor can I frame to myself any one good argument, or reason, for this bill. It is an arrow that does but glance upon the stage; but it will give its fatal wound to the liberty of the press. No country ever lost its liberty at once: it is by degrees that work is to be done; by such degrees as creep insensibly upon you, till it is too late to stop the mischief; like different shades of the same colour, in which it is impossible to remark the several gradations*."

Every one remembers how right his lordship's opinion was, as to the printing of plays that were refused by the licenser, and even as to the writing of plays on purpose to have them refused, that they might be printed only. Whether the noble orator was equally right in what he predicted concerning the press, or whether his apprehensions for that part of liberty carried him a little too far, may perhaps admit of a doubt: thus much, however, is certain, that too much caution and vigilance cannot be used in a point that so nearly concerns the very being of our constitution, and which, it may reasonably be apprehended, every bad minister would take the first opportunity to carry against us.

On the twenty-first of June, 1737, his majesty put an end to the session with a speech, in which he complained greatly of the licentiousness of the times, which, under the colour and disguise of liberty, shewed a defiance of all authority, a contempt of magistracy, and even a resistance of the laws, to the prejudice of the prerogative of the crown and the true liberties of the people; and then, after recommending the vigorous exertion of the laws, as the only means to remedy this abuse, his majesty expresses himself in these words: "I have made the laws of the land the constant rule of my actions; and I do with reason expect in return, all that submission to my government and authority, which the same laws have made the duty, and shall always be the interest, of my subjects."

The attempt made by the leaders of the opposition, with the tacit consent at least of the prince of Wales, to obtain an addition to his royal highness's income, had disgusted the king, and occasioned a visible coolness between them; but an affair, of a very interesting and delicate nature, happened soon after the close of that session, which increased the former misunderstanding to an open breach between his majesty and the prince, and in its consequences proved more than a mere family difference.

The princess of Wales had advanced to the very last month of her pregnancy, without being thought to be so near her time as she really was: being with their majesties, and the rest of the royal family, at Hampton Court, without any midwife attending her, she was, on the thirty-first of July, seized with the pains of child-birth, which increased so violently, that the prince, who was with her, was obliged to hurry her to London, where she was that night delivered of a daughter, the princess Augusta, now hereditary princess of Brunswick.

His majesty, on being acquainted with this unlooked-for event, sent a message, by the earl of Essex, to the prince, congratulating him upon the birth of the princess; but at the same time expressing his displeasure at his royal highness's conduct in carrying away the princess from Hampton Court under the immediate pains of child birth, without acquainting his majesty or the queen with the circumstances the princess was in, or giving them the least notice of his departure; a conduct which his majesty looked upon as a deliberate indignity offered to himself and the queen, and which he resented to the highest degree. The prince deprecated his majesty's anger in several submissive letters, in which he laboured to excuse the step he had taken, by alleging, that it had happened thro' the uncertainty of the physician and midwife, as to the time of the delivery of the princess; his highness also implored his royal mother's mediation in his behalf. The princess joined her intercessions to those of her consort, but his majesty was too deeply incensed to be moved by their humility or supplication; and on the tenth of September following, the duke of Grafton was sent by his majesty to the prince, with a very severe message, in the close of which he gave the prince to understand, that it was his royal pleasure, that his highness should quit St. James's, with all his family, when it could be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the princess; and that his majesty should, for the present, leave to the princess the care of his grand-daughter, until a proper time called upon him to consider of her education.

In obedience to this message the prince retired to Kew, and made other efforts to be re-admitted into his majesty's favour, which, however, he could not regain. Nevertheless he sent lord Baltimore, one of his household, to the lord Grantham, the queen's chamberlain, intreating to know whether she would receive a letter from him, in mitigation of his conduct. Her majesty refused her consent. The princess then wrote an humble and submissive letter to the king, who returned an answer full of affection and civility to her highness, though it plainly appeared by some expressions therein, that his displeasure at the prince was rather increased than abated.

In the mean time the guards were taken off from their attendance on the prince and his consort; and all persons who paid their court to the prince and princess were not suffered to come into his majesty's presence, or any of his palaces. The letters which passed between the royal family on this occasion, were published by authority, and made various impressions on the minds of the people. All the prince's servants soon after joined the opposition to the ministry.

Upon the whole, I think it must appear to every candid and impartial person but too probable, that both the king and the prince were imposed upon, by those who found their account in creating a difference between them. If the prince's conduct, however, was in some respects reprehensible, the punishment seems to have been more than severe, and even to approach towards cruelty; for he was denied admission into the presence of the queen his mother in her last moments, to implore her forgiveness, and receive her dying benediction.

In October, this year, a deputation of the merchants of London waited on his majesty at Hampton Court, with a petition, in behalf of themselves and others trading to, and interested in, the British colonies in America, setting forth, that the fair and lawful trade to the British plantations in America, had been greatly interrupted for many years past, not only by their ships being frequently stopped, and arbitrarily seized on, in the high seas, by Spanish ships, fitted out to cruize under the plausible pretext of guarding their own coasts; but that the commanders thereof, with their crews, had been inhumanly treated, and their ships carried into some of the Spanish ports, and there condemned, with their cargoes, in manifest violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns, &c. and praying that his majesty would be graciously pleased to procure them speedy and ample satisfaction for the losses they have sustained, &c. To this petition his majesty returned a most gracious answer, and his secretary of state sent fresh orders to Mr. Keene, to repeat his instances at the court of Madrid for their relief. In the mean while a committee of the privy-council sat at Whitehall, to receive proofs of the losses which the merchants had suffered by the Spaniards.

And here it will not be improper to observe, that whereas by the treaty of 1670, subsisting between us and Spain, our ships are not to resort nor trade to the coasts of New Spain and its adjoining provinces (unless driven thither by distress of weather) their sailing near to those shores rendered them liable to be suspected of carrying on a contraband trade with those provinces of Spanish America, the trade to which is absolutely and most strictly confined to Spaniards solely; and there is scarce any doubt to be made that our sloops and coasting vessels from Jamaica, and other British colonies, did sometimes run the hazard for the sake of gain, and therefore ought to submit to the consequences. So, on the other hand, it is notorious, that the Spanish guarda-costas did frequently exceed their powers or commissions, by searching, plundering, and often seizing on our British ships sailing on the American seas, even though not so near their shores as to give just ground of suspicion of any clandestine trade, and though not laden with the produce of the Spanish American provinces; but only perhaps having, by mere chance, a few Spanish pieces of eight found in the ship, or perhaps a small parcel of logwood; the first being the only coin in our island of Jamaica, and the last the produce of that island.

In short, these mutual complaints did, in a few years after, bring on the war between Great Britain and Spain; and although the peace of Aix la Chapelle (in 1748) seemed to terminate that affair, yet did it barely seem to do it; and a new and more distinct or explicit treaty appears still to be wanting for that point, and also for the logwood trade of our British subjects in the bay of Campeachy.

About this time also the French gave us no small umbrage by their eagerly pushing into an universal commerce, as the surer, though slower, way of compassing their old favourite scheme of universal dominion. And although, by our late amazing success against the French colonies in America, matters are since greatly changed, yet the steps taken by that crafty nation are well worth tracing, as mementos for futurity.

In Africa they had monopolized the gum trade near the river Senegal: they had also encroached on the English settlement at the river Gambia, and had greatly extended their slave trade on that coast, for the encouragement of their West India sugar islands, islands, where they had at this time gained so much ground on ours as to be the great exporters of sugar, and also of indico, cotton, and ginger, to many parts of Europe. They had also erected a considerable settlement on the coast of Guinea, near Surinam in South America, encroaching both on the Dutch and Spaniards there.

On the north continent of America they assiduously pursued the plan of Lewis XIV. for forming a chain of forts and settlements from the mouth of the great river Mississippi, up to their province of Canada, with a view thereby to cut off our continent settlements from any commerce with the vast Indian countries westward, and in time to get possession of them all. For that end they had strongly fortified the island of Cape Breton, near the entrance of the river St. Lawrence, which served as well to command that entrance as to protect a great cod-fishery which they have of late amazingly increased in the neighbouring seas.

From Quebec, their capital of Canada, they had opened and fortified a communication with the lakes lying behind, and properly as much belonging to our province of New York as any other part of that province can be said to be; and had also taken possession of the fertile lands round those lakes, much of which they had already cleared, and in part cultivated. Westward they were said to have already extended their communication as far as the Spanish province of New Mexico, with a view, no doubt, to the rich silver mines there. Eastward from the Mississippi they had, by this time, settled so far up as to have forts within twenty days march of Charles-town, our capital of South Carolina. Of all which vast improvements and encroachments on the territories of other nations, and more especially of our own, authentic accounts were laid before our government and our board of trade, yet no effectual regard was shewn thereto. In the East Indies also France had, by this time, increased her trade almost beyond belief, without receiving any interruption from us or other states concerned, who might in the beginning easily have defeated this and most of the above encroachments, had vigorous measures been taken in due time.

These particulars I have judged necessary to lay together before my readers at one summary view, for serving the better to illustrate and explain what may hereafter fall in my way, in respect to the all-grasping designs of the French nation.

While I am upon commercial affairs, I must not omit to take notice, that in the course of this year Mr. Oglethorpe returned from Georgia, with an account of the promising state of that infant colony, where the Indians had submitted to his majesty's authority. The Spanish governor of Florida, and the council of war residing at St. Augustine and Darien, had signed a treaty with the colony; and besides the town of Savannah, which was then in a flourishing state, three other towns, Frederica, Augusta, and Darien, were founded; and a new town, called Ebenezer, had been built by the Saltburghers, who had been obliged to leave their country by the persecution of the German government on religious and civil accounts.

The doge and senate of Venice having thought proper to pay even royal honours to the pretender's son, who made a visit to their city in the summer of this year, our court so highly resented their proceedings, that the resident from that republic here had notice given him to leave London in three days, and the kingdom in a week, for the insult offered by his master to his majesty's crown and dignity.

On November 20, at seven o'clock in the evening, died, to the inexpressible grief of his majesty, the royal family, and the whole nation, Wilhelmina-Carolina-Dorothea, of the house of Brandenburg-Anspach, queen-consort of Great Britain, aged fifty-four years, eight months, and twenty days. Her majesty had been for some days disordered, and was treated by her physicians as for the gout in her stomach; but the distemper proved to be a concealed rupture. No princefs ever lived more in the love and esteem of all who knew her than she did. His majesty was for some time inconsolable for his loss; and it must be confessed that no sorrow was ever more justifiable. She was a pattern of conjugal fidelity and affection; and by the virtues of her heart, her uncommon penetration, her lively yet solid wit, and her extensive generosity, she had rendered herself equally the delight of her royal consort, her own family, and the whole nation. In her the poor lost a noble benefactress, the learned a powerful and munificent patroness. In a word, all degrees of people were affected with her death, as every one considered as personal the loss the public sustained by her death. She had by close study so improved her natural sagacity and talents, that she became an umpire in one of the most abstruse points of metaphysics that ever was agitated, the doctrine of free will and fatality, as disputed between Mr. Leibnitz and Dr. Clark.

Although the foreign events of this year were very little interesting to Great Britain, yet I shall, for the information of my readers, give a summary account of them.

During this summer a rupture happened between the Turks and the Russians, which last reduced the city of Asoph on the Black Sea, and overran the greatest part of Crim-Tartary. The czarina declared war against the Ottoman Porte, because the Tartars of the Crimea had made incursions upon her frontiers; and when she complained of those disorders to the vizir, she had received no satisfaction. Besides, a large body of Tartars had, by order of that minister, marched through the Russian provinces in despite of the empress, and committed horrid havock in their route. The emperor was obliged to engage as a party in this war, by a treaty offensive and defensive which he had many years before concluded with the Russian crown. Before he declared himself, however, he joined the maritime powers in offering his mediation to the sultan, who was very well disposed to peace; but the czarina insisted upon retaining Asoph, which her forces had reduced; and this preliminary article being rejected, as dishonourable to the Ottoman empire, no accommodation could be effected, and the troops of the belligerent powers were therefore distributed into winter-quarters. The duke of Lorraine had now succeeded to the duchy of Tuscany, on the death of the last of the Medicis family; and the French were by this event relieved from the burthen of a great annuity, which they had obliged themselves to pay him till he should succeed to Tuscany. The king of Spain's troops evacuated that duchy, and the provinces in Italy now yielded to the house of Austria.

In this situation were the affairs of Europe, when his Britannic majesty opened the parliament on the twenty-fourth day of January, 1738. His speech was remarkably short, and concluded with recommending the dispatch of public business with prudence and unanimity. Each house presented a warm address of condolence upon the queen's death, with which the king seemed to be deeply affected.

Mutual complaints and remonstrances still continued between our merchants and the court of Spain, with whom the nation now seemed exasperated beyond all farther sufferance. His majesty, as we have already observed, had referred the examination of the complaints of our merchants to a committee of the privy-council, who endeavoured to make good their allegations. Their cause was specious and popular; the public warmly espoused their quarrel; they were strongly supported by the anti-courtiers in both houses, who were bent upon a war with Spain. A petition, similar to that which had been presented to his majesty, was now laid before the house of commons, and reinforced by others of the like nature from most of the trading towns in the kingdom; all which had such an influence upon the house, that a motion was made to address his majesty for copies of all the representations sent by the English ministry to that of Spain, from the first day of November last, and of such answers as had been returned to those remonstrances. This brought on a long debate, in which the cruelties of the Spaniards, and the tameness of the English ministry, were displayed in the strongest colouring. Every speaker of note on each side exerted himself on this occasion; but the minister, who had a settled aversion to engaging the nation in a war, adhered firmly to his pacific plan, insisting that every method ought to be tried to bring Spain to terms, if possible, before we proceeded to forcible measures. He approved of the former part of the motion, but thought it would be dangerous to comply with the latter; and he made a long speech in defence of his opinion: in fine, the motion was rejected by a considerable majority, as was also a bill brought in by Mr. Pulteney, for the more effectual securing and encouraging the trade of his majesty's subjects to America. The intention of this act was, to give the property of all prizes taken from the Spaniards after the declaration of war, to the officers and sailors present in the action; to allow to the sailors the sum of five pounds, by way of head-money, for every Spaniard taken at sea; and to vest in the captors, by his majesty's patent, the property of all the places conquered from the Spaniards.

This bill passed through the first reading without opposition; but when it was moved to recommit it for a second reading, sir Robert Walpole, who seems thoroughly to have studied the question, opposed it in a speech, to the following effect:

He said, that with regard to the first article, as the bill then stood, if hostilities were immediately to commence against Spain, and a squadron of English ships of war was to take the whole Plate fleet of the Spaniards, with all their register ships, every shilling of the money must become the property of the English seamen, though it was notorious that not one fifth part of that treasure belonged to the Spaniards, but was the property of the French, the Dutch, and other trading nations of Europe; and as it was not to be supposed that the sailors would willingly part with what was once declared to be their due, the government would find itself under the very disagreeable necessity, either to violate the present act, in order to make them refund the effects of the neutral nations, or the parliament must load the people with new taxes, in order to make good that money; or, in case of failure of these expedients, Great Britain must be inevitably involved in a war with all the different nations whose property she had thus invaded: that with respect to the granting head-money for every Spaniard taken at sea, he thought it a very wise and proper measure, and therefore he would agree to it as soon as war should be declared: that as to the third article, he thought it of a most dangerous nature; and that if it passed into an act, it must effectually prevent all possibility of concluding any safe or honourable peace, because in all negotiations some places on both sides were usually given up, in order to facilitate the treaty; a method which could not be pursued if his majesty, by letters-patent, should bestow the property on others. He insisted, that such an act would be attended with the absolute ruin of the British commerce all over Europe: he desired the house to consider what must be the case of the British merchants then residing in Spain, their persons, their ships, and their properties, all which the Spaniards would undoubtedly sequester. What, he asked, must the Dutch think of such a bill? or what power in Europe could be our hearty friend, should such a bill be enacted into a law? He then acknowledged the justness of the general complaint; promised that the most effectual means should be employed for redress during the summer; and on its being insinuated that those promises would prove as little effectual as his former efforts of the same kind, he asked, how he should be able to shew his face again in that house, if he did not procure full reparation for the honour of the nation, as well as the loss of our merchants? As to the insinuations, he said, which had been thrown out by those who opposed his measures, merely from a spirit of opposition, that he was afraid of a war, because peace was his only safety, he did not understand upon what they could be grounded: for his part, he declared he never could see any cause, either from reason or from his own experience, to imagine that a minister was not as safe in time of war as in time of peace: nay, were one to judge by reason alone, it was the interest of a minister, conscious of any mismanagement, to engage his country in a war, as the only means to divert the eyes of the public from examining too closely into his conduct; nor was he accountable for the bad success of a war, as he was for that of an administration.

These arguments, with those advanced by other members, were deemed so satisfactory, that the bill was rejected by a considerable majority; the country party, however, determined to dispute every inch of ground. At last Mr. Pulteney brought into the house a set of resolutions, importing, that it was our undoubted and natural right to sail with our ships on any part of the seas of America; and that the freedom of our navigation and commerce merce had been greatly interrupted by the Spaniards, under pretences altogether groundless and unwarrantable. These, after having undergone some amendments, were unanimously approved, and presented to his majesty. There was an endeavour to propose some other questions, which were thought necessary, because they would more fully and plainly have asserted our rights; but they were overruled: yet this, with the address that followed, was more than sufficient to convince the minister, that the opposition, who had the majority of the people on their side, were determined to bring on a war between us and Spain.

Mean while the lords were no less eager than the commons in enquiring into the subject of the Spanish depredations, and in their resolutions upon this important affair went still farther than the other house; for they not only asserted our undoubted right to navigate in the American seas, "but also to carry all sorts of goods, merchandize, or effects, from one part of his majesty's dominions to any other part thereof; and that no goods being so carried, are, by any treaty subsisting between the crowns of Great Britain and Spain, to be deemed or taken as contraband or prohibited goods; and that the searching such ships on the open seas, under pretence of their carrying contraband or prohibited goods, is a violation and infraction of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns." And in the address which accompanied these resolutions, their lordships gave his majesty the strongest and most sincere assurances, that in case his friendly and powerful instances for procuring restitution and reparation to his injured subjects, and for establishing the future security of their trade and navigation, should fail of having their due effect on the court of Spain, they would zealously and cheerfully concur in all such measures as should become most necessary for the support of his majesty's honour, the preservation of the British navigation and commerce, and the common good of these kingdoms.

To this address his majesty was pleased most graciously to reply, that he was sensibly touched with the many hardships and injuries sustained by his trading subjects in America, from the cruelties and unjust depredations of the Spaniards; that they might be assured of his care to procure satisfaction for the injuries they had already suffered, to secure the freedom of navigation for the future, and to maintain his subjects in the full enjoyment of all the rights to which they were entitled by treaty and the law of nations; and that he doubted not but he should have their assistance in the support of such measures as might be necessary for this purpose.

Thus ended an enquiry, which had, from the first meeting of the parliament, engrossed the attention of the public to the exclusion of every other object. Two millions were granted to his majesty for the service of the current year, and for enabling him to pay to the company of the Bank of England the sum of one million, in order to redeem an annuity of forty thousand pounds, to which they were entitled; and some farther regulations were made for preventing the abuse of spirituous liquors.

On the twentieth of May, 1738, his majesty put an end to the session with a speech, in which he observed, "that, agreeable to what had appeared to be the concurrent opinion of both houses of parliament, he had given orders to repeat, in the strongest and most pressing manner, his instances at the court of Spain for obtaining satisfaction for the many injuries and losses sustained by his trading subjects in America, and for effectually securing their rights for the future; and he hoped, from the justice and equity of the Catholic king, to procure and establish a free and uninterrupted exercise of trade between the subjects of the two crowns, agreeable to treaties and the law of nations."

The minister now saw himself obliged to give way to the current; accordingly, when the parliament was risen, we put almost our whole navy into commission; and so strongly persuaded was the public, that we should then really attempt to procure ourselves justice by our arms, that even those who still questioned the sincerity of these military preparations, scarcely dared avow their scruples, especially when they saw admiral Haddock, a brave and experienced officer, sent up the Mediterranean with a fleet of fifteen ships of the line. But it soon appeared how very averse the ministry was to engage in a war; for towards the latter end of the summer our hostile measures were suspended, and the nation was told, that Spain, terrified with the apprehensions of a war, had granted us all we could reasonably desire, and had submitted to whatever we could have hoped for even at the end of the most successful war. This, had it been true, was a very fortunate event; as in such a case that court must necessarily have formally disavowed her pretended dominion in the seas of America, and her practice of searching our ships: but how great was the surprize of the public, when, some months after our military preparations had been laid aside, it was confessed by the minister, that nothing had been yet agreed upon! What likewise augmented the general uneasiness, was a discovery said to be made in that interval, that our fleets, sent out during the summer to the West Indies and to the Mediterranean, carried with them no orders to act offensively, or to make any reprisal, though they departed from home long before the pretended submission of Spain, and at a time when the minister made the strongest protestations of his resolute intentions. Probably he imagined he could be able to manage matters so as to prevent a war, which he thought would amply compensate for the sufferings of the merchants, and that the public would be brought to give the preference to a peace, which promised so many advantages to trade and commerce. But he was mistaken: the horrid accounts published in the news papers, and enforced in the antiministerial writings, of the Spanish barbarities, had exasperated all ranks of men beyond any probability of reconciliation with pacific measures. The case which made the greatest noise, was that of one Jenkins, master of an English ship, who had his ear, or part of his ear, cut off by the crew of a guarda-costa, with circumstances of the utmost insolence against the person of his majesty and his subjects. It was now publicly said, that our boasted preparations were never designed against our enemies, but only to amuse the people at home, till Spain was prevailed upon by our intreaties to condescend to treat with us upon any terms, in order that something, bearing the appearance of an agreement, might be produced before the meeting of the parliament, which, however insufficient, might at least serve as an annual expedient of delay, if

if it could not be imposed upon the nation as satisfactory and honourable.

But the insolence of Spain was so much inflated by these measures, that no agreement could be procured from that court till after the usual time of convoking the parliament, which was prorogued in expectation of it, and afterwards adjourned, in order to get the articles ratified: however, during the prorogation and adjournment the long-expected convention arrived, and was soon after published to the nation.

Four days after the conclusion of the session (viz. on the twenty-fourth of May, since the alteration of style the fourth of June) the princess of Wales was delivered of a son, who was baptized by the name of George, and is our present most august sovereign. His birth was celebrated with uncommon rejoicings; addresses of congratulation were presented to the king by the two universities, and almost all the cities and corporations in the kingdom. But the prince of Wales still laboured under the displeasure of his majesty, who ordered the lord chamberlain to signify in the Gazette, that no person who visited the prince, should be admitted into his majesty's presence.

A spirit of riot and misrule discovered itself amongst the lower class of people, in different parts of the kingdom, during the course of this year, chiefly owing, as was supposed, to the intemperate use of that pernicious compound, gin. The most dangerous tumults were in the western counties of England, where a number of journeymen weavers rose in a riotous manner, and committed the most terrible outrages against the persons and properties of several masters in that branch of trade, by whom they imagined themselves ill used. The affair at length grew so serious, that the government was obliged to quarter bodies of troops in several of the borough and market-towns, to prevent the sedition spreading farther. The metropolis itself was also far from being free from tumults and disorders; in particular, a most dangerous insult was committed upon justice, by a party of sailors at Wapping, who cut down from the gibbet, and brought to life, one Buchanan, who had been condemned to be hanged for murder; and notwithstanding the atrociousness of the crime, and the danger of the example, so much were the offenders favoured by the public, that not one of them could ever be discovered.

About the middle of October the prince and princess of Wales went to Bath, and staid there near six weeks, in which time they paid a visit to the city of Bristol, where they were entertained with great magnificence and signs of the most cordial affection. In this year a charter passed the great-seal for establishing an hospital for the maintenance and education of exposed and deserted young children, commonly called the Foundling Hospital; an institution which had been brought to bear by the indefatigable care and pains of one captain Coram, who had spent great part of his life in North America, and who ruined his private fortune by his application for its success, which he afterwards brought to bear at a time when, by the course of nature, he could have but a very few years to enjoy the accomplishment of his noble design. About the same time a most noble general hospital was founded at Bath, as was another at Edinburgh, upon voluntary subscriptions; and another was projected at York. It is the province of history to record acts of this nature, which do honour to humanity.

The first session of parliament of the year 1739 was opened on February 1, when his majesty acquainted both houses in a speech, that, supported by the concurrent advice of both houses of parliament, he had lost no time in making preparations to do himself and his people justice, if the conduct of the court of Spain had laid him under that necessity: that he had at the same time, in the strongest terms, repeated his instances for obtaining such reparation for the many injuries and losses already sustained, and such effectual security for the future, as might prevent the consequences of an open rupture: that he had now the satisfaction to acquaint them, that the measures he had pursued had been so successful, that a convention was concluded and ratified between him and the king of Spain, by which, upon a strict examination of the demands on both sides, that prince had obliged himself to make reparation to the British subjects, by the payment of a certain stipulated sum: that plenipotentiaries were likewise named and appointed for regulating, within a limited time, all those grievances and abuses which had hitherto interrupted the British commerce and navigation in the American seas; and for settling all matters in dispute in such a manner as might, for the future, prevent and remove all new causes and pretences of complaint, by a strict observance of our mutual treaties, and a just regard to the rights and privileges belonging to each nation: and, finally, that he would order the convention to be laid before them.

The chief point with the ministry now was to make the convention (of which a copy had by some means been procured and published) pass the two houses of parliament, by procuring an address of thanks to his majesty for the communicating it to them, which at the same time would be esteemed an approbation of the measures. The motion met with great opposition, but was at last carried in the affirmative in both houses, in the commons by a majority of twenty-eight.

By this convention it was agreed, in substance as follows:

" I. That immediately after the signing thereof, two plenipotentiaries on each side should meet at Madrid, within six weeks after the day of exchanging the ratifications, there to confer and finally regulate the respective pretensions of the two crowns.

" II. Until the limits of Florida and Carolina can be adjusted, things shall remain there in their present situation.

" III. His Catholic majesty shall cause to be paid to his Britannic majesty the sum of ninety-five thousand pounds sterling, as a ballance admitted to be due to the crown and subjects of Great Britain, after deduction made of the demand of the crown and subjects of Spain, to the end that the above-mentioned sum, together with the account of what has been acknowledged on the part of Great Britain to be due to Spain, on her demands, may be employed by his Britannic majesty for the satisfaction and payment of the demand of his subjects upon the crown of Spain. But this reciprocal discharge shall not relate nor extend to the differences subsisting between the crown of Spain and the South Sea company, company, nor to any particular nor private contract between either of the two crowns or their ministers with the subjects of the other, or between the subjects of the one crown with those of the other.

“IV. If it should happen that, in consequence of orders dispatched by the court of Spain, any part of the value of certain (named) ships taken from the English, and included in the ninety-five thousand pounds, be already paid, the same shall be deducted therefrom.”

There were, besides, two separate articles, the first, importing, that the above-mentioned sum of ninety-five thousand pounds was to be paid at London, within four months after the exchange of the ratification.

By the second separate article it was stipulated, that the third article of the above convention shall not extend to ships taken since the tenth of December, 1737; in which cases justice shall be done, according to the treaties, as if the convention had not been made. It being however understood that this relates only to the indemnification and satisfaction to be made for the effects seized, or prizes taken; but that the decision of the cases which may happen, in order to remove all pretext for dispute, is to be referred to the plenipotentiaries, to be determined according to the treaties.

This is the substance of a convention which made so much noise in Europe, and had almost ruined the internal tranquillity of England. What gave the greatest disgust of all here was, the king of Spain's following declaration and protest, which he insisted on as a preliminary condition of his ratifying the above convention, viz. “That he reserves to himself, in its full force, the right of being able to suspend the Asiento for negroes, and of dispatching the necessary orders for the execution thereof, in case the South-sea company doth not subject itself to pay, within a short term, the sum of sixty-eight thousand pounds sterling, which it has confessed to be owing on the duty for negroes, according to the regulation of fifty-two pence per dollar, and on the profits of the ship Royal Caroline. And farther declares, That under the validity and force of this protest the signing of the said convention may be proceeded on, and in no other manner.”

The injustice of this previous demand on the company was so apparent, that soon after the said company's general court, on the first of March, resolved not to pay the same without the king of Spain's coming to a just account with them for all the seizures and captures of their ships and merchandize, which he had engaged to refund to them.

The country party seeing every thing thus carried before the minister; and that writing, speaking, and voting was no longer effectual, they determined to try some other means to quicken the sense of the nation. This produced the SECESSION (as it was called) by which a considerable number of members retired into the country, and gave no more attendance during the whole session; and about forty lords entered their protests upon the address to his majesty receiving the approbation of their house. The secession seems to have been suggested by sir William Wyndham, who made no secret during the debate, that should the convention be approved, they were determined never again to come into the house. The question therefore was no sooner decided than sir William Wyndham stood up, and expressed himself in the following terms:

“This address (to congratulate his majesty on the success of his royal endeavours in concluding a convention with the king of Spain) is intended to convince mankind, that the treaty under our consideration is a reasonable and honourable treaty: but if a majority of thirty members in such a full house, should fail of that success; if the people should not implicitly resign their reason to a vote of this house, What will be the consequence? Will not the parliament lose its authority? Will it not be thought, that, even in parliament, we are governed by a faction? And what the consequence of this may be, I leave to those gentlemen to consider, who have given now their vote for this address. For my own part, I will trouble you no more; but, with these my last words, I sincerely pray to Almighty God, who has so often wonderfully protected these kingdoms, that he will graciously continue his protection over them, by preserving us from that impending danger which threatens the nation from without, and likewise from that impending danger which threatens our constitution from within.”

Sir William then left the house, and with him upwards of sixty members, who chose to withdraw after they had given their testimony against this measure of the minister, lest even their attendance and fruitless opposition might seem to justify and give a sanction to what they could not approve. The friends of the minister were so exasperated against sir William, on account of this speech, that they were actually going to move to send him to the Tower; but sir Robert, who possessed an admirable fortitude and coolness in all critical events, restrained them; but afterwards he himself, in a long and eloquent speech, painted the opposition in terms more severe than he had ever before been known to make use of: he likened their conduct to that of the Jacobites, who absented themselves from parliament at the time when the bishop of Rochester was tried and condemned.

Mean while the convention was no less strenuously opposed in the upper house. Lord Carteret, who took the lead in the arguments against it, observed, that possibly one of the contracting parties had presented a protest or declaration, importing, that he acceded to such or such a measure, only upon condition, that the terms of that protest or declaration should be made good, “therefore (continued he) until my mind can be free from the most distant suspicion that such a protest may excite in the present case, I cannot form a just opinion of the transaction itself, nor communicate to your lordships any light that may be necessary for that purpose.”

His lordship, in this part of his speech, alluded to a protest that had been actually made by the marquis de la Quadra, the king of Spain's minister, previous to his master's ratifying the convention, in terms already mentioned. This protest had been delivered to Mr. Keene, the British ambassador, at Madrid, who had promised, that if the South Sea company really owed the sum insisted upon in this declaration (a circumstance of which he declared himself at that time entirely ignorant), he would engage it should be paid with the utmost punctuality. This conduct of Mr. Keene was greatly greatly censured by all the members in the opposition, who insisted, that he ought not to have so far forgot his character as to have accepted the protest: nay, they did not spare to say, that the whole transaction had been carried on by our minister at home, who was ready to give up the honour and advantage of his sovereign and the nation, rather than enter into a war with Spain. These suggestions were replied to, and the character of the minister at home, and our plenipotentiary abroad, strongly vindicated by the lord Hervey, and other peers of the court party. After some debate a motion was made, "That a day should be appointed for examining the directors of the South Sea company touching the sum of sixty-eight thousand pounds, mentioned in the declaration given to the British minister, and claimed by his Catholic majesty, as a debt due to him by the said company, and that the directors of that company be ordered to attend at the bar of the house for that purpose."

This motion was opposed by lord Hervey and the earl of Ilay, who said, that the South Sea company was a trading body, and as such, had undoubtedly secrets in trade, which it would be very unjust, as well as impolitic, to oblige them to reveal at the bar of the house; besides, they thought, that in any event, a protest signed but by one minister, and that too relating to a mercantile transaction, ought not to be considered as affecting the validity of a public treaty, nor ought it to come under the cognizance of that house, but the whole matter ought to be (as they doubted not it easily would be) settled by the South Sea company and the Spanish minister at London, without the intervention of any other power; and that therefore the motion ought not to be approved if it could be avoided.

The duke of Argyll, on the other hand, strongly defended the motion: he declared himself to be of a very different opinion from the noble lord who had spoken on the other side of the question; and that, so far from considering this as the affair of only one set of men in the kingdom, he looked upon it as an affair that nearly concerned the honour of the crown, since the Spanish minister by his declaration allowed no strength, no validity to the convention, any farther than the terms of his demands were complied with. As to Mr. Keene's conduct, however other people might affect to defend it, he would venture to assert that it could by no means be justified. His grace then proceeded to tell the house, upon the best information, that the declaration was made in due form, before the convention was either signed or ratified; so that if the South-sea company should refuse to pay the sixty-eight thousand pounds, he was certain that the Spanish court would insist upon a nullity of all that had been done. They would tell us, that this declaration was of the same force with any article of the convention: that they had given us fair warning of it before the treaty was signed; and that, if we had not been pleased with the terms, we were under no obligation to sign the convention, since it was not their fault if we were not sufficiently apprised of the consequences. His grace owned, indeed, that the king of Spain had a right to demand from the South-sea company the performance of engagements entered into by them: he said, he could not conceive that his Catholic majesty had any right to tell them, that if they would not pay whatever arbitrary demand he was pleased to make, he would revoke the contract. Upon the whole, his grace declared, he was for complying with the motion, that the house might have the opportunity of strengthening his majesty's hands, the better to enable him to obtain justice for the company, as well as the rest of his subjects. Notwithstanding these, and many other sensible and cogent arguments in favour of the motion, it was thrown out on a division, by a majority of forty-nine against forty-two.

A message having been delivered to the upper house from his majesty, importing, that he had settled thirty-nine thousand pounds per annum on the younger children of his family, and desiring their lordships would bring in a bill to enable him to make that provision good; after some debate the house complied with his majesty's request, and a bill was ordered to be prepared for the purpose.

On the tenth of May the duke of Newcastle produced a subsidy-treaty, by which his majesty obliged himself to pay to the king of Denmark seventy thousand pounds per annum, on condition of that prince's furnishing his Britannic majesty a body of six thousand men when demanded. At the same time his grace delivered a message from the king, desiring the house would enable him to fulfil this engagement; and also to raise what money and troops the exigency of affairs might require during the approaching recess of the parliament.

This demand was violently opposed by the anti-ministerial lords, at the head of whom was lord Carteret, and as vigorously supported by the other side. In the end, it was approved by the majority, and an address was presented, assuring his majesty that the house would support him in fulfilling his engagements, as well as in making such further augmentation of his forces by sea and land as he should think necessary for the honour, interest, and safety of his kingdoms.

The same message being communicated to the commons, they voted seventy-five thousand five hundred and eighty-three pounds for the subsidy to Denmark, and five hundred thousand pounds for augmenting the forces on any emergency. As Great Britain stood engaged by the convention to pay to the crown of Spain the sum of sixty thousand pounds, in consideration of the ships taken and destroyed by sir George Byng, in the year 1718; which sum was to be applied to the relief of the British merchants who had suffered by the Spanish depredations, the commons inserted in the bill a clause, providing for this sum to be paid by parliament.

In the course of this session a very salutary law passed for the encouragement of the woollen manufacture, and two bills in behalf of the sugar colonies; one permitting them, for a limited time, to export their produce directly to foreign parts, under proper restrictions; the other, making more effectual provisions for securing the duties laid upon the importation of foreign sugars, rum, and molasses, into Great Britain, and his majesty's plantations in America.

The public business being entirely finished, the king came to the house of peers on the fourteenth day of June, and put an end to the session with a short short speech, in which he recommended unanimity amongst ourselves, as the only sure means of disappointing the expectations of our enemies.

And now the rumour of a war with Spain began to revive, notwithstanding the parliamentary sanction the convention had received: for the king of Spain did not only suffer the four months to elapse, within which time he was to pay the before-mentioned ninety-five thousand pounds, on pretext of the South Sea company's failure of paying his demand of the sixty-eight thousand pounds; but instead of fulfilling the terms of the convention, he ordered seizures to be made of the ships and goods of his majesty's subjects wherever they could be found, in his dominions or otherwise: and also ordered all the British subjects in his dominions to depart in a shorter time than allowed by treaties. This proceeding put an end to the conferences which we had still carried on with that crown; and Mr. Keene presented a thundering declaration to the court of Madrid, which was followed by an order of council at home (dated July 10, this year, 1739) for granting letters of marque and reprisal to our merchants. The preamble to this order breathes a true spirit of resentment, and had the honour to be signed by the two archbishops, and some other privy counsellors, in the absence of the minister, who had retired into the country. In the mean while, the land forces were augmented; many ships were put into commission; and there was a very hot press for seamen to man them; for which purpose an embargo was laid on all merchant-ships; and several other steps were taken that seemed to give countenance to the earnest hopes and expectations of the nation.

The orders for reprisals had been very prudently dispatched, above a month before their publication in London, to commodore Brown, who then commanded a squadron at Jamaica, in order to give him an opportunity of making the best use of them before the Spaniards could have notice of their designs, and consequently be prepared against them. A resolution was also formed of endeavouring to preclude the Spaniards from the resources of their wealth in the West Indies and the South Seas.

With this view two squadrons were immediately ordered to be got ready with all expedition; the one to be put under the command of George Anson, esq. who was then captain of his majesty's ship the Centurion; and the other, under that of captain Cornwall. The squadron under Mr. Anson was to take a regiment of foot on board, with three independent companies, to be commanded by colonel Bland, to set sail with all possible expedition, and not to call at any place till they reached Java Head in the East Indies, and there stay no longer than to take in water, and afterwards proceed to Manila in Luconia, one of the Philippine islands belonging to the Spaniards. Captain Cornwall's squadron was to be of equal strength with the former, and to pass round Cape Horn, directly into the South Seas; and after cruising along that coast, and attempting the Spanish settlements there, if practicable, was in its return to rendezvous at Manila; and after its junction with captain Anson, the squadrons were to act in concert for the execution of some considerable projects, for which they were to receive farther orders. This scheme was in general so well liked by the nation, that about the beginning of September orders were sent by a small vessel to captain Anson, to return with his ships directly to Portsmouth.

The great view of the nation being now to distress the Spaniards, in order to promote it the more effectually, another squadron was ordered to be fitted out for the West Indies; and the command of it given to Edward Vernon, esq. then just made vice-admiral of the blue, who, on account of the eminent services he had formerly done his country in that part of the world, was looked on by all as the most proper person to be entrusted with so important an enterprize. Though the conduct, fidelity, and diligence of this brave sea commander, added to a thorough knowledge of the American seas, had been already sufficiently shewn, to the entire satisfaction of the nation, yet his services had been hitherto disregarded, at least unrewarded, by the government. But though his rank among the flag officers had been so long overlooked and neglected; and though he had withdrawn from any public employment, and on several accounts had been disgusted at the conduct of the ministry; yet upon application made to him to undertake the command of a squadron for the service of his country, he immediately laid aside all private animosity, and sacrificing every other consideration to the welfare of the public, very cheerfully obeyed the summons, desiring only a few days to settle his family affairs. The squadron being got ready, the admiral was, under his majesty's sign-manual, appointed commander in chief of all his ships in the West Indies. Soon after, arriving at Portsmouth, he took under his command nine ships of the line, besides lesser vessels, and soon after sailed on his expedition.

In the beginning of September don Geraldino, the king of Spain's envoy-extraordinary, and Terry, his agent at London for the Affiento contract, both left this kingdom, and returned home; and Mr. Keene, the British minister, left Madrid about the same time. On the nineteenth of October his majesty signed a declaration of war against Spain, which was proclaimed on the twenty-third in the usual manner, and at the accustomed places, amidst innumerable crowds of people, who testified their satisfaction thereat. In his declaration, his majesty charges the king of Spain with breaking the convention lately concluded, by not paying the stipulated sum, admitted to be due to the subjects of Great Britain, in the time appointed; and alleges, that his declaring war against the said king is for the maintaining the honour of his crown and kingdom, and for the obtaining redress for the much-injured merchants and traders who, from all parts of the kingdom, made earnest petition for relief. It was indeed high time for our government to take this step (though done with more than seeming reluctance) for the violence and insolence of the Spaniards in America were become absolutely intolerable, principally owing to our own shamefully pusillanimous temporizing at any rate, rather than resolutely doing ourselves justice by force of arms.

In some little time after the declaration of war, an account came from admiral Haddock of his having taken two rich Caracca ships; but this good news was in some measure allayed by the escape of the Affogue ships, the intercepting of which was the chief object of our government. These ships, instead of coming from La Vera Cruz, by the Madeira or Canary Islands, as usual, sailed by the Bahamas, north about, and then westward, till within sight of Ireland, and so by the Land's-End of England, made Ushant (the point of France) whence creeping along shore, they at last crossed the Bay of Biscay. A squadron of the English fleet was then cruising off Cadiz and Cape St. Vincent, and another off Cape Finisterre; but the Spanish admiral, by some means or other, seems to have had notice of all their stations, and took care not to come within eighty or one hundred leagues of them.

We heard of nothing for some time but places sacked, ships taken, and all advantages gained on our side. The Spaniards were in the utmost consternation, and seemed neither to have power nor inclination to oppose our progress.

Mean while, the conduct of the French court and the States-general gave occasion to various surmises. It was strongly apprehended that the former, notwithstanding their professions to the contrary, would declare in favour of the Spaniards, while the latter appeared disposed to observe a strict neutrality. Mr. Horace Walpole, the minister's brother, had been sent to the Hague, in order, if possible, to persuade the States-general to espouse our cause; but all he could obtain from their High Mightinesses was a vague promise, that they would still continue to cultivate the friendship of the English; and would not fail, in case of necessity, to furnish us with the succours stipulated by treaty.

The events of war still proved very unfavourable to the emperor: he had bestowed the command of his army upon veldt-marshal count Wallis, who assembled his forces in the neighbourhood of Belgrade, and advanced towards Crotzka, where he was attacked by the Turks with such impetuosity and perseverance, that he was obliged to give ground, after a long and obstinate engagement, in which he lost above six thousand men. The Turks were afterwards routed at Jaboutra: nevertheless, their grand army invested Belgrade on the side of Servia, and carried on the operations of the siege with extraordinary vigour. The emperor dreading the loss of the place, seeing his finances exhausted, and his army considerably diminished, consented to a negotiation for peace, which was finally concluded in the month of November. By this treaty the house of Austria ceded to the grand seignior, Belgrade, Sabatz, Servia, Austrian Wallachia, the isle and fortrefs of Orseva, with the fort of St. Elizabeth; and the contracting powers agreed that the Danube and the Saave should serve as boundaries to the two empires.

The Russian general, count Munich, had obtained a victory over the Ottoman forces at Cholzun in Moldavia, and made himself master of that place; but the czarina finding herself abandoned by the emperor, and unable to cope with the whole power of the Turkish empire, took the first opportunity of putting an end to the war, upon honourable terms. After a short negotiation the conferences ended in a treaty, by which the czarina was left in possession of Asoph, on condition that its fortifications should be demolished; and the ancient limits were re-established between the two empires.

The vast trade which England enjoyed at the beginning of this war proved of the greatest detriment to herself, and advantage to her enemies, as it presented them with the more frequent opportunities of making captures at sea. The French lent them both ships and seamen, who sailed under Spanish colours; and their success in privateering at first was so great, that the commercial part of the nation exclaimed vehemently, and not without some shew of reason, at the negligence of the admiralty in providing proper convoys for our merchant ships. The city of London, as the greatest sufferer on this occasion, was inflamed to a degree of distraction against the minister, whom they accused of turning against his country a war, into which, it was well known, he had been forced against his will, and which he was wont contemptuously to stile "the merchants war." Thanks were ordered to the city members for their having opposed the convention; and at the same time a paper of instructions to them was drawn up, replete with the most stinging reflections on the minister and his measures, and requiring the members to make the passing a place and pension-bill the previous step to the passing of any money-bill whatever. The example of London was followed by other great cities and corporations all over England. This proceeding was represented, by the friends of the ministry, as utterly unconstitutional, and tending to deprive the representatives of that very liberty which their constituents seemed so earnestly to contend for. But here I would beg leave to ask, what other way those constituents could possibly find of making known their real sentiments to their representatives, whose duty it most undoubtedly is to deliver to the great assembly of the nation the sense of that part of it which they have the honour to represent? The Londoners gave still more remarkable instances of their resentment against those who voted for the convention, by setting aside sir George Champion, member for Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire, the next alderman in rotation to the chair, from being lord-mayor this year, which office he was never after suffered to possess, because he gave his vote to that measure. For several years this innovation caused great feuds in the city at the annual election of a mayor.

This year was distinguished by the rise of a new religious sect, called Methodists, the disciples of one Whitefield, a clergyman of a warm and enthusiastic turn, and of two brothers named Wesley, who have since found so many votaries amongst the common people, as greatly to alarm the friends of rational religion and true piety.

The British parliament meeting on the fifteenth day of November, his majesty in his speech informed both houses, that he had augmented his forces both by sea and land; but expressed his apprehension that the court of Spain had been encouraged to that conduct which had made it necessary for him to have recourse to arms, by the heats and animosities which had been raised here at home. Affectionate addresses were presented by both houses, after a faint opposition made by the ministry.

In the course of the debate on this subject in the lower house, sir John Barnard took occasion to complain of the little care that had been taken, since the commencement of hostilities, to protect the traders of Great Britain, who, he affirmed, had been been much greater sufferers by captures than the Spaniards. In answer to this insinuation sir Charles Wager, then at the head of the admiralty-board, observed, that as to the English having been greater sufferers by captures than the Spaniards, he believed it was true, and there was a sufficient, perhaps an invincible, reason for it; namely, that the former had a great deal more to lose than the latter: that the sea was covered with English ships, and the extent of their trade gave the Spaniards an opportunity of making frequent captures: that the Spaniards had but very little foreign commerce in Europe, and the little they had was carried on in neutral bottoms, so that the flags of other nations protected their property; but that, in his opinion, the war in all other respects had been duly prosecuted. He then proceeded to shew, that the government had no fewer than thirty-four ships of war employed in its service in the West Indies; a greater number than had ever been employed in those parts in any former period.

The seceding members had now resumed their seats in the lower house; and Mr. Pulteney, in an eloquent speech, thought proper to vindicate their conduct in the extraordinary step they had taken. He was answered by sir Robert Walpole, who was pretty severe upon the late secession, which he treated with a good deal of contempt and indignation. He asserted, that it was chiefly owing to their absence that so many useful and popular bills were passed towards the end of the last session; and if they were returned only to oppose and perplex, he should not be at all sorry to see them secede again.

The minority, however, continued inflexible in their opposition to the ministry; and on the twenty-first of November sir W. Wyndham, at the end of a long speech, in which he inveighed with great acrimony against the conduct of the administration, moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, as a dutiful return to his gracious desire of the advice of his parliament at this critical and important juncture; and as a farther testimony of their firm resolution vigorously to support his majesty in the prosecution of the war against Spain, humbly to beseech his majesty never to agree to any treaty or negotiation for a peace with that crown, unless the acknowledgement of the natural and undoubted right which the English had to navigate in the American seas, to and from any part of his majesty's dominions, without being seized, searched, visited, or stopped, under any pretence whatsoever, shall have been first obtained as a preliminary article."

This motion was too reasonable and popular for the minister to venture to oppose. It accordingly passed without a contradictory voice, met with the concurrence of the lords, and on the twenty-third of November was presented by both houses to his majesty, who in his answer was pleased to tell them, that their unanimous and vigorous support, by enabling him to carry on the war, would be the best means for procuring a safe and honourable peace; and that they might depend upon his using his utmost endeavours to obtain effectual security for the just rights of navigation and commerce belonging to his subjects.

Mr. Pulteney soon after revived a bill which he had formerly prepared for the encouragement of seamen, which, after a long dispute and eager opposition on the part of the ministry, passed both houses, and obtained the royal assent. It is hereby enacted, that during the present war merchant ships may be navigated by any number of foreign seamen not exceeding three-fourths of the ship's company: and for the better encouragement of foreign seamen to serve on board British ships during this war, such foreign seamen serving (as well on board our merchant-men as ships of war) for two years, shall afterward be deemed, in all respects, natural-born subjects, but without capability of enjoying any posts or offices of trust, &c. under the government. This act also empowers the crown in any future war, by proclamation, during such war and no longer, to permit the like number of foreign seamen to serve in merchant ships, privateers, and men of war. This prudent law was followed by another very wise one, in sundry respects resembling it, viz. An act for naturalizing foreign protestants in the British American plantations. The more immediate object of this statute was in favour of some thousands of protestants persecuted and oppressed in Germany and elsewhere; all of whom were, before and about this time, settled in the different provinces of the British continent colonies of America, chiefly on the back parts thereof westward. As a further encouragement to seamen to enter into his majesty's service, a proclamation was soon after published, importing, "That his majesty would grant to his subjects separate or united charters or commissions, for the more effectual enabling them to attack or destroy the ships, goods, factories, and settlements of the Spaniards, and to secure to them and their heirs the full and undoubted right, property, and title, to what they should take or cause to be taken from the enemy."

The minority having, in their observations upon the management of the war, complained, amongst other things, of admiral Vernon having been sent out of Great Britain without a supply of land forces, the government, to remedy this inconvenience, had given orders for raising six regiments of marines, to consist in the whole of four thousand eight hundred and ninety men, at the expence of one hundred and eighteen thousand two hundred and fourteen pounds to the public. When this estimate was laid before the house of commons, Mr. Sandys, or lord Polwarth (I am not clear which) moved for an address to the king, desiring that this body of forces should be composed of draughts from the old regiments: that as few officers should be appointed as the nature of the service would admit: and that the house would recommend this method to his majesty, in tender compassion to his people, already burthened with many heavy and grievous taxes. Although this motion was calculated to answer the most just and salutary purposes, yet, as it tended to deprive the ministry of an opportunity of greatly extending its influence by new creations, they set all their force to oppose it; and it was finally rejected, by a majority of one hundred and seventy-seven against ninety-five.

The minority were not discouraged by this repulse, but renewed their attacks against the minister, in the form of several motions, for enquiring into the conduct of those who concluded the convention, &c. &c. But they were all over-ruled.

The pension-bill was again revived, and so powerfully supported by the eloquence of Mr. Pulteney, for W. Wyndham, and Mr. Lyttleton, that it made its way through the lower to the upper house; but there it was again lost, upon a division, after a long and violent debate.

On February 12, after all the estimates for the service of the current year had been ordered in, sir Robert Walpole (as chancellor of the Exchequer) presented to the house a message from his majesty, importing, that having under his royal consideration certain measures which would be attended with some extraordinary expences, not comprehended in the estimates laid before the house, his majesty hoped they would enable him to carry on the same in the most effectual manner. This message was referred, without one contradictory voice, to the committee of supply, who, upon the fourteenth of the same month, resolved to grant his majesty two hundred thousand pounds to account for carrying on the war, and about nine thousand five hundred pounds for services that year, not provided for by parliament; which was agreed to by the house. A million was likewise granted out of the sinking fund, and about two hundred thousand pounds for the ordinary of the navy.

The government having found very great difficulty in manning their ships of war; and the practice of pressing for that purpose having been long a subject of complaint in England; sir Charles Wager presented a bill to the house for registering all seamen, watermen, fishermen, lightermen, keelmen, bargemen, and sea-faring men, capable of serving at sea throughout his majesty's dominions. The minority exclaimed against this practice as of French origin, and tending to reduce a British sailor to the most abject degree of slavery. In fine, by mere force of declamation of the anti-ministerial party, this measure was rendered so odious, that it was judged most prudent to drop it for the present. Here I cannot help observing, that the gentlemen in the opposition seemed to act more from a principle of animosity to the minister, than from a true attention to the good of their country; for sure we stand in great need of some such method of having always in readiness a competent number of seamen to man the royal navy, without having recourse to the barbarous and unconstitutional practice of pressing. The bill offered by sir Charles had in it perhaps some restrictions not strictly consistent with the freedom of Englishmen; but surely such amendments might have been made therein as would have rendered it a constitutional and wholesome law.

The king having by message communicated to the house his intention of disposing of his daughter the princess Mary in marriage to prince Frederick of Hesse-Cassel, and expressed his hope that the commons would enable him to give a suitable portion with his daughter, they unanimously agreed to grant forty thousand pounds for that purpose, and presented an address of thanks to his majesty for having communicated to the house this intended marriage.

The two first months of the year 1740 were distinguished by a most intense frost, which began on Christmas day 1739, and continued almost eight weeks. The Thames was entirely frozen up, and multitudes of people walked over that river upon the ice. Carriages of all kinds passed to and fro as on firm ground. Booths were erected, and a public fair kept upon it. The poor were very great sufferers by this calamity, as the price of coals and other necessaries of life was very high, particularly towards the close of the frost. Let it however be recorded, to the honour of English humanity, that the charity and munificence of the great and opulent kept pace with the distresses of their wretched fellow-creatures. The benevolence of his majesty and the royal family set the example to the nobility, who were readily followed in so laudable a work, by all such who had the power of relieving the wants of those in less happy circumstances. Societies for the more equal distribution of private charities were every where formed, and some of the most distinguished personages in the kingdom made it their pride to become not only stewards, but even collectors for the poor.

Little more remains to add to the history of parliament this session, save the mention of some excellent laws of which it was productive. A bill for prohibiting commerce with Spain created some difference between the two houses, which occasioned several conferences; but the lords at last dropped their amendment, and it passed. The state of paper-money in the British colonies in America was taken into consideration, and found to be very deplorable, and prejudicial to trade; and several unanimous resolutions for addressing his majesty on that head were passed by the commons, particularly, that his majesty should require and command the respective governors of his colonies and plantations in America not to give assent to, or pass any act whereby bills of credit may be issued in lieu of money, without a clause to be inserted in such act, declaring that the same shall not take effect until the said act should be approved by his majesty. An excellent law was continued relating to the premiums upon the importation of all kinds of materials for ship-rigging, and for encouraging the Greenland fishery, by granting a farther bounty to all ships employed in the whale-fishery during the war, and for protecting their crews from being impressed.

On the twenty-ninth of April his majesty put an end to the session by a speech, in which he thanked the commons for the supplies they had so liberally granted, recommended unanimity and concord to both houses, and expressed his hopes that the preparations which he was making for carrying on the war, in the most vigorous and effectual manner, would be blessed with success, equal to the justice of his cause. The parliament was then prorogued to the third of June, and by various prorogations afterwards to the eighteenth of November following. In the beginning of May his majesty set out for Hanover, after having appointed a regency. In a few days after his departure the marriage of the princess Mary with the prince of Hesse was solemnized by proxy, the duke of Cumberland standing for that prince; and in June her highness sailed for the continent. Some little time before the session of parliament broke up, the duke of Argyll resigned all his posts under the government. So much for the common domestic occurrences of this period. I now come to consider events more interesting to the public, and such as for a time filled the nation with great satisfaction, and seemed to charm the voice of opposition into silence.

On the thirteenth of March, while the British parliament was yet sitting, captain Rentone arrived from from vice-admiral Vernon, with the important advice that he had made himself master of the town and forts of Porto Bello, with six ships only.

PORTO BELLO stands on the north side of the Isthmus of Darien, which, running from east to west betwixt the North and South Seas, joins the two continents of North and South America. It is eighteen leagues from Panama, which lies on the north side of the Isthmus, has a convenient bay about a mile deep, with good anchorage and shelter for ships, and near half a mile broad at the mouth of the river. At the entrance of the north side of the bay, close by a steep rock, stood a strong castle, called the Iron Castle, mounting seventy-eight great guns, with a battery beneath, parallel with the water, of twenty-two guns. The castle and fort were defended by a garrison of three hundred men. On the opposite side of the bay, but about a mile farther up, on an eminence, stood La Gloria, another castle, consisting of two regular bastions toward the sea, mounting ninety guns, with a curtain between of twenty-two guns, besides a line of eight guns pointing to the mouth of the harbour; the whole defended by four hundred men. A little above this castle, near the other end of the town, on a point running into the bay, stood Fort St. Jeronymo, a sort of quadrangular redoubt, strongly built, well mounted with cannon, and properly manned. Under the cannon of Gloria Castle and Fort St. Jeronymo, all the enemy's ships in the harbour rode at anchor; and this defence, with the guns of the Iron Castle, rendered the entrance of the harbour extremely difficult. At the bottom of the harbour lies the town of Porto Bello, built along the shore in the form of a crescent. It is the market through which all the wealth of Peru, and the manufactures of Europe, circulate annually. It was taken by the Buccaneers in 1688; but afterwards, being refortified more strongly, it had for some time been reckoned impregnable; so that it was formally given out, that a squadron of ships, and at least eight thousand men, could not take it, when the British ships lay rotting, and our sailors dying away, at the Bastimentos, under the unfortunate Hosier. Admiral Vernon, however, had, some time before this expedition, given out that he would engage to take it with "only six ships of war." He proved the truth of his assertion, in the manner I shall now relate.

Admiral Vernon arrived at Port Royal at Jamaica on the twelfth of October, 1739, where he first took care to notify his arrival to Mr. Trelawney, the governor of that island; and at the same time desired his assistance and concurrence in the enterprise for which he had been ordered into those parts, assuring him of his own zeal to execute the same, and his endeavours to maintain the most cordial harmony with his excellency. The admiral was, soon after his arrival, joined by commodore Brown, with the Hampton Court only; and having obtained a full state of the Spanish shipping in those seas, and the places at which they were stationed, he from thence concluded that they had concerted to meet at Carthagena, in order to go and open the fair at Porto Bello, the money having been some time before carried from Panama: he therefore resolved to sail immediately, and get, if possible, to Porto Bello before them, that he might lose no time. Upon communicating his instructions, and the proper signals, to his captains, and having taken in the necessary stores, on the third of November he ordered commodore Brown to hoist his distinguishing pendant on board the Hampton Court, and get ready to sail with the other captains, on the fifth, early in the morning. The admiral's whole squadron was to be employed on this service, consisting of six ships only, viz. the Burford, his own ship (with captain Watson under him) of seventy guns, and five hundred men; the Hampton Court, the commodore's ship (who had captain Dent under him) of seventy guns, and four hundred and ninety-five men; the Worcester, captain Perry Mayne, of sixty guns and four hundred men; the Stafford, captain Trevor, of sixty guns, and four hundred men; the Princess Louisa, captain Waterhouse, of sixty guns, and four hundred men; the Norwich, captain Herbert, of fifty guns, and three hundred men; the whole number of sailors on board this squadron being two thousand four hundred and ninety-five men, besides two hundred land forces, commanded by captain Newton.

On the fifth the admiral sailed from Port Royal, and steered for Porto Bello; but by reason of contrary winds, it was the evening of the twentieth before he could get sight of that harbour; and then, there being but little wind stirring, left his squadron should be driven to the eastward of the harbour, he made the signal for coming to an anchor, about six leagues off the shore. On the twenty-first in the morning, he plied in line of battle to windward; but the wind still continuing easterly, he was forced to confine his attack to the Iron Fort, close to which captain Rentone piloted the squadron.

Commodore Brown, in the Hampton Court, who led the attack with undaunted resolution, having fired upwards of four hundred shot in about twenty-five minutes at the Iron Fort, and being well seconded by captain Herbert in the Norwich, and captain Mayne in the Worcester, the admiral perceived that the Spaniards had quitted several parts of the fort; whereupon he made a signal for the boats, in which were about forty sailors, with a company of marines and their officers, to land with all imaginable expedition, whilst he was coming up to the fort to batter it. The admiral luffing up as near the fort as he conveniently could, was saluted with a whole volley, every shot of which almost took place, though but three men were killed, and five wounded. Our sailors, whose courage always increases with danger, returned their salute so effectually, that though the enemy discharged a few more shot, they did us afterwards no considerable damage; for the fire of the Burford's small arms scoured the lower batteries of the Spaniards, driving them from thence, where they could do most execution: and by this means also our men were secured in landing. As soon as they had set foot on shore, our seamen began scaling the walls, which they chiefly performed by one man setting himself close under an embrasure, whilst another climbed upon his shoulders; and thus they entered under the mouths of the great guns, which struck such a general panic into the Spaniards, that the officers and men at the lower batteries quitted them, and fled further up into the fort, after they had first hung out a white flag for capitulating; which the admiral answered with another

another from his ship; but such was the eagerness of the men on board his ship and the Stafford, that it was some time before they could be made to desist from firing.

In the mean while, the seamen who had climbed up the walls of the lower battery having first struck the colours, afterwards drew up the soldiers; upon which the Spaniards, who had retreated into the castle, surrendered at discretion. Of these only five officers and thirty-five men remained out of three hundred, the rest having been killed, wounded, or made their escape.

The ships which had gone in before the admiral fell so far to leeward, that they were not within sight of Gloria Castle; but the admiral's own ship lying open to it, the Spaniards kept firing one of their largest guns at him till night, but did little or no execution.

Next morning, being the twenty-second, the admiral went on board the Hampton Court, commodore Brown, in order to call a council of war, and give the necessary directions for warping the ships up in the night, to attack Gloria Castle, as it would have been impracticable to have attempted it in the day time. But in this he was prevented, by the enemy's hoisting a white flag, and sending a boat with a flag of truce to the admiral, and the conditions signed on which they desired to capitulate; which were, "That the governor would deliver up all the fortifications, provided the garrison might be allowed to march out with the honours of war; have an indemnity for themselves, the town, and the inhabitants; and be permitted to keep all the ships in the harbour. This last article could not by any means be admitted, the admiral being resolved to have those ships which had done the English merchants all the damages they complained of on these coasts. Accordingly, he drew up the articles on which he was willing to treat, and sent them back to the governor, allowing him only a few hours to take his resolution: but within the time limited the conditions offered were accepted; in consequence of which the admiral sent captain Newton, who commanded the detachment of soldiers from Jamaica, with about one hundred and twenty men, to take possession of Gloria Castle and Jeronymo Fort, being the two fortresses which defended the harbour, the one above, the other below the town.

In the harbour were two Spanish men of war of twenty guns each, together with a snow; the crews of which, upon seeing the regular and bold attack made on the Iron Fort, and despairing of being able to defend themselves, fell to plundering the town in the night of the twenty-first, and committed shocking outrages on the inhabitants. Our admiral being now master of the place, proceeded to blow up the fortifications, spiked up above eighty iron cannon, and brought off, on board his own fleet, a great number of brass ordnance, and a great quantity of ammunition, leaving the harbour quite open and defenceless. Thus was this place totally destroyed; and tho' the admiral, for want of land forces, was not able to push his conquests further up the country, yet the national advantage arising from what he had already done was very considerable, particularly with regard to the traders of Jamaica, who had now a fair opportunity of opening an extensive commerce with the Spaniards, who were fond of clandestinely conveying their money from Panama over the Isthmus.

Soon after the reduction of this place, the admiral was joined by captain Knowles, in the Diamond; by the Windsor, captain Berkely; by the Anglesea, captain Reddish; and by captain Stapleton, in the Sheerness; which ships he had detached from Jamaica on different cruizes.

Mr. Vernon, during his stay at Porto Bello, sent a letter to the president of Panama, demanding a releasement of the factors and servants belonging to the South Sea company, whom the Spaniards had confined in that place; together with the restitution of their own personal effects, as well as those of the aforesaid company. In consequence of this message, the president sent an officer, with Dr. Humphreys and Dr. Wright, factors; and also with the servants of the company, who were delivered to the admiral on board his own ship.

On the thirteenth of December the admiral sailed with his squadron from Porto Bello, on his return to Jamaica. In the passage the squadron met with hard gales, by which it was dispersed, and several of the ships received damage in their masts and rigging. Nevertheless, they at last all joined the admiral in Port Royal, where we shall leave him meditating future conquests, and return to England.

No sooner was the success of the British admiral made known to the people at home, than a profusion of rejoicings overspread the united kingdoms and Ireland. Bonfires blazed in every street, and the houses were illuminated: the shouts of "Vernon for ever!" were heard from every tongue: both houses of parliament, the city of London, and all the considerable corporations in the kingdom, addressed his majesty upon the occasion. The house of commons sent the admiral their thanks; the city voted him its freedom. In short, a Roman consul, after reducing a province, never received greater marks of public applause from his country than admiral Vernon did upon his demolition of Porto Bello.

Admiral Haddock was all this summer cruising in the Mediterranean, and had for some time actually blocked up the mouth of that part of Cadiz where the Spanish fleet was then laying. The Spaniards, in order to release their ships, made a feint with another squadron under admiral Pintado, to recover the island of Minorca. Admiral Haddock fell into the snare: he quitted his station to hasten to the relief of that island, when the Cadiz fleet embraced that opportunity to get out with nine men of war and two frigates, which escaped to Ferrol, and joined another squadron in that port. But the want of supplies of treasure from New Spain detained this united fleet in harbour till the French thought proper to pull off the mask, by sending a strong squadron from Brest and Toulon, under the command of the marquis d'Antin, to Martinico, one of their West India settlements, with secret orders not only to act offensively against the British subjects, either jointly with the Spaniards or separately, but even to concert measures with them for attacking Jamaica; and at the same time declaring, that France could no longer behold, with an eye of indifference, the enterprizes which the English nation had formed in America, nor suffer them to make any new establishments there.

The British ministry, who had little suspected any such behaviour from France, were thunder-struck at this proceeding, while the voice of the public called loudly for prosecuting the war with the utmost vigour, in order to convince that court that we were not to be intimidated by their insolent threats. It was therefore necessary to make a shew of some secret expedition, to amuse the nation, and smother their rising discontents. With this view, a powerful fleet was assembled at Portsmouth, when, on the twenty-fourth of June, sir John Norris, admiral of the red, hoisted his flag on board the Victory, a first-rate, of one hundred and ten guns, having under him Philip Cavendish, esq. admiral, and sir Chaloner Ogle, rear-admiral of the blue. Some thoughts were at this time entertained of one day making his royal highness the duke of Cumberland lord high-admiral of Great Britain; for his highness suddenly quitting the camp, which had been formed at Hounslow in expectation of an invasion, arrived unexpectedly in a shallop at the Isle of Wight, where he reviewed a body of marines encamped there, and then went, by the same shallop, on board the Victory man of war, to serve as a volunteer in the intended expedition.

The destination of this fine fleet, consisting of twenty-one sail of the line, and three fire-ships, was variously conjectured. The most received opinion was an attempt to be made on the Spanish squadrons in Ferrol: but whatever were the real motives, the project at last came to nothing; for, after the fleet had been detained about a week at St. Helen's by contrary winds, it sailed from thence on the fourteenth of July with the convoy and the merchant ships for Portugal and the Straights; but meeting with hard gales at south-west, in which the Lion man of war, of sixty guns, ran foul of the Victory, and carried away her bowsprit, and the Lion losing her fore-mast, the fleet returned to St. Helen's, and on the twenty-second sailed again, but was detained at Torbay for near a month; and at last, on the thirtieth of September (the season of action for such large ships being over) returned to Spithead, where his royal highness disembarked. Thus ingloriously ended a very expensive armament, which had engrossed the whole attention of the public, and drawn upon it the eyes of all Europe, without effecting any one purpose.

In the same month of September a small squadron was fitted out under the command of commodore Anson, which gave rise to that gentleman's memorable voyage round the globe. His orders were to sail to the South Seas, in order to attack the enemy's colonies, and co-operate occasionally with admiral Vernon across the Isthmus of Darien. The scheme was well laid; and though it failed in its principal purpose, was afterwards productive of great glory to the commodore, and of much advantage to the nation. This squadron consisted of the following five ships of war; the Centurion (the commodore's own ship) of sixty guns, and four hundred men; the Gloster and Severn, of fifty guns and three hundred men each; the Pearl, of forty guns, and two hundred and fifty men; and the Wager, of twenty-eight guns, and one hundred and sixty men; besides the Trial sloop, of eight guns and one hundred men, and two victualling ships.

Anson's ships did not arrive at Madeira before the twenty-fifth of October, where they watered and took in refreshments of several kinds. On the fourth of November the commodore issued orders to the captains, appointing their rendezvous, in case of separation, at the island of St. Catharine's, on the coast of Brazil in South America; and the same day the squadron weighing anchor from Madeira, steered their course for St. Catharine's, where they arrived on the twenty-first of December, having in the passage lost a great number of their men by the intemperance of the warm climates, while many others were confined to their hammocks in violent fevers, past all hopes of recovery, and some in a very languid condition, affected with fluxes, and other disorders consequent on a recovery from these fevers.

The commodore made all possible dispatch for Cape Horn, but was detained by unavoidable accidents till the eighteenth of January, when the squadron, after burying many of their men, and sickness still increasing, left the island, and sailed to Port St. Julian, on the coast of Patagonia, of which an account shall be given in the sequel.

Mean while the Ferrol squadron, consisting of twelve ships of the line, from sixty to eighty guns, and three frigates, under the command of Don Roderigo de Torres, having found means to escape the look-out kept for them by admiral Haddock, sailed on the twentieth of July for America, with two thousand land forces on board. These unexpected events threw the government of England into some consternation. It was, however, resolved, to send such a fleet to attend them as should be sufficient to encounter all events; but before we give an account of the preparations made in consequence of these resolutions, it will be necessary to return to the gallant admiral Vernon, whom we left at Jamaica, equipping his squadron with the utmost expedition for another enterprize.

After having made all the necessary preparations the nature of the service required, the admiral sailed from Port Royal in the latter end of February this year, in the Stafford, accompanied by the Princess Louisa, Windfor, Norwich, Falmouth, and Greenwich men of war, and a proportionable number of fire-ships, bombs, and tenders, with a design to bombard Carthage, and afterwards to annoy the Spaniards in Fort Chagre, lying a little to the south-west of Porto Bello. After surmounting some difficulties, he anchored in the bay of Playa Grande, before Carthage, and immediately began a brisk bombardment against the town, which did abundance of damage to some of the principal edifices. But not having strength enough to make himself master of the place, he thought proper to return to Porto Bello to refit, from whence he detached cruizers from time to time to lye off Fort Chagre, and soon after put to sea to attack it in person, which he did on the twenty-third of March, and obliged the garrison to surrender. On this occasion the admiral gave equal proofs of his courage and humanity, by the terms of capitulation he granted the enemy.

Advice of this success arrived in England in the month of July; but at the same time the admiral in his letters bitterly complained against the delays lays that had happened in not sending him further reinforcements of ships, men, stores, and provisions; and threw out likewise many severe reflections, as if the minister intended to sacrifice him to his private connections with France; an insinuation which, however, appears to have been rather owing to an over-heated imagination, or to misinformation, than to any real foundation. In truth, the contents of these letters were probably repeated in private epistles to his own friends, so that they became soon public, and the ministry found it behoved them to prosecute the war with greater vigour than they had hitherto done; and therefore, to avoid any further outcries against them, they determined to send the admiral a reinforcement of ships, and a sufficient number of troops, to enable him to look any enemy in the face.

Accordingly, Harrison's and Wentworth's regiments of foot, with six more of marines, besides draughts from other regiments, were ordered to embark for the West Indies, under the command of lord Cathcart, a nobleman of approved honour, and great experience in the military art. A noble fleet was assembled at Portsmouth, under the command of sir Chaloner Ogle, consisting of twenty-one sail of the line, besides frigates and fire-ships, with about twelve thousand sailors on board, and the above-mentioned regiments, and other detachments of foot, of which lord Cathcart was appointed commander in chief. They were likewise furnished with hospital-ships, store-ships, all sorts of warlike implements, and every conveniency: in a word, never had the nation more reason to hope for success from any undertaking. This fleet, however, did not set sail till the latter end of October this year; and by these, and such-like unaccountable delays, by which our ships were detained in the harbour to so late a season of the year, they were incapable of getting through the Channel till the Spaniards had strengthened their settlements in the West Indies, and put themselves in a condition of making a vigorous resistance wherever they should be attacked in that quarter of the world.

This year was distinguished by three events, which made a remarkable change in the system of affairs in Europe: the first was, the death of the king of Prussia, a prince very little esteemed either in his public or private character. He was succeeded on the throne by his eldest son Frederic, the reigning king of that realm, who has so eminently distinguished himself both as a warrior and a legislator.

The second was, the death of Charles VI. emperor of Germany, the last prince of the house of Austria, who expired at Vienna on the ninth day of October, 1740, and was succeeded in his hereditary dominions by his eldest daughter Maria-Theresa, married to the grand duke of Tuscany, who was proclaimed queen of Hungary, Bohemia, &c. &c. But notwithstanding the security of the famous pragmatic sanction, her title to many of her father's dominions was disputed by several princes of the empire, which produced a long war in Europe. The young king of Prussia was no sooner informed of the emperor's death than he entered Silesia at the head of twenty thousand men, seized certain fiefs to which his family laid claim, and published a manifesto, declaring that he had no intention to contravene the pragmatic sanction. The electors of Bavaria and Saxony refused to acknowledge the arch-duchess as queen of Hungary and Bohemia, alleging, that they themselves had pretensions to these countries, as descendants, the one of the emperor Ferdinand I. who was head of the German branch of the house of Austria; the other, as descendant of the emperor Joseph, elder brother of the deceased emperor Charles.

The third event was the death of the czarina Anne-Iwanowna, who by her will appointed prince Ivan (or John) son of duke Anthony-Ulric, of Brunswic-Lunenbourg-Bevern, and the princess Anne of Mecklenbourg, her successors. She by the same will appointed the duke of Courland regent of the empire, and even guardian of the young czar, though his own parents were alive. The regent, however, was soon turned out, and the czar's mother succeeded him in that trust till her son was finally deposed, and the princess Elizabeth placed on the throne of the Russias.

His majesty being returned from his German dominions, assembled the parliament on the 18th of November, and opened the session by a speech, in which he observed, among other things, "That the court of Spain having already felt some effects of the resentment of the English, began to be sensible that they should be no longer able, by their own strength, to defend themselves against the efforts of the British nation: that if any other powers, agreeably to some late extraordinary proceedings, should interpose, and attempt to prescribe or limit the operations of the war against his declared enemies, the honour and interest of his crown and kingdoms must call upon his parliament to lose no time in putting the nation in such a condition as might enable him to repel any insults, and frustrate any designs formed against him, in violation of the faith of treaties; and he hoped any such unprecedented steps, under what colour or pretence soever they might be taken, would inspire his allies with a true sense of the common danger, and would unite them in the support and defence of the common cause: that the great and unhappy event of the death of the late emperor opened a new scene in the state of affairs of Europe, in which all the principal powers might be immediately or remotely concerned: that it was impossible to determine, with any degree of certainty, what course the policy, interest, or ambition of the several courts might lead them to pursue in this critical conjuncture; it should be his care strictly to observe and watch their motions; to adhere to the engagements which he had formerly contracted for maintaining the balance of power, and the liberties of Europe; and, in concert with such powers as were under the same obligations, to act such a part as might best contribute to avert the danger that threatened the tranquillity of Europe."

When the peers returned to their house, the duke of Argyll made a motion for an address "to congratulate his majesty on his safe return to his regal dominions; to assure his majesty that this house will stand by him with their lives and fortunes in prosecution of the just and necessary war in which he was engaged: and as a farther proof of their duty and affection to his majesty's person, family, and government, to declare to him that they would exert themselves in their high capacity of

of hereditary great council of the crown, to which all other councils were subordinate and accountable, in such a manner as might tend to promote the true interest of his majesty and his kingdoms in this critical conjuncture."

His grace supported this motion by a speech replete with all the nervous eloquence for which he was justly distinguished. He arraigned in very severe terms the conduct of the ministry, in relation to the naval operations of this year, particularly the fruitless parade of the Spithead fleet under sir John Norris. He spared not to accuse the ministry, obliquely, of having given orders that no attempts should be made upon the Spanish coasts in Europe; and alleged, that the West India fleet would not have sailed yet, had it not been for his majesty's return from abroad. Even the royal speech (which he treated as the work of the minister's pen) did not escape his censure, for not naming the power that might presume to attempt limiting the operations of the war; and he concluded with declaring, that the motion now before the house had been drawn up entirely by himself, without the knowledge or privity of any other person.

In opposition to this proposal the earl of Holderness moved for a more explicit address, viz. to acknowledge his majesty's great wisdom, and his regard to the true interests of his kingdom, in resolving to carry on this just and necessary war in the most vigorous and effectual manner, and in not suffering himself to be diverted from those prudent and salutary measures; to assure his majesty, that if any power should attempt to prescribe or limit the operations of the war, such a step would not fail to inspire his parliament with a just indignation, and determine them to concur in all proper means for vindicating and defending his honour and dignity against any who should presume to offer him such an insult; to declare to his majesty, that this house will stand by and support him in fulfilling the engagements he had contracted for maintaining the balance and liberties of Europe, on the event of the late emperor's death, as well as in the prosecution of the present war; and, finally, to express their unshaken and unalterable fidelity and affection to his majesty's person and government, and their ardent wishes that all his enterprizes, for maintaining the honour of his crown, and the rights of his people, might be blessed with success.

I have exhibited these two motions at full length, because they contain the sentiments of the two great parties which then prevailed in parliament. The reader, from what has gone before, can easily figure to himself the facts and arguments adduced in the debates which followed upon these two motions, and which were managed on the court side by the lord-chancellor Hardwick, the lord Cholmondeley, and the lord Harvey; on that of the opposition, by the duke of Argyll, the lord Carteret, the earl of Chesterfield, and the lord Talbot (son to the deceased nobleman of that name); I shall therefore only observe, that on the question being put, the court motion was carried by a majority of twenty-eight voices.

The debates in the lower house upon the question of their address turned upon their declaring, that they would make a due examination into the application of the supplies given the last session of parliament. But as this insinuated some diffidence of the ministry, it was over-voted, and an address presented, recapitulatory of the several paragraphs in the king's speech, with expressions of approbation, and of general concurrence with the measures of the ministry.

The like fate attended a motion made on the first of December in the upper house for an address to his majesty, humbly desiring he would give directions to the proper officers to lay before the house copies of the several orders and instructions sent to admiral Vernon, from the time of his sailing from England in 1739, to the twenty-fourth day of June in the current year.

The anti-courtiers, not discouraged by this defeat, proposed another address to his majesty, humbly entreating he would be pleased to give orders to lay before the house copies of all the letters written by vice-admiral Vernon to the commissioners of the admiralty, or to his majesty's secretaries of state, from the time of his leaving England to the twenty-fourth of June last inclusive; as also all the letters written by the said commissioners or the secretaries of state to the said admiral within the time above-mentioned. The minister, by a strange inattention to his own interests, suffered this motion to pass with some few amendments. The address was accordingly presented, and the papers laid before the house; the consequence of which proved very fatal to his authority; for the admiral in some of his letters complained bitterly of the stores which had been sent him; and in one particular passage he affirmed that they were not good enough even for a Spithead expedition.

This and other information, derived from the perusal of these papers, furnished the opposition with matter for another motion for an address to his majesty, to lay before the house the representations which admiral Vernon had made to the ministry or admiralty, touching the want of more ships or more men, &c. This motion was, however, rejected by a majority of seventy-one against forty-four; as was also another motion made by the duke of Argyll (in consequence of the house taking into its consideration the state of the army) for a resolution, "That the augmenting the army by raising regiments, as it is the most unnecessary and most expensive method of augmentation, is also the most dangerous to the liberties of the nation." This proposal, I say, was also over-ruled, but not without a nervous spirited protest being entered against it by the country lords.

The reader will easily perceive that the upper house was the great scene of political altercation during this session. The duke of Argyll, the lord Carteret, the lord Bathurst, the earl of Chesterfield, and lord Talbot, seemed to be animated with uncommon fervor; and several of their speeches would not have disgraced the most celebrated orators of the Roman senate, when that republic was in its most flourishing state. In these debates the young earls of Halifax and Sandwich acquired a considerable share of reputation, for the strength of argument and elocution they displayed against the measures of the ministry. The controversy was very unequally maintained on the side of the government; and their peremptory overruling every motion that was made against them, served only farther to increase the unpopularity of the the minister, which now rose to such an height, that his name was scarce ever mentioned with common decency but by his own friends.

The minority thought this the most favourable juncture they could obtain to put in execution a design which they had long framed, of a personal attack on the minister; and after some consultation between the leading members of both houses of the country party, it was determined to begin this attack in the lower house. Accordingly, on the eleventh of February, Mr. Sandys went up to sir Robert Walpole, and informed him, that in two days time he should bring a charge against him in public. Sir Robert was no stranger to the intended motion, nor to the day on which it was proposed to be made: he therefore, with an appearance of great composure, thanked Mr. Sandys politely for this previous notice: he said, he desired no favour but fair play; adding, "As I am not conscious of any crime, I do not doubt of being able to make a proper defence."

On Friday the thirteenth of February, the day appointed for the accusation of the minister, Mr. Sandys, in a studied speech, entered into a long deduction of the minister's conduct, which he carried back as far as the year 1720, from whence he was supposed to date his present power. He insisted, that it was well known both within doors and without, that one single person in the administration was the chief, if not the sole, adviser and promoter of all the wrong measures which had been for many years pursued at home and abroad: "Therefore, added he, the discontents, the reproaches, and even the curses of the people, are all directed against that single person: they complain of present measures; they have suffered by past measures: they expect no redress; they expect no alteration nor amendment, whilst he has a share in directing or advising our future administration. These, sir (addressing himself to the speaker) are the sentiments of the people, in regard to that minister: those sentiments we are in honour and duty bound to represent to his majesty; and the proper method of doing this, as established by our constitution, is to address his majesty to remove him from his councils: I therefore move that an humble address be presented to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to remove the right honourable sir Robert Walpole, knight of the most noble order of the garter, first commissioner of the Treasury, comptroller and under-treasurer of the Exchequer, and one of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, from his majesty's presence and councils for ever."

This motion was seconded by the lord-viscount Limerick, sustained by Mr. Pulteney, sir John Hynde Cotton, sir John Barnard, Mr. W. Pitt, Mr. Gibson, and other distinguished speakers in the opposition, who with great energy and accuracy pointed out and exposed all the material errors and malpractices of the administration. They charged the minister with having endeavoured to support his own interest by the most pernicious and barefaced acts of corruption; with having betrayed the interest and power of Great Britain in the late convention. It was likewise alleged, that he had deviated from the plan of policy which he himself, in his impeachment of the earl of Oxford, had laboured to establish: and in confirmation of their opinion, the treaty of Hanover was urged; a treaty, it was said, which was plainly calculated to aggrandize the house of Bourbon, and depress that of Austria. They farther affirmed, that all the great expences which the nation had incurred, by augmenting the army, and paying subsidies to foreigners, were owing to that treaty; and that his majesty had been led into this dangerous mistake by the ignorance or perfidy of the minister, who had made him believe that the emperor had, in conjunction with Spain, formed a design to place the pretender upon the throne of Great Britain; a charge for which, from the subsequent events, there never appeared to have been the least foundation.

All these arguments were answered by Mr. Pelham, who undertook to defend or excuse all the measures which the others had condemned. In doing this he observed, that the treaty of Utrecht was very imperfect; that the quadruple alliance was therefore formed, in order to supply the deficiencies of that treaty, by strengthening the emperor in Italy, and transferring to him the kingdom of Sicily from the duke of Savoy, and at the same time giving an irretrievable blow to the marine of Spain, by the sea engagement of sir George Byng in 1718: that the king of Spain was forced by Great Britain to accede to the quadruple alliance, which brought on the congress of Cambray: during the dependence of which, the emperor and the king of Spain concluded the treaty of Vienna, a treaty that was extremely prejudicial to the interests of Great Britain, and to which the treaty of Hanover was no more than a counterbalance: that as to the charge of an intention to set the pretender on the throne of England, it was a thing of which his majesty was fully convinced; and as it was a matter known personally to himself, and had never been disproved, he had a right to make use of it in his speech to the parliament. In a word, this gentleman in his harangue omitted nothing that could be expected from a warm friend and unshaken adherent.

Sir Robert Walpole observed an attentive silence during the course of the debate: at length, finding the whole artillery of opposition and defence nearly exhausted, he arose to speak in his own defence, which he did in a most masterly manner, delivering himself with the utmost coolness, deliberation, and decency, which was the more extolled, as it is certain his opponents had indulged themselves in the most gross and virulent personal invectives against his person and conduct. He began by recapitulating all the particulars of the general charge that had been brought against him, and endeavoured to elude their force. He sought not to conceal, on the contrary he frankly owned, that he was to be considered as the sole minister, and in such character answerable for any step taken by the government that was either disgraceful or disadvantageous to the nation. With respect to the article of bribery and corruption, he said, if one instance had been adduced, if it had been shewn that he ever offered a reward to any member of either house, or ever threatened to deprive any member of his office or employment, in order to influence such person in his vote as a member, there might have been some ground for this charge; but when it was so generally laid, he did not know what he could say to it, unless to deny it as generally rally and as positively as it had been asserted. Such a declaration, however, made in the hearing of so many persons who owed their seats in that assembly purely to the force of his interest, who many of them subsisted only by the provisions he had obtained for them, in consideration of their constant attendance in parliament, and readiness on every occasion to throw their negative or assent into the ministerial balance; must surely have impressed every hearer, must impress every reader to whom it is related, with a very indifferent opinion of the modesty or veracity of this great man in a public capacity. The conclusion of his speech, however, shews such an intimate knowledge of mankind, and the first part of it is so highly picturesque of some events and changes, within the memory of every one who peruses these sheets, that I cannot resist the temptation of transcribing it verbatim:

“Gentlemen (said he) have talked a great deal of patriotism: a venerable word, sir, when rightly understood. But I am sorry to say, that it has of late been so much hackneyed about, that it is in danger of falling into disgrace: the very idea of true patriotism is lost, and the term has been prostituted to the very worst purposes. A patriot, sir! why patriots spring up like mushrooms; I could raise fifty of them within the four-and-twenty-hours. I have raised many of them, sir, in one night. It is but refusing to gratify an unreasonable or an insolent demand, and up starts a patriot. I have never been afraid of making patriots, sir; but I disdain and despise all they can do.—No man, I believe, who ever had the honour of serving the crown, ever had such an attack made upon him as the present motion; a motion which gentlemen have been so long meditating, so long threatening, and which they had so much desire to support: but, sir, has it been supported? has it been attempted to be supported with even the shadow of evidence?—Yes, sir, I have long heard of this motion, and let gentlemen contradict me if they can, when I say, I could have prevented it; by what means, I leave the house to judge. But I chose, sir, they should do their utmost; and I rejoice in this debate, let the issue of it be what it will, more than I ever did in any one thing that has happened to me in the course of my life.”

The debate continued till three o'clock in the morning, when above sixty of the country party being retired (who thereupon acquired the nickname of sneakers from their colleagues) the question was put, and received a negative from a majority of two hundred and ninety against one hundred and six.

The same motion was made in the upper house by lord Carteret, who ushered it in by a speech embellished with all the ornaments of rhetoric, and warmed with the noble spirit of British liberty and independence. The dukes of Argyll and Bedford, the earls of Westmoreland, Berkshire, Carlisle, Abingdon, and Halifax, the lords Bathurst and Haversham, supported the motion, while the minister was as warmly defended by the lord-chancellor, the dukes of Newcastle and Devonshire, the bishop of Salisbury, the earl of Ilay, brother to the duke of Argyll, the lord Hervey, and the earl of Oxford.

This last nobleman was one of the Tory party, and had always distinguished himself by his opposition to the minister. Nevertheless, upon this occasión, he spoke against the motion, not (as he declared) from any conviction which he had of the minister's innocence, but because he thought the principle upon which the motion was built, especially no legal evidence having been brought to support it, was cruel, unjust, and unconstitutional; and he was old enough, he added, to remember the hard measure which a minister of his own family, chiefly through the influence of the present minister, had received from general and unsupported charges. The whole house was charmed with this generous declaration. At length, the subject being entirely exhausted, the question was put, and the motion rejected by a majority of forty-nine.

The triumph of the minister, however, was dearly bought; it shook his character beyond a possibility of reparation, and his authority from this instant gave daily proofs of a decline. Immediately after carrying the question, the duke of Marlborough moved for a resolution, “That any attempt to inflict any kind of punishment on any person, without allowing him an opportunity to make his defence, or without any proof being brought of any crime or misdemeanor committed by him, is contrary to natural justice, the fundamental laws of the realm, and the ancient established usage of parliament, and is an high infringement of the liberties of the subject.” This motion was seconded by the duke of Devonshire and the lord Lovel, and opposed by lord Gower, as an intended censure on the proceedings of the day; but notwithstanding his utmost efforts, and those of the rest of the friends of the minority, it was carried in the affirmative: thirty peers, however, entered a vigorous protest.

In the beginning of April the king went to the house of peers; and after passing certain acts that were prepared for the royal assent, he, in a speech to both houses, observed, “That the war which had lately broke out, and been carried on in part of the Austrian dominions, and the various and extensive claims which were publicly made on the late emperor's succession, were new events that required the utmost care and attention; the rather, as they might involve all Europe in a bloody war, and, in consequence, expose the dominions of such princes as should take part in support of the pragmatic sanction, to imminent and immediate danger: that the queen of Hungary had already made a requisition of the twelve thousand men expressly stipulated by treaty; and, in order to fulfil his engagements, he had demanded of the king of Denmark and of the king of Sweden, as landgrave of Hesse Cassel, their respective bodies of troops, consisting of six thousand men each, that so they might be in readiness to march forthwith to the assistance of her Hungarian majesty: that he was concerting such farther measures as might obviate and disappoint all the dangerous designs and attempts that might be formed or carried on in favour of any unjust pretensions to the prejudice of the house of Austria, in this complicated and uncertain state of things: that during the time when, by reason of the approaching conclusion of the present parliament, it might be impossible for him to have their advice and assistance, many incidents might arise which might render it necessary for him to incur still greater expences for maintaining the pragmatic sanction: and that therefore, in a conjuncture junction so critical, he had thought it proper to lay these important considerations before them, and to desire the concurrence of his parliament, in enabling him to contribute, in the most effectual manner, to the support of the queen of Hungary, the preventing, by all reasonable means, the subversion of the house of Austria, and the maintaining, upon a firm foundation, the liberties and balance of Europe."

The two houses joined in an affectionate address, promising effectually to support his majesty against all insults and attacks that might be made upon any of his territories, tho' not belonging to the crown of Great Britain; and that they would enable him to contribute in the most effectual manner to the support of the queen of Hungary. The commons accordingly granted three hundred thousand pounds for this purpose; a million was deducted from the sinking fund towards the expence of the year; and the land-tax continued at four shillings in the pound, to which it had been raised the preceding year. The preparations for this war had already cost five millions. On the twenty-fifth day of April the king closed the session, the last of this parliament, with warm expressions of tenderness and satisfaction in its conduct. Henry Bromley, Stephen Fox, and John Howe, three commoners of great property, who had signalized themselves in defence of the minister, were now ennobled and created barons, of Montfort, Ilchester, and Chedworth. A camp was formed near Colchester; and the king having settled the regency, set out in May for his German dominions.

Before I proceed to the military and other transactions of the year 1741, I must take notice, that about the end of the preceding year (1740) the anti-ministerial party sustained a great loss by the death of sir W. Wyndham, who was justly regretted as an orator, a patriot, and a man, the strenuous and unvarying assertor of the liberties of his country, and one of the chief ornaments of the British nation.

In the course of the same year general Oglethorpe, governor of Georgia, had, with some succours obtained from the colony of Carolina, and a small squadron of the king's ships, made an attempt upon Fort Augustine, the capital of Spanish Florida, and actually reduced some small forts in the neighbourhood of that place; but the Carolinians withdrawing in disgust, dissensions prevailing among the sea-officers, the hurricane months approaching, and the enemy having received a reinforcement, he abandoned the enterprize, and returned to Georgia.

It is now time to attend the motions of the grand fleet that left England under sir Chaloner Ogle, and the progress of the war in 1741. This noble armament was overtaken by a violent storm in the Bay of Biscay, not long after its departure from the British coasts, by which the fleet, consisting of about one hundred and seventy sail, were scattered and dispersed. Notwithstanding this misfortune, sir Chaloner prosecuted his voyage, and anchored in the neighbourhood of Dominica, with a view of providing himself with wood and water in that neutral island, where the intended expedition received a fatal check, by the death of the brave lord Cathcart, who was carried off by a dysentery. By his death the command of the land forces devolved upon general Wentworth.

Sir Chaloner having furnished his fleet with the supplies they stood in need of, sailed from Dominica, in order to join admiral Vernon at Jamaica. As he was coasting by the island of Hispaniola, he descried four large ships; upon which he immediately dispatched lord Augustus Fitzroy with an equal number of his squadron to speak to them. Lord Augustus came up with and hailed them; they refused to answer; (they could not shew their colours, it being night): upon which his lordship spoke to them more plainly, from the mouths of his guns; and a smart engagement ensued, which lasted most part of the night. Upon the appearance of day, the four strange ships hoisted French colours, and were found to be part of the French squadron that had sailed from Europe under the marquis d'Antin, to support the Spanish admiral Torres, in case he should be attacked by the English. As war, however, was not as yet declared between our court and that of France, the two commanders made mutual apologies for the mistake that had happened, and parted as friends, though not without having a considerable number of men killed and wounded on each side. In the mean time, sir Chaloner Ogle continuing his route, arrived on the twenty-seventh of December at St. Christopher's, the place of general rendezvous, where he was joined by the rest of the fleet, and all the transports and store-ships which had been separated from him. The fleet then proceeded for Jamaica, where it arrived on the ninth of January 1741.

This reanimated admiral Vernon with fresh spirits, who now found himself at the head of the most formidable fleet and army that had ever been seen in those seas, with full power to act as opportunity should offer. The conjoined squadrons consisted of twenty-nine ships of the line, with almost an equal number of frigates, fire-ships, and bomb-ketches, well manned, and plentifully supplied with all kinds of provisions and warlike stores and necessaries. The number of seamen amounted to fifteen thousand; that of the land forces, including four regiments of American troops, and a body of negroes enlisted at Jamaica, fell very little short of twelve thousand. The joy of the admiral was indeed greatly allayed by the news of lord Cathcart's death, whose loss he heartily condoled as a most valuable officer; yet as his successor, general Wentworth, appeared sincerely disposed to supply that loss, Mr. Vernon promised himself that the service would be resolutely carried on, and with all possible harmony between the land and sea forces. The event, however, proved the reverse.

Admiral Vernon having received intelligence, from a Spanish lieutenant who had been taken prisoner in a small sloop, that the Brest and Toulon squadrons, under the command of the marquis d'Antin, were arrived at Port Louis, and that the French preparations in Martinico seemed to threaten some formidable enterprize against Jamaica, his whole attention had for some time been taken up in concerting such measures as might best prevent the designs of the enemy, and secure that valuable island. By later advices he had been informed, that the French fleet had sailed to Hispaniola. All which intelligence he laid before a general council of war, held at Spanish-town in Jamaica, on the eleventh of January, when it was unanimously resolved, that the whole fleet should beat beat up to windward, to observe the motions of d'Antin. It happened, however, that on the arrival of our fleet off that island, we found that the French admiral had sailed for Europe to recruit himself with men and provisions, having, during his stay in those parts, lost upwards of three thousand men, and the rest that survived were reduced to three ounces of bread a day, and that half worms and dirt.

Vernon, disappointed in this quarter, called another grand council of war on the sixteenth of February, in which it was determined to proceed directly for Carthagena; which resolution was afterwards confirmed by a third general council of war, held the twenty-fourth by the four principal military and naval officers, when it was resolved vigorously to attack Carthagena both by sea and land. The fleet being supplied with wood and water at Hispaniola, set sail for the continent of New Spain, and on the fourth of March, in the evening, anchored at Playa Grande, to the windward of the town of Carthagena. As it was well known that the Spaniards had omitted nothing to put it in a proper posture of defence. Admiral de Torres, and Don Blas de Lezo, a sea-officer of great experience and reputation, had already arrived with the Ferrol squadron, and reinforced the garrison, which now amounted to upwards of four thousand men. The following particulars relating to this place will enable the reader to form a judgment of the nature of the enterprize against it.

CARTHAGENA is the capital of a province of the same name, on the Terra Firma, in South America, in ten degrees and a half north latitude, and seventy-seven west longitude; three hundred and ten miles east of Porto Bello, and four hundred south of Port Royal in Jamaica. Though the sea washes the walls of Carthagena, the town is inaccessible on that side, by reason of the surf, the water shoaling near a league off, so that it can only be approached by the lake that forms the harbour; which last is bounded by a number of rocks: besides, the sea is seldom smooth; so that landing is at all times very difficult. The only entrance to the harbour is near a league to the westward of the city, between two narrow peninsulas, one called the Tierra Bomba, which is nearest the city; the other, called the Barradera. This passage, called Bocca Chica, or the little mouth, was defended on the Tierra Bomba by the castle St. Louis, a regular square fortification with four bastions, mounted with eighty-two guns and three mortars; but the glacis or counterscarp had not been finished. To this were added fort St. Philip, mounting seven guns; fort St. Iago, with fifteen guns; and a small fort of only four guns, called the Battery de Chamba, which served as redoubts to the castle of Bocca Chica. On the other side of the mouth of the harbour was a fascine battery of fifteen guns, called the Barradera; and in a small bay on the back of that, another battery of four guns; and facing the entrance of the harbour, on a small flat island, stood fort St. Joseph, of twenty-one guns. From this fort to Bocca Chica castle a boom of cables were fixed across, fastened by three large anchors at each end; and just within the boom four men of war were moored in a line, on board of which was the Spanish admiral. These spread so far over the extent of the mouth of the harbour, that no ship could pass a-head or a-stern of them.

Beyond this passage lies the great lake or harbour of Carthagena, several leagues in circumference, and land-locked on all sides. About midway to the town it grows narrower, and within about a league of the town, two points of land jutting out form the lesser harbour. Near the nethermost of these was the strong fortress of Castillo Grande, about eight miles up the town, being a regular square with four bastions, defended to the land by a wet ditch and proper glacis, and one face towards the sea, with a raveline and double line of guns: the number of guns in the fort was fifty-nine. Opposite to this castle was a horse-shoe battery of twelve guns, called Mancinilla. In the middle, between the two forts, is a large shoal, with not above two or three feet water. In each of these were ships sunk, to prevent the British fleet from getting by.

Near three miles further up the harbour, on two flat sandy islands or keys, stands Carthagena, well fortified to the land, with lakes and morasses running round it, and defended with one hundred and sixty guns, and the suburbs, called Himani, with one hundred and forty. South of the city, about a mile from Himani-gate, on an eminence about fifty or sixty feet high, stands the castle of St. Lazaro, being a square of about fifty feet, with three demi-batteries, and two guns in each face, one in each flank, and three in each curtain: it overlooks all the town.

The admiral having received from captain Knowles (whom he had sent to reconnoitre the place) the above intelligence, with every other material point relative to its situation and strength, directed sir Chaloner Ogle to proceed with his whole division of ships, consisting of four of eighty, five of sixty, and one of fifty guns, besides frigates and bomb-vessels, to demolish the forts and batteries, and to scour all the country between them, so as to secure a descent for the forces. In the mean time general Wentworth, with some of the principal land officers, went on board the Lion, to reconnoitre the town, the neighbouring coast, and the several forts.

On the ninth of February the English forces were landed on Tierra Bomba island, near the mouth of Bocca Chica harbour. There they erected a battery, with which they made a breach in the principal fort; while the ships under sir Chaloner Ogle, assisted by those of commodore Lestock's division, divided the fire of the enemy, and co-operated with the endeavours of the army. The breach in Bocca Chica castle being now deemed practicable, general Wentworth resolved to assault it, which was accordingly done. On the twenty-fourth the forts and batteries were abandoned by the enemy: the Spanish ships that lay athwart the harbour's mouth were taken or destroyed: the passage was opened; and admiral Vernon, with the whole fleet, got into the harbour, and then lay before Castillo Grande, which the enemy likewise abandoned, and which was taken possession of by captain Knowles, who acted as the admiral's engineer during the whole of this expedition. The forces and artillery that had been landed on Tierra Bomba were now reembarked, and sailing up the great lake, were set on shore again within a mile of the city.

Thus far every thing had gone on more prosperously than either the admiral or general had apprehended. They were too much elated, however, with this good fortune; for they now dispatched captain Laws, commander of the Spence sloop of war, with letters to the duke of Newcastle, secretary of state, promising no less than the absolute reduction of Carthagena: but they were fatally mistaken; for fort Lazaro remained yet to be taken before they could attack the main body of the place. Besides, by this time a misunderstanding had arisen between the admiral and general, which soon grew to such a height as to impede every operation for the advantage of the public: they maintained a reserve towards each other: they had their separate parties; and nothing was heard but mutual recriminations. The admiral upbraided the general for his inactivity, in giving the enemy time for completing the fortifications they had begun at the foot of the hill on which the fort stood. The general, on the other hand, accused the admiral of dilatoriness in landing the tents, stores, and artillery of the army, which had obliged the troops to lie three whole nights exposed to the noxious dews, so fatal in that climate, which greatly reduced their numbers.

The truth is, that great oversights were committed on both sides; and indeed each seemed more bent upon mortifying his rival than zealous for the honour and interest of the nation. Wentworth, however, resolving to do something, at least in appearance, prepared on the eighth of March to attack fort St. Lazaro; but instead of beginning the attack in the night, as he ought to have done, he waited till it was almost broad day. The guides who were to conduct the troops were also killed in the march; the troops mistook their way, and advanced to the strongest part of the fortification, which they could not have mounted, even though they had not had any enemy to oppose them. The bravery of the English on this occasion was such as almost to exceed belief: twelve hundred men, under general Guise, paraded on the strand, where they formed, and began the attack with amazing intrepidity, amidst an incessant shower of balls and bullets from the artillery and small arms of the Spaniards. Colonel Grant, who commanded the grenadiers, was mortally wounded: the scaling ladders were found too short; the officers were perplexed for want of order and directions. Nevertheless, the soldiers maintained their ground for several hours with the most heroic resolution, till at length they were drawn off by the general's orders, with the loss of about six hundred of the flower of the army; that is, above half the number of those who marched to this ill-timed, ill-conducted attack. On this occasion the admiral inveighed in the severest terms against the general, for not acquainting him with his design, that he might have sent a body of seamen to assist in scaling the walls. Wentworth on his side insisted, that, if the admiral had sent ships near enough to have battered the walls of the castle and town, when the forces advanced to the attack of fort St. Lazaro, the place might have been taken.

Vernon, in order to disculpate himself of this charge, and to throw the whole blame of the miscarriage on the general and other land forces, sent in the Galicia, one of the Spanish ships which he had taken at Bocca Chica, fitted up as a floating battery, with sixteen guns on a side, to batter the town. This vessel, manned by detachments of volunteers from different ships, and commanded by captain Hore, was warped into the inner harbour, and moored before day as near the walls of the town as possible. In this situation she kept up a regular fire, exposed to the artillery from three bastions, a half-moon, and a ravelin, from five in the morning till near twelve at noon, without ever flagging; but as the vice-admiral saw she could do no material service against stone walls at that distance, he sent orders to captain Hore to bring her off, to prevent her sinking at her anchors. From this experiment the admiral drew this inference, that there was not depth of water in the inner harbour sufficient to admit large ships near enough to batter the tower with any prospect of success, as the Galicia had been moored in as shoal water as the boats could float her anchors.

After the miscarriage of this attack, all hopes of possessing the town were entirely vanished: the troops sickened so surprizingly fast, that, according to the account of the general himself, no less than three thousand four hundred and forty-five men perished in the space of two days, amongst whom were many of the principal officers. This dreadful visitation determined the council of war to come to a resolution to return to Jamaica with the utmost expedition. Accordingly, after having entirely demolished all the fortifications, the fleet set sail in the beginning of May, and arrived in Port-Royal harbour on the nineteenth of the same month, after a quick and safe passage.

Thus ended, to the astonishment of all Europe, the disgrace of the British arms, and the no small exultation of the enemy, the greatest attempt that had ever been made in those parts of the world, whether we consider the strength of the armament, the expence of the undertaking, or the expectations of the public. Upon the news of the first successes arriving in England, the people were seized with a phrenzy of joy: it was in the midst of the general elections for the approaching new parliament. Not only London and Westminster, but many other places, vied with each other in having Mr. Vernon for their representative. His birth-day was celebrated with demonstrations of joy, like those which greet a monarch returning in triumph to his capital, after conquering an enemy that threatened his state with destruction. All Europe indeed considered itself as deeply interested in the issue of this expedition. Spain gave up her monarchy in America for lost; the French were filled with the most dreadful apprehensions, and gave their ambassador at the Hague orders to represent the progress of the English in America as the common cause of all Europe, which must be ruined, should they succeed. But I shall now proceed to close this account of the naval war in America during the year 1741, with the equally inglorious and fruitless expedition against Cuba.

On the return of the British fleet and forces to Jamaica from the siege of Carthagena, the remains of the army continued in a feeble and languid condition. The ships which came out with sir Chaloner Ogle were now generally feeble; all which afforded a melancholy scene to the survivors of the late fatal expedition. On this occasion Mr. Vernon, to his great honour, acted as the father of the fleet; and it was chiefly owing to the care he had of the seamen's provisions, and of keeping them temperate, that it was not absolutely ruined. Seven of the eight eighty-gun ships being unsheathed, they would have been totally destroyed by remaining any longer on service in these climates; upon which the admiral very prudently sent them home, under commodore Lestock, with four other ships of war and several frigates, with all the sick land officers, and all the soldiers who had been rendered unfit for service, and the homeward-bound fleet of merchantmen.

Mr. Vernon having taken all the necessary steps towards refitting the remainder of his fleet, and putting it in a proper condition for returning to sea, in order, if possible, to re-establish by some more successful stroke, the degraded reputation of the British arms, called a general council of war for regulating the future proceedings of the sea and land forces. To this court he produced letters he had received from the administration at home, pressing him to attempt the reduction of St. Jago, the capital of the island of Cuba. His majesty, in his instructions to the admiral on his leaving England, had indeed mentioned the Havannah, La Vera Cruz, Mexico, Carthagena, and Panama; but by the miscarriage before Carthagena, the English were too much reduced to attempt any other place: besides, de Torres, the Spanish admiral, was then in the harbour of the Havannah, with a squadron more than equal to that which remained with Vernon. St. Jago de Cuba therefore was the only object our forces could proceed against; and the taking it would secure Jamaica and the British trade in those seas, and preserve a communication with Jamaica for supplies, and likewise cut off the correspondence between the Spaniards and Hispaniola. All these considerations determined the council of war to declare for this attempt; and the vice-admiral and general Wentworth accordingly gave the necessary orders for proceeding on the expedition with all possible dispatch. The people of Jamaica, who were particularly desirous of this conquest, considering the great diminution of the land forces, which were by this time reduced to less than three thousand men, put one thousand of the best disciplined blacks their island afforded on board the fleet, which set sail, to the number of nine ships of the line, besides transports and store-ships, on the twenty-eighth of June; and on the eighteenth of the following month got into Walthenham Bay, about twelve leagues to windward of St. Jago. Here they had the pleasure to find themselves in one of the most spacious and safe harbours in the world, perfectly pure and healthy, and secure against all hurricanes; the admiral immediately gave it the name of Cumberland Harbour, in honour of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland.

The island of Cuba is the largest, and far the most temperate and pleasant of all the Antilles, lying between nineteen and twenty-three degrees of north latitude, and from two hundred and ninety-three to three hundred and four degrees of longitude, being about two hundred and thirty leagues in length, and in the broadest part forty leagues wide, in the narrowest about twelve. It has Florida and the Lucayan isles on the north, Hispaniola on the west, Jamaica and the southern continent on the south, and the gulph of Mexico on the east. It is a country abounding not only with the necessary conveniencies of life, but even with the more delicate blessings of nature. St. Jago de Cuba, lying at the eastern part of the country, is the most ancient in the island, and generally esteemed the capital, though now the governor resides at the Havannah, whose port is much superior to that of St. Jago in its situation for trade, though the former is much more commodious for privateers, as it commands the windward passage. This city is but very indifferently fortified, the harbour being so well secured by nature, as to give the Spaniards no reason to apprehend any attack from the seaward, which is rendered impracticable by the narrowness of the harbour's mouth, and the singular difficulty of ships getting into it, occasioned by the obstruction of the eddy-wind that comes down the two hills, on which stand the citadel, called the Moro Castle, and the Estrella, another fort, and which would infallibly drive them on the western shore, exposed to the batteries of the two castles.

Mr. Vernon having collected all the necessary intelligence relating to the situation and strength of the town, port, and citadel of St. Jago, fixed on Cumberland harbour, as the nearest and most commodious situation to disembark the troops for their proceeding to march and attack the town on the land-side, where, as they did not expect to be surprised, the Spaniards were at present entirely defenceless. The troops were accordingly landed, and encamped at the distance of twenty miles farther up the river. Mr. Vernon appeared to entertain very sanguine hopes of the success of this expedition, not doubting but that he should be able to secure such a footing in the island of Cuba as to render it impossible for all the power of Spain to drive us out while we remained masters of the sea; and in the warmest manner recommended to the general alacrity and dispatch in his operations by land. Wentworth, however, who seemed to make a point of differing in opinion from the admiral, in relation to every object of service, affected to treat the whole design as chimerical and impracticable; and having sent out parties to reconnoitre the country, he on their report (though they met not with the least opposition) in a letter to the admiral, absolutely declined the service, on account of the length of the road, and the insurmountable difficulty (as he was pleased to represent it) of bringing up cannon sufficient to act against the place with effect. As the admiral had no compulsive power over the land forces, he was obliged to give way to the opinion of a council of war of the land officers, who, notwithstanding the admiral gave them positive assurances of a speedy reinforcement of ships and troops from England, declared for an immediate reembarkation for Jamaica, which was effected on the twentieth of November: and thus was this second expedition abandoned, even before it met with resistance, infinitely more to the disgrace of the land forces than their late fatal repulse before Carthagena, where they had indeed done the enemy some mischief, by destroying six Spanish men of war, the like number of galleons, and all the other shipping in the harbour, besides demolishing all the fortifications.

The affairs of Europe next call for our attention, which were now involved in greater confusion than ever. The king of Prussia had demanded of the court of Vienna part of Silesia, by virtue of old treaties of co-fraternity, which were either absolute or annulled, and promised to assist the queen of Hungary with all his forces in case she would comply with his demand, as also to settle the imperial crown on her husband. It was easily foreseen, that if the queen refused these offers, Germany must be thrown into a total confusion; but that princess entertained too high a sense of her dignity to consent to dismember her patrimony. She was weak, but intrepid. Perhaps she was the more encouraged to this refusal by the little account in which Europe then held the king of Prussia, and the certain assurances she had received of being powerfully supported by the British court. The active and discerning Prussian, however, readily perceived, that the outward grandeur of the court of Vienna was no more than a name, and the state in which Europe then was, would infallibly procure him allies. Accordingly, on the refusal of his offers, he marched his army into Silesia in the month of December of the preceding year, and prosecuted his conquests with great rapidity.

In the mean while, Maria-Theresa took possession of all the dominions which had been left her by her father, and was crowned at Presburg on the twenty-fourth of June, 1741, N. S. She had gained the hearts of the whole nation by that popular affability which her ancestors had disdained to practise; but more particularly by consenting to take the ancient coronation-oath of Andrew II. king of Hungary, made anno 1222, by which the sovereign promises to maintain inviolably the privileges of his subjects, on pain of being himself treated as a traitor. Her first care was to secure to her husband the grand duke a partnership of her crown, under the title of co-regent, to which the states of Austria readily consented. This princess flattered herself that these beginnings would have smoothed his way to the imperial throne; but she had no money, and her troops were greatly diminished, or dispersed in the different parts of her dominions; while Prussia, pushing his vast success, made his public entrance into Breslau, and confirmed all the privileges of the inhabitants. One of his generals surprised the town and fortress of Joblunka, on the confines of Hungary. Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Dessau, who commanded another army, which formed the blockade of Great Glogau on the Oder, took the town by scalade, made the generals Wallis and Reyftic prisoners, and got possession of the military chest, fifty pieces of brass cannon, and a great quantity of ammunition.

The queen of Hungary had appointed count Neuperg, one of the most experienced generals in Europe, to assume the command of her troops in Silesia, who after some time, and with no small difficulty, got together an army of about twenty-four thousand men, with which he flew to the relief of the invaded province; and the king of Prussia found himself under the necessity of coming to an engagement at Molwitz, near the river Neiss. This battle, which was fought on Monday the tenth of April, was very obstinate and bloody, the two armies being nearly equal in point of strength. The engagement lasted from two in the forenoon till half an hour past six in the evening. In the beginning the Austrians put the Prussian cavalry into great disorder, and at length entirely broke that body: they then fell in flank upon the first line of the infantry. The battle was thought to be lost, and the king of Prussia was in danger of being made prisoner; but his second line of infantry, by the noble stand they made, retrieved the fortune of the day; and in the end the Austrians were obliged to retire, which they did in good order, under the cannon of Neiss, leaving the field of battle to the Prussians. This victory, though by no means decisive, served greatly to raise the character of the Prussian troops, and the opinion of the military accomplishments of the young monarch. This battle was soon followed by the surrender of Neiss, which, though extremely well fortified, and fully provided for a vigorous defence, submitted after a few days siege.

In the mean time, the Austrian ministry entertained the most sanguine hopes from the resolutions of the British parliament, already related; as likewise from the arrival of the king of England in his German dominions. Nevertheless, they thought it necessary strongly to solicit the aid and assistance of the States-general, who, besides being bound by the most solemn engagements to support the pragmatic sanction, were under the strongest obligations to the house of Austria and to his Britannic majesty. The king of Prussia had, however, foreseen this application; and to counterbalance its effect had given the Dutch to understand, that if they intermeddled in the affair, he should instantly revive the old pretensions of his family on part of the estates of the principality of Orange. He likewise enforced this intimation by a body of six thousand men, which he placed on the Dutch frontiers. In this situation, the States thought it most prudent to confine themselves to the milder methods of intreaty and mediation; in which they were joined by his Britannic majesty, who ordered the earl of Hyndford, his ambassador at the court of Prussia, to concur with Ginckle, the Dutch minister, in presenting a remonstrance to the king of Prussia against continuing his troops any longer in the duchy of Silesia. To this memorial the count de Podewitz, by order of his Prussian majesty, returned an answer, in which he reduced his demands to the Lower Silesia, with the town of Breslau, being left to him either by mortgage or otherwise, in lieu of his pretensions to the several districts he had claimed as his right in that duchy; for which he would not only engage to assist the queen of Hungary with his whole force, for the preservation of the late emperor's succession, but also to give his vote and interest to the grand duke for procuring to him the imperial crown. At the same time, he persisted in his intention to maintain possession of the territories he had seized, which, he said, could not be considered as a violation of the pragmatic sanction.

The court of Vienna rejected all these proposals with disdain, adhering in their first resolution to enter into no accommodation, without the previous abandoning of Silesia by the Prussians, tho' at the same time they had the greatest reason to believe that France and Bavaria were soliciting the alliance of Prussia: and this refusal on the part of the queen of Hungary was, by most politicians at that that time, thought the more impolitic, as Spain and Bavaria had openly avowed their ill intentions against the house of Austria. This, joined to the timidity and irresolution of the Dutch, should certainly have prevailed on the court of Vienna to have relaxed a little in its obstinacy, and have secured so powerful a confederate from France and Bavaria. To this however it may be replied, in defence of her Hungarian majesty, that her honour and dignity had been wounded in the tenderest part by the hostile proceedings of Prussia; that she and her ministry had been rendered still more presumptuous by the proffered friendship of Great Britain; and by hearing that the English parliament had resolved not only to pay the Danes and Hessians, but likewise to supply them with half a million of money for her defence. Nay, the queen had been actually encouraged by our court and by the Dutch to insist upon it as a preliminary in any agreement to be made between her and the king of Prussia, that the troops of the latter should withdraw from Silesia; and even promised her hopes of their assistance, if he refused to comply.

By some means or other his Prussian majesty had come to the knowledge of this promise, as also of a scheme that had been formed by the Austrian ministry for a general confederacy against him, and a partition of his dominions; in which the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover, was allotted a considerable share: and as he had received no intimation of such a design from England, he immediately concluded that it had been approved by his Britannic majesty, and from that instant vowed an implacable enmity towards the house of Austria and the British nation: in consequence of which, he entered into close connections with the court of Versailles, the event of which will appear in the sequel.

France now beheld, with an eye of pleasure, the period that presented a favourable opportunity of humbling the house of Austria, and advancing a poor and powerless prince of her own nomination to the imperial throne. This prince was no other than Charles Albert, elector of Bavaria, who had, while yet in his infancy, been made prisoner by the Austrians after the battle of Hochstet, and stripped even of his title of Bavaria. France found her account in setting up this prince: she thought it would be no difficult matter to procure for him, at one and the same time, the empire, and a part of the Austrian succession; by which means the Lorraine branch of Austria would be deprived of that superiority which the old one affected to have over the other princes of Europe, and the old rivalry subsisting between the dependents of Bourbon and Austria would be abolished.

Flattering as these prospects seemed, the French ministry hesitated for some time; nay, they even continued to give the queen of Hungary the strongest assurances of the good intentions of his most Christian majesty. Cardinal de Fleury, the prime minister of France, was then in his eighty-fifth year, and was fearful of staking his reputation, his old age, and his country, on the hazard of a new war. He also thought himself restrained by the pragmatic sanction, to which he had acceded, and authentically guaranteed. Though Fleury was not distinguished either by the genius of Richelieu or the abilities of Mazarine, yet, while suffered to pursue his own plans, he was a more useful member than either to his country. On this occasion, however, he was forced to give way; for no sooner was it known at the court of Versailles that the house of Brandenburg had divided itself from that of Austria, than the whole French nation cried aloud for war. His most Christian majesty himself was brought over to the party of those who opposed the pacific schemes of the cardinal minister; and the latter, about the beginning of the year, was compelled to send instructions to the marshal count de Belleisle (afterwards duke) to prepare a plan for negotiating in Europe the means of carrying on a war, to fix the elector of Bavaria on the imperial throne, and secure to him part of the Austrian succession.

Belleisle readily obeyed orders so agreeable to his own views, and of which he himself indeed had been the principal promoter: he drew up his scheme, and never did the execution of any project appear more certain. It imported, that before the month of June 1741, fifty thousand French troops should pass the Rhine towards the Danube; that an army of forty thousand should be formed on the side of Westphalia, in order to overawe the electorate of Hanover, while Saxony (who seemed inclined to join the confederacy) Prussia, and Bavaria, were to have been seconded by the army on the Rhine, by advancing towards the Danube. The elector of Cologne also attached himself to this interest, being that of his brother the intended emperor. The old elector-palatine also joined to set Bavaria on the imperial throne, in whose favour every thing seemed united. He was to be assisted in seizing upon Austria, Suabia, and Bohemia; for the imperial dignity alone would have been hardly worth acceptance. This alliance was moreover to join Spain, in order to put Don Philip, son of Philip V. and nearly related to Lewis XV. in possession of Parma and the Milanese.

This scheme was so well relished by the warlike party in the French court, that they proposed its being carried into immediate execution; to which they were the more particularly encouraged, by hearing of the miscarriage of the English attempts against the Spanish settlements in the West Indies. The marshal count de Belleisle was dispatched to the court of Munich, where he had an interview with the elector of Bavaria at his palace of Nymphenburgh, and concluded a treaty there between the French king and the elector, whereby his most Christian majesty engaged "to get the elector acknowledged emperor, and to assist him, in case of opposition, with his whole force; and, in return, the elector stipulated, if he obtained the imperial dignity, that he would never attempt to recover any of the imperial towns or provinces conquered by France, unless the king should be inclined to restore them; and if so, the elector was to reimburse his majesty forty-five millions of livres for his expences in supporting the election. The elector also promised to renounce the barrier-treaty, and agreed, that whatever conquests France should make in the Netherlands, she should irrevocably keep."

The French having now received a large sum of money from Madrid, began to put their troops in motion; and his Christian majesty published a declaration towards the close of this summer, importing, "That the king of Great Britain having assembled assembled an army in Germany (meaning about twenty-six thousand men which, as elector of Hanover, he had on foot in those parts of his dominions) he, as guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia, was resolved, without prejudice to the pragmatic sanction, to send a body of forces to the Rhine, in order to secure the freedom of the approaching election of an emperor, and to be ready to assist those princes who might call upon him for the performance of his engagements."

Belleisle was now appointed to carry his own scheme into execution, under the double character of ambassador and general. He had an interview with his Prussian majesty in his camp at Franckfort. That monarch, from the motives we have already related, was ready to enter with the greatest cordiality into an alliance with France, and a treaty was concluded on the twenty-eighth of August, whereby it was agreed, "That the elector of Bavaria should be chosen emperor, and should be put in possession of Bohemia, the Upper Austria, and Tyrol: that the elector of Saxony, if he joined the confederacy, should enjoy the Upper Silesia and Moravia: and that the Lower Silesia, the town and territory of Neiss, and the town and country of Glatz, should remain to the king of Prussia." The marshal next repaired to the court of Dresden; and the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, being informed of the advantageous terms that were stipulated for him, ordered his troops to join the allies even before he had signed the treaty.

Immediately on the conclusion of this treaty, the elector of Bavaria commenced his military operations by assembling his forces, consisting of thirty thousand men, in a camp near Scharding, where they were soon after joined by an army of forty thousand French, under the command of the marshals Broglie and Belleisle, who had passed the Rhine and entered Bavaria. At the same time the elector received a patent from the most Christian king, appointing him his lieutenant-general, with full power and authority to command the French auxiliary army in Germany, wherever there should be occasion.

The elector thus strengthened, declared war against the queen of Hungary, by the title of grand dukes of Tuscany, and easily penetrated into Austria; while that hapless princess was scarcely able to oppose the king of Prussia. Bavaria soon made himself master of Passau, a strong city situated at the confluence of the Danube, Inn, and Ilts, belonging to cardinal Lemberg, bishop of that see. This city was the key from Bavaria into Upper Austria. He afterwards took possession of Lintz, the capital of the lower territory; and from thence sent a summons to count Khevenhuller, governor of Vienna, and spread consternation to the very gates of that metropolis.

Another body of French troops, to the number of thirty-five thousand men, commanded by marshal Maillebois, quitted their camp at Sedan, a town of Champagne in France, and marched so far into Westphalia as to appear on the frontiers of Hanover. The views of France in this manœuvre were to frighten the ministry of Hanover into a neutrality. The king of England was then in his electorate, and the whole of his forces composed a body of no more than twenty-six thousand men. These were too insufficient to oppose such a numerous army; and the king of Prussia having another considerable body of troops upon the other side of the Hanoverian dominions, so conveniently posted, that the greatest part of the electorate might have been destroyed by it in less than twenty-four hours, his Britannic majesty in these circumstances was obliged to think of neutral measures for Hanover; and a convention for the neutrality of that electorate was signed there upon the sixteenth of September.

The news of this surprising event struck the whole court of Vienna with unspeakable consternation, to find itself abandoned at this melancholy juncture. Not one of the princes, either within the empire or without, at this time, supported that pragmatic sanction which so many of them had guaranteed. Vienna, poorly fortified on that side where it was threatened, could not have held out long; or indeed the taking of it seemed rather a certainty. The Dutch beheld unmoved the army under Mallebois parade it in Westphalia: the king of Great Britain, at the very instant he was ready to march to the assistance of the distressed queen, at the head of an army he had assembled for that purpose, was obliged to lay down his arms to secure the safety of his own electorate, and to swell the number of her foes: the queen of Spain, another Semiramis in ambition, who governed entirely the Spanish court, had caused it to publish a memorial, alleging the pretensions of that crown to all the dominions possessed by the late emperor.

Thus the queen of Hungary, almost before she had been invested with the regal purple, found herself surrounded by a troop of foes, rapacious and eager to devour the four possessions bequeathed to her by her ancestors. In this distressful situation, however, this princess gave proofs of a magnanimity equal to that of the most renowned heroes of antiquity, without the least alloy of that weakness liable to her sex. She quitted Vienna, and threw herself into the arms of the Hungarians. Having assembled the four orders of the state at Presburg on the thirty-first of August, she appeared in the midst of them, holding in her arms her eldest son, who was yet a cradle infant; and addressing them in Latin, a language in which she expressed herself perfectly well, spoke nearly in these words: "The perplexed situation, said she, to which, by the permission of Divine Providence, I find myself reduced, is attended with such dangerous circumstances, that I have no hopes of extricating myself from it without speedy and powerful succours. Abandoned by my friends, persecuted by my enemies, attacked by my nearest relations, I have no other resource left but to stay in this kingdom, and commit my person, my children, my sceptre, my crown, to the care of my faithful subjects. I do not hesitate to intrust them with all: their loyalty and bravery leave me no room to doubt but they will exert all their strength, speedily and resolutely, to defend me and themselves in this melancholy conjuncture."

All the Palatines, at once softened and animated by this pathetic speech, drawing forth their sabres, exclaimed as one man, "Moriatur pro rege nostro Maria-Theresa! We will die for our king Maria-Theresa!" they always speaking of the sovereign in the masculine gender. Nor was this a sudden burst of affection only called forth by the present present view of majesty in distress; their real actions corresponded with their words. Before they rose they passed a decree against the elector of Bavaria, which they made perpetual, for excluding that prince and his family for ever from the crown of Hungary. The whole nobility instantly armed themselves and their followers. Old count Palfy, whom the queen used always to stile affectionately her father Palfy, marched to the relief of Vienna with thirty thousand men; Khevenhuller had raised a body of twelve thousand; Neuperg was in Bohemia at the head of about twenty thousand; the grand duke, and his brother prince Charles of Lorraine, who was the delight of the Austrian soldiery, commanded another large army; and prince Lobkowitz, count Berenklaui, count Traun, with many other officers of distinction, exerted themselves strenuously in defence of their beloved queen, than whom no sovereign was ever better served by her subjects, and no one ever better deserved it. Several fortunate circumstances also concurred about this time to save her majesty from the ruin which threatened to overwhelm her.

Cardinal de Fleury, still desirous of peace, tho' hurried against his inclinations into a war, was very slow in furnishing Belleisle with the necessary supplies for effecting his extensive scheme. In particular, he furnished him only with ten thousand cavalry, though the marshal had always declared that he could not answer for success without double the number; and his allies could not furnish him with the other necessaries he stood in need of, without too much distressing themselves. The elector of Bavaria also was guilty of a most imprudent and impolitic measure; for instead of advancing to the attack of Vienna (which every one expected) while the inhabitants were in the depth of consternation, and would in all probability have made little or no resistance, after leaving twelve thousand men under count Segur, to guard the banks of the river Inn, and preserve his communication with Bavaria, towards the middle of October he turned off towards Bohemia, and allowed the Austrians to recover from their panic, and prepare themselves for a vigorous defence of Vienna.

The active Khevenhuller, who was universally esteemed the bravest of the Austrian generals, failed not to improve this incident to the advantage of his royal mistress, and marched at the head of a powerful army into Bohemia, with a view of covering Prague, or bringing the fate of Germany to the issue of a battle. In this however he failed; for the elector of Saxony, who had by this time declared against the queen of Hungary, tho' indebted to her father for his crown of Poland, had joined his troops, under count Rutowski, to those of the Bavarian and French, who, on the tenth of November, advanced to Prague, the capital of Bohemia, without any resistance; and being then upwards of sixty thousand strong, and the garrison consisting only of three thousand men, they took the place by scalade, and made general Ogilvy, who commanded therein, prisoner, together with his whole garrison.

The grand duke and count Khevenhuller were already within five leagues of Prague when it was taken; but being unable to prevent its fate, and finding subsistence fail in the quarters which they occupied, he retired to the southern part of the province. There they divided their army into three bodies. The grand duke commanded one, prince Lobkowitz another, and Khevenhuller a third: the two first gained a great many advantages, which it would be tedious to enumerate; but the most important affair was conducted by Khevenhuller, who marched against M. Segur, whom the elector of Bavaria had left commander of the forces in Austria. Him Khevenhuller attacked and defeated; and encouraged by these successes, advanced to Lintz, the capital of Upper Austria, which he invested. The place was defended by a garrison of ten thousand Bavarians and French; but the count being joined by the army under the grand duke, carried on his attacks with such impetuosity, that the garrison was obliged to surrender, on condition of not serving for one whole year against her Hungarian majesty.

In the mean time, the elector of Bavaria being in possession of Prague, the court of France now put in execution the plan of promoting him to the imperial dignity. The ministry of Versailles had previously interested the electoral powers in his favour; and he being crowned king of Bohemia at Prague on the sixteenth of December, whereby the vote of that kingdom was suppressed, there remained no obstacle to his advancement, and he was elected emperor by the majority of suffrages in the electoral college on the twelfth of February following, on which very day he received information of the misfortune he had sustained in the loss of Lintz.

France, however, thinking its work but half done while the queen of Hungary, its devoted victim, had a town left wherein to shelter her head from the storm that surrounded her, had employed its emissaries at Constantinople, to excite the Ottoman forces to augment the enemies of this wretched princess; in which case she must have inevitably been undone. In this alarming conjuncture, she wrote a letter with her own hand to the grand seignior, who, with a magnanimity that might do honour to the best of Christian princes, assured her in return, that, far from taking advantage of her distresses, he should seize all opportunities to convince her of his friendship. The pope permitted her to levy a tenth on the revenues of the clergy within her dominions, and even to use all the church plate, for the support of the war. The czarina having also expressed an inclination to assist this unfortunate princess, the French resolved to find her employment in another quarter, by persuading the Swedes to declare war against Russia, which they accordingly did, on the most frivolous pretences; and having assembled a numerous army in Finland, and equipped a large squadron of ships, they commenced hostilities, by blocking up the Russian ports in Livonia; but a large detachment of their army being defeated by the Russians near Wylmanstrandt, that fortress was immediately after taken from them by assault; and the revolution in Russia happening soon afterwards, by which the princess of Mecklenburgh and the infant czar were deposed, and the princess Elizabeth, daughter of the late Peter the Great, raised to the throne of Russia, a cessation of arms was agreed upon in December between the two powers.

Though deprived by this event of the succour which she had so much reason to expect from the friendship of the deposed princess; yet fortune on a sudden seemed to relax of her severity in favour of

Maria-

Maria-Theresa; for while marshal Khevenhuller was besieging Lintz, general Bernes seized the great magazine which the French and Bavarians had established at Cremsmunster; and general Berenklaui, in his march towards Bavaria, mastered the towns of Hallstadt and Ischel, making the garrison, consisting of four hundred men, prisoners; and prosecuting his successes, opened a way for the hussars to make incursions very far into the electoral dominions. Soon after he joined colonel Mentzel with a body of troops under his command; and they proceeding together, attacked the Bavarians at the village of Wittich, and obtained a complete victory, in which the enemy lost upwards of three thousand men, and their general, Preysing, was taken prisoner. By these and other unlooked-for successes, her Hungarian majesty recovered Austria, and procured winter-quarters for her troops in Bavaria.

As the campaign terminated with an auspicious prospect in favour of the queen of Hungary, against the confederate army, it will be now requisite to take a view of the situation of affairs in her Italian dominions.

The ministers of France and Spain had omitted no solicitations to engage the king of Sardinia in the alliance against her: but this prince, jealous of the Spaniards gaining any settlement in Italy, determined to espouse the cause of the house of Austria; and not only denied a passage through Piedmont for fifteen thousand French troops to join the Spaniards, but also formed two camps on his frontiers, to oppose the entrance of the Spaniards into his country, which compelled them to run the hazard of sending their troops by sea. The republic of Genoa was deeply engaged in the French interest: the pope, the Venetians, and the duchy of Tuscany, were neutral. The king of the Two Sicilies, awed by the British fleet, had hitherto professed a like neutrality; but being evidently attached to the Spanish interest, privately resolved to assist that court against the queen of Hungary.

I have already observed, that the queen of Spain had formed a plan for erecting the Austrian dominions in Italy into a monarchy for her second son Philip; and no sooner was the court of Spain ascertained of our king's having signed a neutrality for his Hanoverian dominions, than they embarked a body of fifteen thousand men under the duke de Montemar, captain-general of Spain, at Barcelona, which were transported to Orbittello, on the coast of Tuscany, under convoy of the united squadrons of France and Spain, in the month of October. The British admiral Haddock was then lying at anchor in the bay of Gibraltar with a fleet of twelve ships of the line, who no sooner heard of the Spanish fleet passing the Streights than he put to sea after them. He fell in with them in a few days, but to his great mortification found that they had been joined by the French squadron at Toulon, and saw the ships of the two nations drawn up in line of battle. As he bore down upon the Spanish fleet, the French admiral sent a flag of truce to inform him, that as the French and Spaniards were engaged in a joint expedition, he should be obliged to act in concert with his master's allies. Thus circumstanced, our admiral was obliged to decline the engagement, the force of the combined fleets being double that of the English squadron, and to make the best of his way for Port Mahon, leaving the enemy to prosecute their voyage without molestation. But it was too late in the year for the Spaniards to commence any military designs; therefore they put their troops into winter quarters, waiting for a reinforcement from Spain and the return of spring, before they attempted any thing farther to disturb the repose of her Hungarian majesty's dominions in Italy.

Although king George, as elector of Hanover, had been obliged to desert the cause of this princess; yet he did not fail, as king of Great Britain, to espouse it to the utmost. He had the pleasure to see his opinion warmly espoused by all his subjects, who were universally warmed in her favour. The duchess of Marlborough, whose deceased husband had fought for Charles VI. assembled the principal ladies of distinction in London, whom she induced to advance for this cause one hundred thousand pounds, forty thousand of which she laid down herself. The queen of Hungary however nobly declined accepting the money, chusing rather to wait for such sums as might be granted to her by the nation in parliament assembled.

The king returned to England in the month of October, and on the first day of December the session was opened, Mr. Onslow being re-chosen speaker. Never had there been a more violent contest than that occasioned by the late elections for the new parliament. The minister, secure in his own influence, was unpardonably remiss in soliciting his friends on this occasion. The minority beheld with pleasure this oversight, which they converted to their own advantage, and exerted themselves with such diligence, that they obtained at least an equality of voices.

His majesty, in his speech to both houses, said, "That, agreeable to the advice of his parliament, by whose advice and concurrence he had undertaken the present war, he had ordered the chief operations to be carried on in the West Indies: that he needed not inform them of the powerful confederacy which had been formed against her Hungarian majesty; that was a matter too generally known to require any particular explanation: that had other powers, who lay under the like obligations with himself, been as punctual in fulfilling their engagements, the support of the common cause would have been attended with less difficulty: that he had, pursuant to the advice of his parliament, ever since the death of the late emperor, exerted himself in support of the house of Austria; he had endeavoured, by the most proper and early applications, to induce other powers who were equally engaged with him, and united by common interest, to concert such measures as so important and critical a conjuncture demanded; and where an accommodation seemed to him necessary, he had laboured to reconcile those princes, whose union would have been the most effectual means to prevent the mischiefs which had happened, and to secure the interest and safety of the whole: that although his endeavours had not hitherto had the desired effect, he could not but still hope, that a just sense of the common and imminent danger would produce a more favourable turn in the councils of other nations: that he hoped the parliament would think it expedient to put the nation in such a condition as might enable it to assist its friends, and and defeat its enemies; and he flattered himself they would make it their study to proceed with unanimity, vigour, and dispatch, in all their deliberations."

After this speech had been reported to the commons by their speaker, Mr. Herbert (afterwards earl of Powis) moved for an address of thanks, including an approbation of the means by which the war had been prosecuted. This motion being seconded by Mr. Trevor, lord Noel Somerset, afterwards duke of Beaufort, stood up, and moved that it should be inserted in the address, "that his majesty should not engage these kingdoms in a war for the preservation of his foreign dominions." He was seconded by Mr. Shippen, who had remarkably distinguished himself by his consistency of principles, through a long course of parliamentary attendance, and who on this occasion was an eminent proof of the acquisition liberty of speech in that house had made since himself was committed to the Tower for an expression which at this time would have passed unnoticed. Mr. Gibbon, an ancient member, who had been always in the opposition, observed, that it would be the highest absurdity to return thanks for the prosecution of a war which had been egregiously mismanaged. Sir Robert Walpole having made a short speech in defence of the first motion for an address, was answered by Mr. Pulteney, who, after entering into a long detail of the minister's conduct, which he censured in every point, suffered himself to be so far carried away by the heat of his imagination, and the acrimony of his animosity, as to charge sir Robert in direct terms with personal attachment and affection to the enemies of his country; an exaggeration which took greatly from the force of his other arguments, which were founded on real facts. After much debate, the minister agreed to leave out the paragraph approving of the manner in which the war had been prosecuted; and the address passed in the following terms: "We will, said they, grant such effectual supplies as shall enable your majesty not only to be in a readiness to support your friends and allies, at such time and in such manner as the exigency and circumstance of affairs shall require, but to oppose and defeat any attempts that shall be made against your majesty, your crown, and kingdom; or against those who, being equally engaged with your majesty, by the faith of treaties, or united by the common interest or common danger, shall be willing to concert such measures as shall be found necessary and expedient for maintaining the balance of power in Europe."

The coldness of this address tended greatly to the prejudice of the minister: his mercenary friends suspecting his power was upon the decline, began by degrees to forsake him; and those who followed him from principle, imagined that he had been too negligent in the interests of a master who had so highly favoured him. The minister also at this time committed another piece of misconduct which did him infinite prejudice: this was the setting up for chairman of the committee of elections, a person who was very little esteemed by either party*, against one whose interest was warmly espoused by the adverse faction, and was in his own character unexceptionable†. This question being carried against the minister, gave a mortal damp to his interest, and was the prelude to still greater mortifications that awaited him; for the opposition in the house of commons finding their ascendancy, soon manifested the force of their superiority, which was seen in the debates on the controverted elections for Boscawen in Cornwall, the city of Westminster, the shire of Berwick, and Clapperton in Wiltshire, which were all decided in favour of the opposition.

At that for Westminster, a party of soldiers being called on pretence of a riot, the poll books were shut, and the two court candidates, lord Sundon and sir Charles Wager, returned by the high bailiff. The electors of Westminster hereupon presented a petition, which being taken into consideration, the election was declared void, the high bailiff committed to custody, the justices who sent for the soldiers reprimanded on their knees at the bar of the house, and a writ ordered for a new election, when lord Percival and Mr. Edwin were chosen. When the election was declared void, there were great rejoicings throughout the city of Westminster. The court lost this election by a majority of two only (viz. two hundred and twenty-two against two hundred and twenty.) This however served evidently to demonstrate the declension of the minister's interest, and the conclusion of his influence in the house of commons; and he himself was convinced it was high time to provide for his own safety, by retiring from a place where the majority of a single voice might at any time have sent him to the Tower. He had however the consolation of being certain to find the royal protection extend, as far as it constitutionally could, to secure his person from the rage and fury of the times. He therefore continued to give his attendance in the house till the second of February, and even during that time carried some points against the opposition; but the decision of the Chippenham election on that day being carried against him only by one vote, and he having been very roughly handled in the course of the debate, he came out of the house, and in the lobby declared he would never enter it more.

This declaration was not so soon expected either by his friends or his enemies, and seems chiefly to have been accelerated by the repulse sir Robert met with in an attempt which, if it had succeeded, would probably, by dividing the opposition, have secured him a longer political reign.

His royal highness the prince of Wales, who was justly the darling of the whole nation, esteeming sir Robert Walpole as a bar between the king and his people, between the king and foreign powers, and between the king and himself, stood in the front of the opposition, and had for some years lived at a distance from his royal father's presence. Sir Robert therefore, finding himself so closely hunted, was resolved to try, as the last expedient, to reconcile the king and prince, and thereby bring the latter off from the country party. With this view Dr. Secker, bishop of Oxford, and now archbishop of Canterbury, was sent to the prince with a message, importing, that if his royal highness would write a submissive letter to his majesty, fifty thousand pounds should be added to his annual income, two hundred thousand pounds should be given him to pay his debts, he and his friends should be readmitted into the royal favour, and suitable provisions should be made for them all. To this message the prince replied with the strongest protestations of duty towards his majesty, but declared he could agree to no terms till he was removed. It was this answer that determined the minister to withdraw from power; but as it required some time to deliberate upon the first changes, it was requisite to adjourn the house. Accordingly, on the third of February his majesty came to the parliament, and adjourned both houses to the eighteenth. In this interim sir Robert Walpole was, on the eighth of February, created by his majesty, baron of Haughton, viscount Walpole, and earl of Orford; and on the eleventh he resigned all his employments.

As the first happy effect of the change in the ministry, his royal highness waited on his majesty at St. James's, attended by a great concourse of nobility and other persons of distinction; was received in a most gracious manner; and a guard was immediately ordered to attend his royal highness at Carleton-house. This happy reconciliation, with the change of the ministry, was celebrated with public rejoicings. It was now expected the national honour would be retrieved, and such measures pursued as would be most conducive to the restoring and maintaining the ancient constitution, and to concur in making the strictest enquiry into the cause of past mismanagements. It soon appeared, however, that the removal of sir Robert Walpole had wrought no material alteration in the measures of the ministry, though some changes in the higher departments of government were absolutely necessary: therefore, on the resignation of sir Robert Walpole, Mr. Sandys, who had long persevered in opposing him, and had led on the attack against him in parliament, now succeeded him in his place of chancellor of the Exchequer, and was likewise appointed a lord of the Treasury; and the earl of Wilmington succeeded him as first commissioner of that board. Lord Harrington, being dignified with the title of earl, was declared president of the council; and in his room lord Carteret became secretary of state, jointly with the duke of Newcastle, who continued in his place as the other secretary. The duke of Argyll was made master-general of the ordnance, colonel of his majesty's royal regiment of horse-guards, and field-mareschal and commander in chief of all the forces in South Britain; but soon after conceiving some disgust, he resigned all his employments with the utmost indignation. The marquis of Tweeddale was appointed secretary of state for Scotland; a post which had been long suppressed; Mr. Pulteney was re-admitted to his seat in the privy-council, but, agreeable to the promises which he had made to the party, declined accepting of any place; the earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham was preferred to the head of the admiralty, in the room of sir Charles Wager; and, after the resignation of the duke of Argyll, the earl of Stair was appointed field-mareschal of his majesty's forces, and ambassador-extraordinary to the States-general.

As the Whigs who had confederated in the opposition never intended to continue an alliance with the Tories, any further than the removal of the minister, and an alteration in his system of politics; they endeavoured to keep that party from the lead in government, and to prevent them from engrossing any material charge in the administration. As the choice of those already preferred had fallen principally upon the Whigs, it administered matter of great jealousy to, and was considered as an ill omen by the Tories, who expected nothing less than to be admitted into a coalition of power; and though his majesty had already supplied the principal ministerial posts with persons who had long been most confided in by the people, the Tories had very just suspicions they were to be deserted by those gentlemen in power; and that none, or only a very few of the Tories, would be permitted to preside in the government. The duke of Argyll in particular was so disgusted at this proceeding, that he with the utmost resentment again threw up all his places, and was succeeded by the duke of Montagu in that of master of the ordnance.

The parliament met, pursuant to their adjournment, on the eighteenth of February, 1742, when petitions having been presented by the merchants of London, Bristol, Liverpool, Glasgow, and many other trading towns in the kingdom, complaining of the losses they had sustained by the bad conduct of the war; the house resolved itself into a committee to deliberate on these remonstrances. The articles of the London petition were explained by Mr. Glover, an eminent merchant of that city, and author of the well-known poem of Leonidas. Six days were spent in perusing papers and examining witnesses; then the same gentleman summed up the evidence, and pathetically and eloquently expatiated upon the hardships sustained by the British merchants, and the indifference, disregard, and haughtiness, shewn to them from the admiralty upon several applications, which he represented as the result of one uniform and continued design to make the merchants uneasy with the war. He concluded with observing, that the British trade in this its day of oppression, threw itself upon the protection of a British parliament, in full hopes of that wise and august assembly taking their case into consideration, and of providing for their future security by a law. The parliament paid a due regard to these petitions, and entered into vigorous resolutions for the better protection of the British trade and commerce for the future. Accordingly, a number of small men of war were appointed to cruize in the Channel and about the coasts, to secure the merchant ships from the insults of the Spanish privateers.

It was hoped, that in consequence of the late change in the ministry, the great assembly of the nation would have become again the seat of concord: but alas! these hopes were quickly blasted; and it appeared too plainly that those who had declaimed the loudest for the liberties of their country, had been actuated solely by the most sordid views of self-interest. The members of the long opposition were now divided: those who were in power, joined by some of the late ministerial friends, and promoting others of their own, obtained a visible ascendancy in the parliament; many of the leading Tories were neglected by the ministry; party began again to kindle; and another opposition quickly disclosed itself. Whigs and Tories were blended in such confusion, some in and others out of employ, that there was hardly making any distinction.

The public voice was at this time unanimous for an enquiry into the administration of sir Robert Walpole. The crime they imputed to him was that of applying not only all the favours of the crown, but even the public money, towards gaining a corrupt influence at elections and in parliament; and in their frenzy of resentment, nothing less was expected as an atonement than the loss of his life, his honours, and the utter ruin of his family. The wiser and more moderate part of the senate, however, were disinclined to take such severe revenge on a mistaken man, who, though he might have trespassed upon the power in his hands, yet the laws might have been tortured more to have reached him capitally, than he had strained his power to maintain himself; and therefore at the same time they concurred in detecting and exposing the mismanagement of his administration, in order to gratify the wishes of the nation, they at the same time determined to protect him from the rage and violence of party fury.

On the ninth day of March the lord viscount Limerick moved the house of commons, that a committee might be appointed to enquire into the conduct of affairs at home and abroad for the last twenty years (the space of time the late minister had been at the helm.) He was seconded by sir John St. Aubyn, Mr. W. Pitt, and lord Percival, the new member for Westminster. The motion was opposed by sir Charles Wager, Mr. Pelham, and Mr. Henry Fox. Several of the members, who were otherwise inclined to have favoured the motion, opposed it also, because they apprehended it to be too extensive, both as to time and matter; and that an enquiry for so long time back was without a precedent, and if allowed would be such a precedent as might be of dangerous consequence in future times. In fine, the motion, after a long debate, was rejected by a majority of two. Not discouraged by this disappointment, the same nobleman, on March 23, made another motion, "That a committee be appointed to enquire into the conduct of Robert earl of Orford, during the last ten years of his being first commissioner of the Treasury, and chancellor and under-treasurer of his majesty's Exchequer," which was carried in the affirmative by a majority of seven; and the house resolved, "That a committee of secrecy, in number twenty-one, should be chosen by balloting;" and in the mean time presented an address to the king, assuring him of their fidelity, zeal, and affection.

The place and pension bills, and that for repealing septennial parliaments, had been regarded as the great criterions of the party during their late opposition, and it was now determined to put the sincerity of the present administration to those tests. The pension-bill went through the lower house, but was rejected in the upper, lord Carteret voting against that very measure which he had so lately endeavoured to promote. It was generally thought that the motion for repealing the septennial act would have been carried; but as it was made by sir Robert Godschall, and seconded by sir John Barnard, it was rejected by a majority of twenty voices. Among those who spoke against it were Mr. Pulteney and Mr. Sandys, who having, during the late opposition, been always the chief promoters of it, were thereby exposed to a great deal of censure. The people, enraged by the miscarriage of those their favourite schemes, exclaimed with great vehemence, that they had been deceived and betrayed; and that an infamous compromise had been made between the old and the new ministers, in order to elude the hopes and wishes of the nation: the cry for justice against the late minister was revived, and re-echoed from all parts of the kingdom, and something in decency must be done to silence it.

The committee of secrecy being chosen, they proceeded to business; and upon the thirteenth of April the lord Limerick reported to the house, that the committee met with great obstructions in their enquiry; for having ordered Nicholas Paxton, esquire, solicitor to the Treasury; Gwynn Vaughan, esquire; and Mr. Scroope, secretary to the Treasury, before them for an examination, they refused to answer the interrogations exhibited by the committee. It seems that the two first of these gentlemen alleged, that the laws of England did not compel a man to say any thing which might tend to accuse himself; and the latter, in whose name all the secret service-money was issued, amounting to above a million, refused to answer any question, pleading his majesty's injunction to the contrary; and that he was not permitted to reveal any thing on that subject.

Mr. Paxton had been committed to Newgate by the committee for his obstinacy: and upon this report to the house it was resolved, That leave be given to bring in a bill for indemnifying such persons as should, upon examination, make discoveries touching the disposition of public money, and concerning the disposition of offices, or any payment or agreement in respect thereof, or concerning other matters relating to the conduct of Robert earl of Orford. This bill was drawn up, passed, and sent up to the lords, when a motion was made for its being committed; upon which a long debate ensued, in the course of which the lord Carteret spoke strenuously against it. This nobleman had been long remarkable for his opposition to the late minister, and had even made the motion in the house of peers for removing him from his majesty's presence and councils. On this occasion he appeared in the light of his advocate. His lordship affirmed, that the bill now proposed was contrary to justice, the laws of nature, and the fundamental maxims of the British constitution, and even without precedent: that against such a method as this, no innocence could be a protection; for informers would naturally expect a reward, if they could fix any crime upon a man thus set up as the object of public resentment: nay, that by this means a few of them would probably be induced to enter into a conspiracy for charging him with some heinous crime; and that conspiracy might be so cunningly formed, as to render it impossible for him to prove his innocence, or to avoid condemnation. After this and some other speeches, the question being at last put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of fifty-two; though no less than thirty-two lords, and amongst them the most eminent and best esteemed part of the nobility entered their protest against the rejecting this bill; because they conceived it might prove a dangerous precedent, of fatal consequence to the constitution, since, whenever the nation should be visited by a wicked minister, those who should have served him in defrauding or oppressing the public, and in corrupting individuals, would be furnished with an excuse for refusing their evidence; their danger would produce his security, and he might enjoy in safety the plunder of his country: nay, they even apprehended that the rejecting of this bill might be understood, by those who could make any discovery, as if that house designed to discourage any evidence whatsoever that could affect the person whose conduct the secret committee was appointed by the house of commons to enquire into.

Those members in the house of commons who were for prosecuting the enquiry, beheld with the utmost indignation the fate of their favourite bill. A committee was appointed to search the Journals of the Lords for precedents; and their report being read, lord Strange, son to the earl of Derby, moved for a resolution, "That the lords refusing to concur with the commons of Great Britain, in an indemnification necessary to the effectual carrying on the enquiry now depending in parliament, is an obstruction to justice, and may prove fatal to the liberties of this nation." The motion, which was seconded by lord Quarendon, son of the earl of Litchfield, gave rise to a warm debate; and Mr. Sandys declaimed against it, as a step that would bring on an immediate dissolution of the present form of government.

Another motion was made in the course of this session, which greatly engaged the attention of the public. This was for leave to bring in a bill for taking, examining, and stating the public accounts of the kingdom. The motion was carried, and the bill prepared, importing, among other things, that the number of commissioners for carrying the bill into execution should be seven: that no person should be a commissioner who had any office of profit, or was accountable to his majesty: that the commissioners should be members of this house; and that they should be chose by ballot. This motion was in its nature extremely alarming to the earl of Orford's friends, who were indefatigable in exerting their interest to procure on their side a majority of the commissioners; and having, in spite of all the endeavours of the opposite party, succeeded in this point, the patrons of the bill became so indifferent about it, that it was dropped.

It was with unspeakable regret that the country party, and the bulk of the nation, beheld so many obstructions thrown in the way of an enquiry which they had so loudly demanded; and that they were likely to be disappointed in their ardent hopes of bringing the late minister to public justice. I have already hinted that the new administration only wanted to expose the misconduct of the earl of Orford; and when this was done, they intended to protect him from any dangers such a proceeding might naturally incur, and from the open and declared vengeance of an enraged and unthinking multitude. It was with this view that they had concurred with the other part of the late opposition, in promoting an enquiry into the conduct of the late minister, which they pushed so far as to make it evident that he had been concerned in many flagrant acts of fraud and corruption in influencing elections; and, by making use of the wealth, power, and places of the crown, to introduce a criminal dependency in parliament, and to sap the constitution at its very foundation. It was demonstrated, that during the last ten years of his administration, no less a sum than one million four hundred and fifty-three thousand four hundred pounds of the public money had gone through his hands for secret service; that above fifty thousand pounds of this sum had been paid to hireling writers; that on the very day which preceded his resignation, he had signed orders on the civil list revenues for above thirty thousand pounds. In a word, it was clearly manifested, as far as the enquiry extended, that the late minister had made too free with his trust on the one hand, and the constitution on the other. The new ministry wanted no further or greater accusation: the public were made sensible of his errors and mismanagement. This was thought sufficient: and though the blind and outrageous populace called aloud for his blood; yet those at the helm, wisely and justly considering that it would be no less than murder to suffer the life of a man to be taken away, when no law of the land had subjected him to death, stepped in the breach, and saved him from destruction; and the committee proceeding to make a further progress in their scrutiny, and having almost prepared a third report, were interrupted, by the prorogation of the parliament on the fifteenth of July.

In the mean time, in hopes of lulling the resentments of the people, and, if possible, to conciliate their affections, the ministry assented to a bill for excluding certain officers from seats in the house of commons. They passed another for encouraging the linen manufacture, another for regulating the trade of the plantations, and a third to prevent the marriage of lunatics. They voted forty thousand seamen, and sixty-two thousand five hundred land-men, for the service of the current year: they provided for the subsidies to Denmark and Hesse-Cassel: they granted the sum of five hundred thousand pounds, and voted to send sixteen thousand three hundred and thirty-four effective men to the assistance of the queen of Hungary. The grants for the year 1742 amounted to five millions seven hundred and twenty-three thousand five hundred and thirty-six pounds, for which the committee of supplies provided by a land-tax at four shillings in the pound; the malt-tax; one million from the sinking fund; annuities granted upon it for eight hundred thousand pounds; and a loan of one million six hundred thousand pounds from the Bank. This produced in all six millions one hundred thousand pounds; so that there was a surplus of three hundred and seventy-six thousand four hundred and sixty-three pounds.

Some time before the prorogation of the parliament, John lord Gower was appointed keeper of his majesty's privy-seal; Allen lord Bathurst was made captain of the band of gentlemen pensioners; and, to the surprize of every one, that great champion in the opposition, Mr. Pulteney, accepted of a coronet, by the title of earl of Bath.

I shall now resume the history of the operations of war in the year 1742, which the money, the countenance, and the arms of this nation so greatly influenced.

Upon

Upon the duke of Argyll's throwing up all his places, the earl of Stair, who had been lately appointed ambassador to the States-general, was made commander in chief of the British forces designed for Flanders. His lordship had embarked early in the spring on his embassy for Holland, with orders to endeavour to concert, jointly with their High Mightinesses, the proper measures for preserving the liberty of Europe, and establishing a just balance of power.

The troops destined for the queen of Hungary's service, after passing in review before his majesty, were embarked the latter end of April for Flanders, where they were to be joined by fifteen thousand Hanoverians, and by the six thousand Hessians that were in British pay; and the earl of Stair, who had not been able with all his address, which was allowed to be very great, to prevail on the Dutch to come to a resolution of taking the field in conjunction with the English, was recalled from the Hague to take the command of the army; and the lord Carteret, principal secretary of state, was dispatched to Holland with fresh instructions.

Mean time, the change in the British administration had given a new aspect to the face of affairs on the continent. The news no sooner arrived in Holland than the States-general, tho' corrupted in great measure by the gold of France, shewed a more favourable disposition to renew the ancient good understanding with England, so necessary for checking the ambitious views of the general enemy. It was no sooner known in Germany than it infused new spirits into the councils, and gave fresh courage to the arms of her Hungarian majesty. The king of Sardinia, who foresaw his own ruin in that of the house of Austria, and had hitherto ventured only to refuse the Spanish troops a passage through his territories, on their coming to invade the Austrian dominions in Italy, as soon as he was ascertained of the alteration in the British ministry, discovered a resolution to support the queen of Hungary. France received the news of this change with the utmost consternation. His most Christian majesty immediately called an extraordinary council of state, wherein it was resolved to put that kingdom in the best posture of defence, and to pursue the affairs of the marine with the utmost diligence.

By this time Charles Albert, duke of Bavaria, was elected emperor, by the name of Charles VII. and recognized by the pope, who, according to the ancient custom, on this occasion granted the letters of dispensation, to excuse the emperor going into Italy to take the two crowns of Rome and Milan. As soon as the election, the investiture consequent thereupon, and other ceremonials, were completed, the emperor revoked the Aulic council, or supreme court of judicature at Rome, and established another at Franckfort; from whence the elector of Mentz, as chancellor of the empire, wrote to the queen of Hungary to transmit the records and papers belonging to that council from Vienna. This princess, however, disacknowledged the validity of the imperial election: she refused to comply with the demand; and soon after, the imperial diet or assembly of the states was removed from Ratisbon to Franckfort.

The elector of Bavaria, however, received but a small share of happiness from his new elevation; for, amidst the loud acclamations which every way approached him, he had the misfortune to behold his electoral dominions laid open to the victorious Austrians, conducted by the great Khevenhuller, the most consummate general of the age. The strong passes of that electorate had been already penetrated; several principal towns were reduced; and the Bavarian army defeated during the severity of the winter season. The Austrians soon after advanced into the bowels of this plentiful country; and Munich, the capital seat of the Bavarian family, fell an easy prey to the unresisted invaders.

The queen of Hungary was no sooner informed of this event, than she wrote a most affecting letter to Khevenhuller, and presented him with the pictures of herself and her infant son, the archduke Joseph (born March 13, 1741). The letter was read, and the pictures shewn, to the officers and soldiers, who, transported with an enthusiasm of zeal for their beloved sovereign, swore they would live and die for her service; and in their future behaviour, as if inspired with these noble sentiments, they discovered on all occasions not only courage and resolution, but even madness and fury.

About the same time baron Bernklau entered Bavaria by another quarter, with an army drawn from the woods and wilds in the remotest territories of Austria, whose appearance, scarcely bordering upon human, spread terror wherever they went, which was still increased by their being allowed to live upon free quarters. They were however a very useful and indefatigable body of men: they drove count Thoring, with his Bavarians, under the cannon of Ingoldstadt, and performed many other important services.

Soon after, viz. about the middle of April, the Bavarians received a reinforcement of twenty thousand French troops, commanded by the duke de Harcourt, who were detached from Prague, and came by Amberg, through the Upper Palatinate. On the other hand, marshal Khevenhuller, being joined by the prince of Saxe-Hilburghausen, with an army of twenty-four thousand men, had seized an advantageous post at Ortenburgh, in the neighbourhood of Passau, and detached general Bernklau to observe the motions of the confederates, who had sent a body of four thousand men to attack the Austrian garrison in Munich. The garrison, upon intelligence of their design, quitted the city, thinking it untenable; but before the French could arrive, the city was again repossessed by the Austrians.

The Bavarians having received a second reinforcement from France, the confederate army was now augmented to fifty thousand men, and pitched their camp at Neder Altsach. This obliged Khevenhuller to recal his troops from Munich, and assemble his army all together near Villingen, where, having thrown two bridges over the Danube, general Bernklau was detached, with baron Trenck, and a body of six thousand men, to cross that river, and march as far as Zell, where they encamped and entrenched themselves within a league of the French and Bavarians, who thereupon marched back to Deckendorff towards the end of May; and from thence count Thoring and the duke de Harcourt advanced with a part of the army to the castle of Hilkersberg, on the Danube, Danube, with a view to take possession of the bridge the Austrians had thrown over that river. The Austrian garrison, under the command of general Helfreich, immediately marched out to give them battle; and a severe action ensued, in which the Imperialists were defeated, with the loss of one thousand killed and wounded. After this action the French and Bavarians, though so greatly superior to the Austrians, avoided an engagement. To counterbalance, however, in some measure, these advantages, mareschal Broglio sent a body of French and Bavarians under prince Maurice of Saxony (better known by the name of count Saxe and marshal Saxe) who took by capitulation the town of Egra, while the citadel of Glatz, for want of provisions, was obliged to surrender to his Prussian majesty, who was conducting the operations of the war in Moldavia.

Prince Charles of Lorraine, brother to the grand duke, was in the heart of Bohemia, at the head of thirty-five thousand foot, and eighteen thousand horse, and every-where favoured by the inhabitants. He commenced a defensive war very successfully, keeping the enemy in a continual state of alarm, by cutting off their convoys, and harassing them perpetually on every hand with crouds of hussars, Croats, Pandours, and Talpaches. The Pandours are Slavonians, inhabiting the banks of the Drave and the Saave: they wear long garments, and in their girdles carry several pistols, a sabre, and a poniard. The Talpaches are Hungarian infantry, armed with a musket, two pistols, and a sabre: the Croats are the militia of Croatia: the hussars are Hungarian cavalry, mounted upon small horses, which are very swift, light, and hardy; they are employed to cut off posts that are weak, and not properly supported by cavalry, which was every-where the case of the troops of France and Bavaria. The Austrians being enabled, by means of the great number of recruits which they daily received, to form a more regular plan of operations, prince Lobkowitz, at the head of eleven thousand foot and five thousand horse, was appointed to watch the motions of the French in Bohemia, while prince Charles with his army advanced against the Prussians and Saxons, who were preparing to lay siege to Brinn; but on advice of prince Charles's march, laid aside that intention, retired with great precipitation out of Moravia, and abandoned Olmutz.

This retreat was considered by the Austrians as extremely advantageous to their views, since it gave them an opportunity of uniting their whole force against the French under marshal Broglio, who was too strong for prince Lobkowitz singly; but before the Austrians could effect this junction, the king of Prussia having received a strong reinforcement of thirty-two thousand men, under prince Leopold of Anhalt-Dessau, entered Bohemia, and with the utmost celerity endeavoured to circumvent the motions of the Austrians, and prevent their junction. By the force of generalship the king effected his design, and at last his army and that of prince Charles came to a pitched battle at Czaflaw, a town thirty-five miles to the eastward of Prague. The regular troops on both sides were nearly equal in number; but the Austrians had the advantage of a vast number of irregulars, who did them great service in the action. The battle continued four hours with the most bloody obstinacy: the Austrians demonstrated the greatest bravery; the Prussians fought with a degree of desperation. Victory, however, was on the point of deciding for the former, when the irregulars, having forced their way into the Prussian camp, fell to plundering: their example was unfortunately followed by the regulars of the right wing, who had also broken into the enemy's intrenchments; and the main body of the Austrians being by this means left exposed, his Prussian majesty seized the critical moment; and renewing the attack with redoubled fury, obliged prince Charles to retire, with the loss of three thousand men, though his own loss was not much inferior.

His Prussian majesty, however, notwithstanding his great success, as well in Bohemia as Silesia, began to think of compromising his differences with the queen of Hungary. He was chiefly induced to take this resolution from his detection of the chicanery of the French court, which now first manifested itself towards his majesty. According to the plan of operations concerted, the French army was to have joined the Prussian forces before the battle of Czaflaw; but every courier brought fresh pretences for retarding their march. These subtleties were fully exposed, by a copy of marshal Broglio's dispatches, of the fourth of May, which fell into the king's hands. By these he discovered that a reinforcement of five thousand men was in march towards the marshal's army, and that his instructions ordered him not to join the Prussians; to spare his troops as much as possible, and never to act near those of the king; to form an army of observation of twenty thousand men to watch the motions of the Prussians; to risque nothing in conjunction with them, but to pretend to the king in excuse, that no reinforcement was arrived, any more than marshal Belleisle, who was the only general that had orders to act in concert with the king. Notwithstanding this discovery, he continued his operations against the Austrians, foreseeing, that if these should destroy the French, an event which was by no means improbable, he himself must be left to the mercy of the court of Vienna, from which he had every thing to fear. In order therefore to secure himself against this danger, he was obliged to save the French, though he was by no means satisfied with their conduct; but having gained the victory of Czaflaw, he continued entirely upon the defensive.

In a letter which he wrote to marshal Broglio after the battle, he covertly reproaches the French with their perfidy, in the following terms: "I am quit with my allies, for my troops have just now gained a complete victory: it is your business to make what advantage you can of it immediately, otherwise you may be answerable to your allies." The marshal pretended not to understand what his majesty meant by the words, "I am quit with my allies;" and wrote to Versailles, "That the king of Prussia might have expressed himself more obligingly, but that he did not understand the French tongue." He understood it well, and his meaning was clear.

While this monarch remained in a perfect state of inaction, the French gained a victory over the Austrians at Sahay, on the road to Frauemberg; but scarcity of provisions rendered the allies unable to make any advantage of their success. The arrival of the recruits from France was too late: the troops under der Broglie were so much diminished, that only twelve thousand men could be mustered at a review of forty-six battalions, which ought to have amounted to thirty thousand men; the rest of the army was scattered, while prince Charles of Lorraine and prince Lobkowitz united their forces. To add to this misfortune, there was but little agreement between the French generals. Had the Prussians acted conjunctly with the French and Saxons, it is certain, that being masters of Prague, Egra, and all the northern Bohemia, victorious at Czaflaw and Sahay, they might have remained masters of Bohemia. The reason of the king of Prussia's inactivity was owing to the resolution he had taken to accommodate his differences with the queen of Hungary, in case he could procure any reasonable terms; and when marshal Belleisle waited upon him in his camp on the fifth of June, in order to concert with him what was to be done for the common cause, the king spoke thus to him: "I give you warning, that prince Charles is advancing towards M. de Broglie; and that if you do not improve the advantage you had at Sahay, I shall forthwith conclude a separate peace."

Nor did he fail to adhere to this resolution; for finding the queen of Hungary willing to cede to him the dominions to which he made pretensions; and incensed against the French, on account of the disingenuous treatment he had received from them, he had a private interview with prince Charles of Lorraine, when the preliminaries of a treaty of peace were agreed upon, which were signed at Breslau on the eleventh of June by the earl of Hyndford, the British minister at the court of Vienna, to whom her Hungarian majesty had given full powers to act for her, and by the count de Podewitz, on the part of the king of Prussia. The substance of this treaty is as follows.

"The queen of Hungary cedes to the king of Prussia all Upper and Lower Silesia, except the principality of Jeschen and Troppau, and likewise the principality of Glatz in Bohemia. The king of Prussia engages, on his part, to observe an exact neutrality during the continuance of the war, and to withdraw his troops from the kingdom of Bohemia, within fifteen days from the signing of the present treaty; within which time the ratification thereof is to be made. His Prussian majesty charges himself with the repayment of what was lent by the English merchants to the late emperor on the security of the revenues of Silesia, by the contract made at London, January 10--21, 1735. His Britannic majesty guarantees this treaty, as well in quality of king of Great Britain as elector of Hanover. By a separate article, the king of Poland is invited to accede to this treaty, upon condition of withdrawing his troops within sixteen days from the ratification hereof. The czarina, the States-general, the king of Denmark, and other powers of Europe, are invited to concur in this treaty."

By this treaty the queen of Hungary yielded to the king of Prussia not only more than he demanded fifteen months before, when she might in return have been assisted with troops and money, and his interest and influence in procuring the imperial crown for her consort the archduke, but gave him into the bargain the principality of Glatz, only to remain neuter. But it must be considered, that at that time the king of Prussia was the only power who had commenced hostilities against her, with less pretensions to any part of the Austrian dominions than any of the other competitors. An emperor was now elected in opposition to her hereditary right, and the king of Prussia was the most successful of his allies. In drawing off him, she judiciously imagined that he would attract the king of Poland: and in this she was not mistaken; for as soon as the notification of the preliminary treaty was made to him, the Saxon troops in Bohemia were immediately ordered to halt till further instructions. A negotiation was set on foot, and a peace concluded between him and the queen of Hungary, which was proclaimed at Dresden the seventeenth of September; and by which the queen yielded to his Polish majesty, as elector of Saxony, some places in the circles of Elnbogen, Satzer, Leutmeriz, and Buntzlau, in Bohemia; in consideration whereof the elector guaranteed to her the rest of Bohemia.

The emperor was abandoned by these treaties, and not the slightest mention made of France: in other words, the French and Bavarians were left to contend for themselves. Prince Charles of Lorraine, after the battle of Czaflaw, marched towards Budwies, and joined prince Lobkowitz in his camp at Wesel, where the two armies formed a force of sixty thousand three hundred men. The confederate army was now forced to abandon all their posts one after another: they daily lost their provisions and ammunition, of which part was pillaged by their own soldiers, and part carried off by the enemy. Prince Charles passed the Moldau in pursuit of a body of troops under M. d'Aubigné, who retreated in disorder. He followed the French to Thein, to Piseck, and from Piseck to Pilsen, and from thence to Beraun. These retreats cost the French at least as many men as a battle, and, besides, contributed to dispirit the troops. They were perpetually harrassed in their precipitate marches by the hussars; their baggage pillaged; and every Frenchman who chanced to stray from his corps was sure to be knocked on the head by the pursuers, or the peasants of the villages they passed through; and, had it not been for a most judicious stand made by marshal Broglie against prince Charles, the whole French army must have been destroyed. This was an admirable piece of generalship, but did not at all restore his affairs. During the time he was making so many efforts to prevent being cut off by the united armies of prince Charles and prince Lobkowitz, he received advice of the defection of his Prussian majesty, and the signing the treaty of Breslau. This news came like a thunderbolt upon Broglie, and increased the panic of his men, who never ventured to look back till they found themselves under the protection of the cannon of Prague, where they were joined by marshal Belleisle from Dresden, whither he had lately made a tour, with a view of dissuading his Polish majesty from abandoning the confederacy; but finding all his attempts ineffectual, he posted away for Prague, resolved to take the best measures for securing that important city and the confederate army against the attack of the Austrians.

The city of Prague * is encompassed with a wall, bastions, and other works; has a citadel in the new town, and a castle in the little town, well provided with cannon, which render it as strong as a place of that extent can be; but it is commanded by the hills of Ginisnitz, about a mile from the city. The French garrison within, and the army under the walls of Prague, consisted now of twenty-four thousand of the choicest troops of France: these were employed night and day in fortifying their camp, which they chose on a very convenient spot of ground, being a sort of peninsula, formed at the north end of the city by the winding of the river Moldau, by which the right, left, and rear, were secured against any attack; so that they had nothing but a narrow front to guard; and this was defended in flank by the cannon upon the ramparts of the city, as well as by the strong intrenchments they had raised in front between the town and the river.

Prince Charles and prince Lobkowitz, with their combined armies, amounting to sixty thousand men, arrived within sight of Prague on the twenty-fifth of June, and encamped on the hills of Ginisnitz, about a quarter of a mile from the city; from whence the army marched, and encamped at Konigshall, nearer to Prague, where, on the twenty-seventh, the grand duke of Tuscany arrived in the camp.

The appearance of the Austrian army convinced the French that the force of opposition would be of little service, and they resolved to try if they could extricate themselves by stratagems of negotiation. With this view Belleisle sent a trumpet to demand a conference, offering immediately, in virtue of his plenipotentiary power, to open conferences for a general accommodation; but he received for answer, that the queen of Hungary was determined to take no step of that kind without the participation of her allies. When Belleisle found the Austrians were too wary to be trepanned into his cobweb negotiation, he held several conferences with count Konigseck concerning a capitulation for the surrender of the place, offering to evacuate Prague and all Bohemia, the fortresses of Egra and Fraumberg included, on permission of marching off with their artillery, arms, and baggage: but the court of Vienna insisting they should surrender prisoners of war, the conferences were entirely broken off; and the place being invested on all sides, the trenches were opened on the twenty-eighth of July.

It was a sight altogether new to see an army of twenty-six thousand of the best troops in Europe besieged. The French general acquitted himself with great spirit and resolution. He knew he had nothing but famine to fear: he was sensible the Austrians were very ignorant of the art of attack and defence; but they were formidable, by their numbers, by their knowledge of the country, by their valour in the field, and by their being acquainted with the language of, and possessed of the good will of the inhabitants. The queen had left nothing undone, on her part, which she thought might contribute to the retaking of this capital. She gave all the horses in her own stables to assist in drawing the artillery and stores. Her example was followed by her nobles, who strove with each other who should most contribute to the success of this great expedition. In short, the hopes of the queen of Hungary and her brave subjects seemed to rise in proportion as she was oppressed.

It was the misfortune of the French at Prague to find themselves at a great distance from their own country, among a people to whose language they were strangers, and by whom they were hated; to be exposed to every kind of necessity, without any certainty of assistance. In Prague every thing began to fail but courage. About the end of July meat sold there for four livres (three shillings and six-pence of our money) per pound. Horse flesh was eaten at the best tables; and thro' scarcity of forage, the besieged were forced to kill or turn loose upwards of fourteen thousand horses. Several of the principal French officers sent their plate to the mint to be coined, to purchase subsistence for their soldiers. The Austrians indeed had not one good engineer among them; their works therefore were very indifferently carried on: the trenches were too long and too wide, and the French reaped some advantages from the errors of their enemies. They made many successful sallies: the most memorable was that of the twenty-second of August; it was little less than a battle. Twelve thousand of the besieged, under marshal Belleisle, attacked the besiegers in their works, carried a battery, made two hundred prisoners, filled up the works, took general Monty, and killed and wounded fifteen hundred men. Their own loss was likewise very considerable: the duke de Biron, the prince de Deuxponts, and the prince de Beauveau, were wounded, and several officers of distinction lost their lives. On the Austrian side, the grand duke and prince Charles, who greatly distinguished themselves during the whole engagement, were frequently exposed to the utmost danger; the grand duke in particular escaped very narrowly, having his hat carried off by one of the cannon bullets.

In the mean time, cardinal de Fleury was making private overtures for an accommodation, and

* This city, so remarkable for the extraordinary siege sustained there by the French under the marshals Broglie and Belleisle, is the metropolis of Bohemia, pleasantly situated on the large river Moldau, one hundred and fifty miles north-west of Vienna, one hundred north-east of Ratisbon, and seventy south of Dresden. Few cities in Europe have a larger extent than Prague, which is divided into three parts, called the old, the new, and the middlecity. The old city, on the east of the Moldau, is very populous, and full of handsome, but old-fashioned houses; in which stands the university, one of the most celebrated in Europe; and in this quarter great numbers of wealthy Jews have their residence. The new city was formerly separated from the old by a wall, but now only by a ditch, into which the river can be let at pleasure. The lesser town lies on the west of the Moldau, and joins to the old town by a bridge of sixteen arches, being in all one thousand seven hundred feet long, and thirty-five broad, with two large gates under two spacious towers, one at each end, which makes this bridge one of the noblest structures in the world, it being four hundred feet longer than Westminster-bridge, and seven hundred and eighty feet longer than London-bridge. Part of this town is built on a rising ground, at the top of which stands Upper Prague, where is a magnificent palace belonging to the crown. Prague is pleasantly surrounded by fine fields and gardens, and adorned with a great many elegant houses, churches and convents: the inhabitants are computed to be about one hundred thousand; and, excepting London, Paris, and Rome, no city has a greater concourse of nobility and gentry, who are exceeded by none in affluence and grandeur, equalled by few in politeness and civility to strangers.

even went so far as to accept the king of Great Britain as mediator. He also offered to treat about the secularization of the bishoprics of Osnabrug and Hildesheim, and the annexation of those territories in perpetuity to the house of Hanover. While, on the one hand, the cardinal thus addressed the British court, who lent a deaf ear to his proposals, as knowing their illusory tendency, he applied on the other to veldt-marshal count Königseck before Prague, to whom he wrote a letter, which was delivered to him by marshal Belleisle; in which the cardinal excuses himself from having consented to the present war, and says he was forced into it by the superior power of others with the king. This was directly levelled at marshal Belleisle. The cardinal afterwards chusing to disavow this letter, it was printed by order of the court of Vienna, which served greatly to lessen the cardinal's credit.

By this time Prague, the late flourishing and happy capital of a spacious kingdom, with more than one hundred thousand citizens within its walls, was subjected to all the calamities that war and famine could inflict. It would be foreign to our purpose to relate particularly every remarkable incident of this long and important siege: suffice it to say, that the French behaved with great spirit and intrepidity; nor could the Austrians and Hungarians, with their utmost efforts, make any regular approaches; so that the place might rather be said to be invested than besieged: yet it was apparent, that in the end the entire loss of the French army, both in Prague and Egra, was inevitable. There was but one way to relieve them, which was to send to their succour that army of forty thousand men, which, under the command of marshal Maillebois, had compelled the king of England to sign the neutrality for Hanover: but this army was in Westphalia, about seven hundred miles from Prague. This expedient was proposed by the marquis de Fenelon, ambassador in Holland. It had its inconveniencies, but yet was not without its advantages. France had in a manner exhausted herself of men: she had at different times sent into Germany the better part of two hundred and twelve squadrons, and one hundred and seventeen battalions; and these had been from time to time recruited. These troops, divided in Prague, Egra, Bavaria, and the Upper Palatinate, were above half wasted away. It was debated to march these weakened armies towards the complete and flourishing army of Maillebois, composed of forty-one battalions and sixty-five squadrons, three thousand Palatines, three thousand Hessians, and three independent companies of foot, and two of dragoons. It was obvious, that if all these forces united had acted with unanimity, and been assisted by Prussia and Saxony, they must have succeeded in every thing. If marshal Maillebois had advanced with his army along the banks of the Rhine, to penetrate into Bohemia, he had left France unguarded; so that even the Dutch might have become formidable, and harassed the frontiers with forty thousand men they kept on foot for their own defence. These considerations were urged by the cardinal and his party as strong arguments against the measure projected; but the marquis de Fenelon, having undertaken for the continuance of Holland's neutrality, his most Christian majesty determined upon it, however hazardous, because necessary; rightly considering, that great undertakings cannot be executed without risking great losses; and it was agreed in council, that orders should be sent to M. Maillebois to begin his march from Westphalia without loss of time; but the route and manner in which his army was to be conducted still embarrassed them extremely.

The scheme was imparted to his imperial majesty, without whose consent it could not be executed. Charles at first started some objections: he was desirous that the troops under Maillebois should continue in his electoral dominions: he represented in a memorial, that by delivering Bavaria, Prague would be set free of course, as the Austrians could no longer continue the siege of that place, when M. Maillebois' army should reach the banks of the Danube. In this opinion the emperor was seconded by M. Maillebois himself, who was extremely averse to set out on so discouraging an expedition. The French ministry, however, could not be brought to put their only resource in the hands of an emperor who had been so little able to defend himself, and who by this time had incurred their contempt, and even suspicion. Accordingly, Maillebois began his march from Westphalia to Bohemia about the middle of August, under the sanction of a rescript which the emperor sent to the diet, in which he justified the march of Maillebois upon the principles of necessity, from the unconquerable obstinacy of the court of Vienna.

The duke de Harcourt was then at the head of the French troops in Bavaria; Seckendorff commanded the Imperialists; and Khevenhuller the Austrians: but the decision of the fate of Prague, which was hourly expected, kept all parties in a state of inaction. The count de Saxe, who had now entered into the service of France, and gave daily proofs of his uncommon vigour, activity, and resolution, was appointed to succeed the duke de Harcourt in the command of the French army.

Prince Charles, who still continued before Prague, no sooner received news of the march of M. Maillebois to the assistance of that city, than he turned the siege into a blockade; and committing the care of it to prince Lobkowitz and the Hungarian general Festitz, with a body of eighteen thousand men, he set out to the defence of Bohemia.

After a most intricate and fatiguing march, the auxiliary army at length arrived on the frontiers of Bohemia, about the beginning of September. Every thing hitherto had been happily conducted: count Saxe was to join this army with the body he commanded in Bavaria. He had already acquired the character of an officer who would let no opportunity slip him. On this occasion he found means to escape from Bavaria, where count Khevenhuller held him in a manner shut up, and by a dexterous march joined his forces to those of Maillebois, after having taken the post of Elnbogen. Soon after, the Imperialists under Seckendorff arrived also from Bavaria; while Khevenhuller, who had in vain attempted to prevent this junction, joined the army under prince Charles, near Hayd. Meanwhile, the Austrians reduced the town of Fraunenburg; and Trenck, the famous partisan, made himself master, by a desperate attack, of Chamb in Bavaria, which, on account of its situation, was the general general repository of the effects and treasure of the inhabitants.

Upon the departure of prince Charles from Prague, Belleisle and Broglio resolved to execute the same design which had been accomplished by the counts Saxe and Seckendorff; that of joining the marshal de Maillebois, who, by the accession of the troops from Bavaria, was now at the head of seventy thousand men; and had marched with such precipitation, that prince Charles could not bring him to an engagement. Mean while, Festitz, for want of a sufficient force, was obliged to raise the blockade of Prague; and the French generals being now at liberty, took post at Leutmeritz, a small town, lying half way between Prague and Kaden, in order to join the main army under Maillebois, who had by this time advanced in the neighbourhood of the latter place.

Prince Charles, well knowing that if the enemy's project succeeded, it would entirely alter the face of affairs in Germany, resolved, if possible, to prevent its execution. With this view he made himself master of the passes in the mountains of Bohemia, where an hundred men may put a whole army to a stand. Count Saxe had detached a body of troops towards Kaden, a post of the last importance, to break down the bridge upon the Eger, over which the Austrians were to pass. One company had already entered the place, and broken down a part of the bridge. The Austrians came up at the same instant, repaired the bridge, and made themselves masters of the town. Thus was all communication cut off between the armies of Belleisle and Broglio, and Maillebois. The latter could receive no accounts from Leutmeritz; and the only road to Kaden lay through a defile which it was impossible to penetrate. The main army had now scarce bread enough to last for three days; so that Maillebois was obliged to reduce the soldiers to half allowance. Discontent, want of discipline, misunderstanding, desertion; every thing conspired against the united army at this time. In fine, Maillebois seeing it impossible to effect his junction with the other two French marshals, returned towards Bavaria, while Belleisle and Broglio marched back to Prague. Maillebois, on his arrival on the confines of Bavaria, was disgraced, and the command given to M. Broglio, who escaped in disguise from Prague, and arrived in the auxiliary army on the twenty-second of November, where he took upon him the chief command. The auxiliary army being now of consequence superior in Bavaria, Munich, the capital of that electorate, was a second time relieved, and the emperor entered it again.

On the other hand, the Austrians having made themselves masters of Leutmeritz, M. Belleisle, who remained in Prague, found himself closely pent up therein by prince Lobkowitz (who had renewed the blockade) together with his whole army, now reduced to about seventeen thousand men, without money, subsistence, or hope of succour; and they had no other prospect but that of perishing by famine or war. They were thus cruelly situated, when, about the latter end of November, M. Belleisle received orders from his court to endeavour at effectuating a retreat from Prague. The general returned for answer, that he would engage to conduct his troops in safety to Egra, in spite of the enemy's army or the rigour of the season: a bold undertaking, but which was as successfully executed.

Belleisle had formed his design of escaping with incredible secrecy; and, the better to conceal his purpose, he had remounted his cavalry, repaired his carriages, and made every other preparation for a longer defence. He had also engaged the whole attention of the Austrians, by frequent sallies and skirmishes, in which the French had generally the better. At last, every thing being entirely got ready, he resolved to carry his scheme into immediate execution: the danger was extreme. Prince Lobkowitz had distributed his army in such a manner as to surround the town, the inhabitants of which were so many spies on the motions of the French. The weather growing more and more cold, became almost intolerable. There were upwards of two thousand soldiers sick in the place; and the marshal himself had been a long time so ill of the sciatica, or hip-gout, that he could not mount on horseback; yet, in the midst of these conspiring obstacles, he fixed on the night of the sixteenth or seventeenth to make his retreat.

In order to secure it more effectually, it was incumbent on him not only to deceive count Lobkowitz, but also the inhabitants of the place, and even his own people. To this end, he was continually sending detachments all around him to bring in forage, which were always accompanied with cannon and covered waggons; so that the surprise should be less when he chose to evacuate the place, which must be done with such an equipage. Two days before his retreat he laid contributions, payable in four months. The day of his intended departure the gates of the town were kept shut; and having caused a report to be spread that he intended a general sally at such a quarter, he made his retreat by another road, and gained a day's march of prince Lobkowitz, before the other was apprized of his departure. This project he was enabled to execute with the greater facility, on account of the prodigious extent of the walls: and in order the more effectually to amuse the enemy, he left a garrison of about three thousand men in the place, under M. Chevert. M. Belleisle continued his retreat for ten days through ice and snow, the enemy's cavalry perpetually harrassing him on his march. On the third day prince Lobkowitz appeared at the head of a body of horse, on the other side of a plain, where the two armies might have come to an engagement; but the prince did not chuse to attack forces who, from their situation, must necessarily fight with that sort of despair that renders courage invincible: he determined therefore to cut off the retreat of the French, by taking possession of the passes upon the two principal roads leading to Egra.

M. Belleisle, however, once more eluded the designs of his enemy: he chose a road which would have been in any other season impassable: he marched his army across vast frozen morasses that never perhaps had been trodden. In this exploit he merited the greater honour, as, notwithstanding his being confined during the whole march to his coach or sedan by a violent rheumatism, he always continued himself to point out the way. At length, having surmounted all his difficulties, he arrived at Egra on the twenty-sixth day of December, having performed a march of one hundred and fifty miles, and not having lost, by his own account, so much as a single soldier, except thro' the inclemency of the season, which killed about one thousand.

The very day that M. Belleisle reached Egra, the troops that had been left behind in Prague, under M. Chevert, capitulated on the most honourable terms, being allowed to march to Egra with all the honours of war. Thus the town of Prague, which had been taken by the French in a few hours, was evacuated after a siege and blockade of five months.

Having thus given an account of the campaign in Germany, the event of which was so very interesting to England, it is now time to attend the progress of the war in Italy and the southern parts of Europe, where the naval force of Great Britain had a considerable influence.

We have already taken notice of the junction of the French and Spanish fleets in the Mediterranean; of their having passed admiral Haddock; and of the latter having landed their troops at Orbitello in Italy; after which the French and Spanish squadrons put into the harbour of Toulon.

The queen of Hungary, alarmed at the dangers that threatened her, resolved to apply to the king of Sardinia, whose interest it was to preserve the present system of power in Italy, and who, by his situation, was best able to check the ambitious views of the French and Spanish monarchs. His Sardinian majesty was at this time sufficiently jealous of the designs of the Spaniards in Italy; but, at the same time, he was afraid of being crushed between France and Spain before he could be properly supported. He had therefore temporized for some time: but being now alarmed at the progress of the Spanish arms in Italy, he resolved to declare for the house of Austria. On this occasion, however, his Sardinian majesty took care to make the best terms for himself. He stipulated a subsidy from England; he reserved in their full force all the claims of his family upon the Milanese; and he obtained several private cessions of places from the queen of Hungary, whose husband's sister he had married. On the first of January, 1742, he caused to be printed and published a manifesto, in which he stated his claims; but it was not till the month of February that he resolved to act in conjunction with the queen of Hungary; and then he was not upon the best of terms with her in the main: they only united against the present danger that threatened both.

The troops which had been sent into Italy by the Spanish court were under the command of the duke de Montemar, famous for his victory at Bitonto, and afterwards remarkable by his disgrace. Their route lying necessarily through Tuscany, the grand duke, husband to the queen of Hungary, gave them a free passage, having declared himself neuter in the cause of his wife. The duke of Modena, who was married to a princess of the blood-royal of France, also declared himself neuter. Pope Benedict XIV. through whose territories both the Spanish and Austrian armies were to pass, promised the same neutrality. The republic of Genoa, from the same principle of neutrality, gave free passage to a body of French forces that arrived from Spain: and the king of Naples and the Two Sicilies adopted the same neutral system, though his father and brother were principally concerned; yet, after all, not one of these potentates, so apparently neutral, were so in reality. Don Carlos in particular increased the duke de Montemar's army with several Neapolitan regiments: the duke of Modena was already the secret friend of Spain: Genoa had much the same inclination: and the pope, although he had acknowledged the elector of Bavaria as emperor, was visibly attached to the cause of the queen of Hungary.

Count Traun, the queen's governor in the duchy of Milan, assembling all his forces early in the year, joined them which were sent him from Tirol, in order to oppose the Spaniards. About the beginning of March (1742) the king of Sardinia seconding warmly the Austrians, advanced towards the territories of Parma: he now exerted as much courage and abilities as he had displayed in the year 1733. In these two conjunctures he shewed how valuable his alliance was: he had excellent ministers, and good generals, and was himself both a minister and a general; an oeconomist in his expences, skilful in his conduct, indefatigable in his hardships, and intrepid in danger.

In the mean while, the Spanish army assembled at Rimini, near the duke de Montemar's; and being joined by the Neapolitan forces, amounted to sixty thousand men, furnished with a large train of artillery. About the beginning of May they entered the Bolognese. The king of Sardinia had by this time taken the field with thirty thousand men, and appeared on the side of Parma; while the Austrians under marshal count Traun advanced towards the Bolognese with about seventeen thousand men. The duke of Modena, relying upon the protection of the Spaniards, was so impolitic, in defiance of the neutrality he professed, to enter into a private treaty with the duke of Montemar; of which the king of Sardinia being apprised, entered the duke's territories, seized upon his duchy, and made himself master of his capital; while the duke, thus stripped of all his possessions, was obliged to retire to the Spanish army, of which he was by his late treaty to have the nominal command. This army, however, soon became so reduced by sickness and desertion, that the duke de Montemar, finding he could not maintain his ground against the Austrians and Spaniards, retired to Rimini, whither he was followed by the king of Sardinia.

By this time the English ministry had come to a resolution to keep no farther measures with France: the conduct of the French admiral in the Mediterranean towards admiral Haddock was so strong a demonstration of the intentions of that court, as all their pretexts to a neutrality could not disguise.

Admiral Haddock, what by the fatigues of the service, what by anxiety of mind, owing to the numerous disappointments he had met with, found his constitution so much impaired, that he resigned the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean to commodore Lestock, who had lately arrived from the West Indies, and been sent up the Streights with ten sail of men of war, to reinforce Mr. Haddock, and oppose the united fleets of France and Spain.

Upon the departure of the admiral for England, the commodore used the utmost diligence in fitting the fleet for sea. On the twelfth of April he set sail from Port Mahon with a squadron of twenty-eight men of war, and soon after appeared before Toulon, at which the inhabitants were in the utmost consternation: the country round was alarmed by fires, beacons, &c. But this proved a false alarm, the commodore not having the least intention of molesting them; for the united squadrons were greatly superior to the British in force, the French under admiral de Court consisting of five seventy gun ships, seven of sixty, four of fifty, two of thirty, and two of twenty; and the Spanish squadron under Don Navarro, of one ship of one hundred and fourteen guns, four of seventy, six of sixty, and five of fifty; in all, thirty-six men of war: so that commodore Lestock, after observing their situation, proceeded towards Antibes on the coast of Italy. In the mean time, upon the change of the British ministry, Mr. Lestock was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the white; but as it was determined to strike some bold stroke in the Mediterranean in the course of this summer, the supreme command of the fleet was bestowed upon Thomas Matthews, esq. vice-admiral of the red, who was at the same time invested with the character of ambassador-extraordinary and minister-plenipotentiary to the king of Sardinia, and the other princes and states of Italy. He left England in the middle of April. In his passage he took several French and Spanish merchant ships, and at length safely joined rear-admiral Lestock in the harbour of Villa Franca.

Perhaps no ministry ever took a more impolitic step than in joining these two admirals in command, as it was well known that there had long subsisted between them an inveterate dislike to each other: nay, Matthews had even declared to the ministry on his appointment, that he accepted of the command only on condition that Mr. Lestock should be speedily recalled. However, the latter was continued in the Mediterranean till the sea-fight off Toulon, when it too plainly appeared that the glory and advantage of the nation was shamefully sacrificed to the gratification of private resentment.

Mr. Matthews' first care, after taking possession of his command, was to provide for the well-guarding of the coasts of Catalonia, Provence, and Italy; and he quickly gave an instance of his resolution to strike terror into the enemy, by rendering his fleet formidable; for a French man of war passing by Villa Franca, in sight of the British fleet, and refusing to pay the compliment to the flag, the vice-admiral fired at the Frenchman to bring him to; but the commander persisting in his obstinacy, a man of war was ordered out to force him to comply, who poured a broadside into the French ship, and sunk her directly. His next exploit was to send captain Norris, in the Kingston, of fifty guns, with the Duke fireship, captain Calis, to burn five Spanish galleys which had put into the bay of St. Tropez, a French port in the Mediterranean; an order which was effectually executed. But no action of his proved so agreeable to the people of Great Britain as that of sending commodore Martin with a squadron of ships and bomb-ketches to Naples, to demand of the king of Sicily not only to withdraw his troops from acting in conjunction with those of Spain, but to promise in writing not to give them any farther assistance in any respect; and in case of a refusal on the part of his Sicilian majesty to give the proposed satisfaction, to bombard the city of Naples. Incredible was the consternation that seized on the Neapolitans at the sight of the formidable force Mr. Martin brought with him, and the peremptory manner in which he made the above demand: and however deeply his Sicilian majesty might resent this insult upon his dignity, his private resentment was obliged to give way to the interests of his state, which was in no condition to defend itself. Accordingly, after several messages passing between the commodore and the duke de Montealegre, the Sicilian minister, the latter, in his master's name, promised in writing, that his troops should be immediately withdrawn out of Lombardy; and that he would not in any manner whatsoever aid or assist those of Spain any more during the present war in Italy. This promise was instantly performed: the Neapolitan troops were forthwith recalled; and the Spanish army being thus weakened, was not able during the remaining part of the campaign to perform any action of importance; and by this bold, but successful step of the British admiral, the queen of Hungary was saved from apparent destruction.

Soon after, viz. about the latter end of August, Mr. Matthews pursuing the spirited plan he had so happily begun, dispatched the same successful embassy to St. Remo, a Genoese town on the Mediterranean, thirty miles north-east of Nice, with orders to destroy some considerable magazines which the Spaniards had gotten together there. This service the commodore effectually performed, and in the beginning of September re-joined the vice-admiral, who took up his station at Hieres-bay, where his ships lay in an excellent road, and commanded every vessel that might attempt to enter or come out of the harbour of Toulon. The British fleet having by this time been joined by rear-admiral Rowley, was somewhat superior to the united squadrons of France and Spain, who therefore kept close within the port of Toulon.

The English fleet, however, could not controul the operations of the Spaniards by land; for the Spanish ministry, being fearful that if the Neapolitan troops were compelled to quit their army under the duke de Montemar, that general might be exposed to the danger of being defeated by a superior force; they determined to send another body of troops to his assistance, who were to march through the south of France, and endeavour to penetrate into Italy through the passes of Piedmont. Accordingly, in April seventeen thousand three hundred men assembled at Barcelona, under the command of the count de Glerices; and being joined on their march by other Spanish corps, were augmented to thirty thousand. On this reinforcement, the whole army marched through Provence and rendezvoused at Grace, about fifty miles distant from Toulon, where it waited for the arrival of Don Philip, second son to the king of Spain, whom his ambitious mother had lately set up as a new candidate for royalty, declaring she would leave no efforts unexerted to erect Lombardy into a kingdom in his favour. In May Don Philip with his court and a very splendid retinue entered Antibes, the last town of France towards Italy. In the beginning of June Don Philip put himself at the head of his troops, tho' the count de Glerices had the real command, on account of the prince's youth. Their plan was to force their way into Piedmont, by Nice and Villa Franca; but thro' the prudent dispositions of his Sardinian majesty, with the assistance of the British admiral, their designs were rendered impracticable; as was also another attempt they made with a strong body of Miquelets, to force a passage by Demont into the valley of Stura. Disappointed in both these designs, the Spaniards defiled towards the left, thro' Dauphiné, and entered Savoy, where they met with very little resistance; and on the tenth of September the infant Don Philip took possession of Chamberry, the capital of that duchy, ninety miles from Turin, and immediately published a manifesto, enjoining the deputies of the province of Savoy to come in and take the oaths to him, and to bring their arms and ammunition to his quarters, within the space of five days at farthest, prohibiting them to pay any more taxes to the king of Sardinia, or to have any correspondence with him, under pain of death.

While these things were transacting on the borders of Piedmont, his Sardinian majesty was in a full career of success against the Spaniards in Italy, having obliged the Spanish and Neapolitan army to retreat from Rimini towards the kingdom of Naples; and the Neapolitan troops being recalled, he had now an opportunity of returning to the relief of his own dominions, which he did with 24,000 Piedmontese, leaving a small body of troops behind, under the command of the count d'Apremont, to co-operate with the Austrians in his absence. By forced marches he arrived at Turin on the eighth day of September. In the beginning of October he advanced to Conflans, in the neighbourhood of Chamberry; and the infant not chusing to hazard a battle, retired with some precipitation towards Dauphiné, and took post under the cannon of fort Barreaux, while his Sardinian majesty encamped within sight of them at Mians, near Montmelian, on the frontiers of Dauphiné: and in this condition the two armies remained till the beginning of December, when the court of Spain, disgusted with the inactivity of the count de Glerices, sent the marquis de las Minas to supersede him in the command of the army. This last general had no sooner joined the army than he made a vigorous attack upon the castle of Apremont, in the neighbourhood of the Sardinian camp, and obliged the garrison to capitulate: after which he made the necessary dispositions for attacking the king of Sardinia, who, upon the loss of the last-mentioned important post, thought it most prudent to retire into Piedmont, the Spaniards at the same time marching back into Savoy, where they established their winter quarters.

In the mean time the Austrians, upon the departure of the Piedmontese troops, returned into the duchy of Modena; and as soon as the duke de Montemar was informed of this separation, instead of continuing his retreat towards Naples, advanced back again to St. Nicholas, within ten miles of Bologna, where he resigned his command to the count de Gages, though the duke of Modena still retained the title of generalissimo. This army attempted to penetrate into Tuscany, but was prevented by the vigilance of count Traun, the Austrian general; and in the beginning of December both armies went into winter quarters, the Spaniards in the Bolognese and Romagna, and the Austrians and Piedmontese in the Modenese and Parmesan.

Admiral Matthews having received information that his Sicilian majesty had sent a reinforcement of six regiments from Naples to join the Spanish army, in December dispatched a man of war to Naples with a letter, expostulating on this breach of the late promise of neutrality. The king in return ordered the duke de Montealegre to deliver to Mr. Allen, the British minister at his court, a declaration, importing, "That he was resolved to adhere to his engagements; but as these regiments in question belonged to his father the king of Spain, and had been only lent to him for his expedition to Sicily, it was not in his power to retain them when recalled, as they were not in his pay or service." However, his Neapolitan majesty, sensible of the weakness of his capital, from the last visit paid him by the English, caused several new fortifications to be erected for the defence of the port of Naples.

While the French were expelled from Bohemia, and the dominions of her Hungarian majesty in Italy secured in the manner already related, her possessions in Flanders were likewise powerfully protected by his Britannic majesty: for no sooner had marshal Maillebois marched from Westphalia to the relief of Prague, than the Hanoverian troops, consisting of sixteen thousand two hundred and sixty-eight men, began their march from Hanover and passed the Weser, in their way to Flanders; for which country the six thousand Hessians in British pay, began to move about the same time (viz. the latter end of August). These two bodies of troops joined the British forces at Brussels about the middle of October, and all together formed an army of about forty thousand men, which encamped in the neighbourhood of the last mentioned city. It was generally supposed, that his Britannic majesty would pass over to Flanders this year, and take upon him the command of this army; wherefore large draughts were made from the Austrian garrisons in that country, in order to complete the whole force to fifty thousand men; and it was confidently reported that king George meditated no less than the siege of Dunkirk, the fortifications of which the French had of late openly repaired. This at first so alarmed the court of France, that they assembled an army of twenty thousand men in the neighbourhood of Dunkirk, and took every possible precaution against any attack upon them in the Low Countries, fortifying Givet, Philipville, Avennes, and Rocroi, where they put strong garrisons, and laid up great magazines, while the earl of Stair quitted his negotiations at the Hague, and arrived at Ghent on the twenty-seventh of November. The French ministry, however, were soon relieved from their anxiety, by hearing that his Britannic majesty's voyage to Flanders, and the measures concerted for commencing operations, were entirely laid aside for this campaign, in consequence of the Dutch having threatened to declare against those who should strike the first blow in Flanders, and soon after the confederate army were ordered into winter quarters; the British and Hessians in Flanders, the Austrians in Luxemburg, and the Hanoverians in the county of Liege, in readiness to march in the spring whither it should appear most convenient for the service of her Hungarian majesty.

During these transactions in Europe, in the course of this year, every thing seemed to go backward in America, owing to the dissension between the admiral and general. They had in the latter end of the foregoing year received a reinforcement from England;

England; upon the arrival of which they held a council of war, to concert in what manner the ships and forces under their command might be most effectually employed for the advantage of the nation, and the annoyance of the enemy, when it was proposed by the land officers to undertake an expedition against Panama, by which a body of three hundred men, with five hundred negroes and four hundred Mulquetos, were to be landed at Porto Bello, and from thence to march over the Isthmus of Darien to the said town of Panama. Mr. Vernon and sir Chaloner Ogle having concurred with this opinion, Mr. Lowther was sent over to the coast of Porto Bello on board the Triton sloop, in the character of a trader, in order to obtain all the intelligence he could, for the better securing the success of the intended expedition: and in the mean time the admiral lost no time in getting his squadron in readiness; but the land officers were so very dilatory in their motions, that it was the latter end of March before the armament arrived at Porto Bello. The fleet consisted of eight sail of the line, with three fire-ships and two hospital ships: the transports were about forty sail, having on board three thousand land forces, and five hundred negroes raised by governor Trelawney, who attended the expedition in the rank of a colonel.

Admiral Vernon met with no opposition on entering the harbour of Porto Bello, though the governor of the place had three companies of Spanish soldiers with him, besides two more of mulattoes and negroes. The governor, upon the first sight of the English fleet standing in for the harbour, quitted the town with great precipitation, with the three companies of soldiers, and most of the inhabitants were preparing to follow him; but the admiral having observed on his first landing that the whole place was in great confusion, and that the town was on the point of being abandoned, dispatched an officer and an interpreter directly, to desire of the inhabitants to lay aside their apprehensions, and continue peaceably in their own possessions, promising them the fullest protection in their lives and properties. Encouraged by this indulgence, a deputation came on board the admiral from the magistrates, thanking him for his humanity, and readily putting themselves under his protection; which was accordingly granted them by the unanimous resolution of the council of war. It was likewise resolved that a detachment should be sent up the river Cascahal, in order to cut off the communication between Porto Bello and Panama, and take possession of the Contadero, or custom-house, and secure it with a guard; which was immediately put into execution.

Three days after the arrival of the fleet at Porto Bello, lieutenant Lowther came in; and a council of war being thereupon called, he was examined as to the practicability of the attempt against Panama, when he gave it as his opinion, that the putting this scheme into execution could not at present be attempted with any hopes of success, on account of the rainy season of the year, and the sickness that prevailed in consequence thereof amongst the troops. This opinion was adopted by all the land officers, with the general at their head; and as they out-numbered the sea officers three to two, their opinions were always decisive:

in short, a general council of war meeting afterwards on board the Boyne, admiral Vernon's own ship, it was thereat agreed to wood and water the ships, and return to Jamaica.

The general, however, thinking it necessary to offer some reason for thus suddenly deserting an enterprize which he had before appeared so sanguine for, sent a paper to the admiral, containing the reasons of the land officers for laying aside the projected attempt upon Panama, which were as follow: "That, from having consumed near three weeks in their passage, which was usually made in eight days, the rainy season was come upon them, which might not only incommode them in their march, but, by the sudden rising of the rivers, might cut off their communication: that from having, during their voyage, lost near one thousand men of those who had embarked at Jamaica, and from the fleet being unable to supply them with more than six hundred, their numbers would fall almost one third short of that required for the attempt on Panama: that from the want of one of the ships with negroes on board, their numbers were reduced so low as to disable them from carrying a sufficient quantity of provisions: that from an omission in executing one part of the scheme laid down for carrying on the enterprize, the governor of Porto Bello, with three companies of Spanish soldiers, and two of mulattoes and negroes, were retired to Panama; on the cutting off of whose retreat their success in some measure depended, as the governor was an officer of merit and service, in whom the Spaniards had great confidence: that there was lately good intelligence of a large reinforcement arrived at Panama from Lima, and of works being thrown up towards the land: and for these reasons they thought it was for the service to lay aside that enterprize as impracticable."

Nothing could exceed the vexation of Mr. Vernon at finding this expedition likely to conclude so ingloriously; for he was convinced that two thousand men would have been more than sufficient for the taking of Panama; and it is certain that the governor of that place was in despair about its preservation.

PANAMA is the capital city of the province of Darien, or Terra Firma, properly in South America. Hither the treasures of gold and silver, and other rich merchandizes of Peru, are brought, and deposited in magazines till they are transported to Europe; and here the merchandize of Europe, sent to America by the galleons, is lodged, till exported to the several cities of Peru, to which it is assigned. The reduction of this city would have made us entire masters of the Isthmus of Darien, and thereby, in effect, of all the treasures of Peru. By this conquest we should have always had in hand an equivalent for any concessions that the fate of war might have obliged us to make to either of the branches of the house of Bourbon. But from the circumstances, it appears that the general had not for some time been in earnest in the prosecution of this scheme; for he was amazingly dilatory in getting ready the troops after it had been agreed on; and even when they entered Porto Bello, he neglected the advice given by Mr. Vernon in a council of war, to send a detachment up the river Cascahal, in order to intercept the governor governor of Porto Bello and his troops, which might in all probability have succeeded, or at least they might have cut off the two companies of mulattoes and negroes, who did not leave the place till next morning. But, to conclude, the result of the whole was, that the fleet and transports quitted Porto Bello and set sail for Jamaica, where they arrived on the fifteenth day of May; and the nation, instead of driving the Spaniards out of the West Indies, as was fully expected, and for which purpose above a million of money had been expended, only purchased this melancholy lesson, that as dissension is the misfortune of a free state, so it is the ruin of a military project.

After the return of the fleet from Porto Bello, nothing material was transacted in the West Indies either by vice-admiral Vernon or general Wentworth, if we except the taking possession of, and settling the little island of Rattan, in the bay of Honduras. On the twenty-third of September arrived captain Fowke, in the Gibraltar man of war, at Port-Royal in Jamaica, with letters from the duke of Newcastle, his majesty's secretary of state for the southern department, for admiral Vernon and general Wentworth to return to England; the vice-admiral to leave the command of the fleet to sir Chaloner Ogle, and the general to supply the fleet with what number of soldiers should be demanded to be under the aforesaid admiral's command, the government being now fully sensible of the disadvantage attending a command divided between the land and sea officers. On the nineteenth of October vice-admiral Vernon, in the Boyne, set sail from Port-Royal on his return to England, where he arrived safely in the month of December, as did general Wentworth some short time after.

In the month of June the new colony of Georgia was invaded by an armament from St. Augustine, commanded by Don Manuel de Monteano, governor of that fortress. It consisted of thirty-six ships, from which three thousand men were landed at St. Simon's fort, and began their march for Frederica, the principal town in the province: but general Oglethorpe, with a handful of men, took such wise precautions for opposing their progress, and so harassed them in their march, that after several bloody rencounters, in which the Spaniards were always worsted, they retired to their ships and abandoned the enterprize.

After the departure of admiral Vernon from Jamaica, sir Chaloner Ogle took all possible care for the security of the island and protection of the trade; but the Spanish squadron under admiral de Torres continuing still at the Havannah, and being superior to that under his command, was a check upon him in attempting any enterprize. However, the Spaniards were greatly disturbed in their trade by the British cruizers and privateers in those seas.

In England the parliament resumed its session on the sixteenth day of November, when his majesty acquainted the two houses, that he had augmented the British troops in the Low countries with sixteen thousand Hanoverians and the Hessian auxiliaries, in order to form such a force, in conjunction with the Austrians, as might be of service to the common cause in all events. He extolled the magnanimity and fortitude of the queen of Hungary, as well as the resolute conduct of the king of Sardinia, and his strict adherence to his engagements, though attacked in his own dominions. He mentioned the requisition of Sweden for his good offices to bring about a peace between that nation and Russia; the defensive alliances which he had contracted with the czarina and with the king of Prussia, as events which could not have been expected, if Great Britain had not manifested a reasonable spirit and vigour in the defence and assistance of her ancient allies, and in maintaining the liberties of Europe. He said, the honour of his crown and kingdoms, the success of the war with Spain, the re-establishment of the balance and tranquillity of Europe, would greatly depend on the prudence and vigour of their resolutions.

His majesty also acquainted the house of commons in particular, that he had ordered the proper estimates for the service of the ensuing year to be prepared and laid before them, and also the account of the expence of those particular services which he had already mentioned, and which they would find to have been concerted in as frugal a manner as the nature of them would admit. He was persuaded, he said, that they would readily grant him such supplies as should be found necessary for the security and welfare of the nation, requisite for the support of the common cause, and adequate to the common emergency.

The next day both houses of parliament presented very dutiful and loyal addresses to his majesty, expressing their approbation of the measures he had taken for the support of the queen of Hungary, and the restoration of the balance of power in Europe: but when the motions for these addresses were made, they met with a vigorous opposition before they passed in the affirmative. This was occasioned by the influence of the disgusted members, who had promoted another opposition to the new ministry. About this period a treaty of mutual defence and guarantee between his majesty and the king of Prussia, was signed at Whitehall.

Notwithstanding the strenuous opposition to the new ministry, they carried most of their points. The committee of supplies sat, for the first time, on the twenty-third of November, and continued by different adjournments to the second of March, 1743, when the total of the grants amounted to five millions three hundred and fourteen thousand one hundred pounds for the service of the current year, and five hundred and ninety-eight thousand three hundred and eighty-two pounds for a deficiency in the supplies granted for the preceding year, which made together the sum of five millions nine hundred and twelve thousand four hundred and eighty-two pounds. The committee of ways and means was established on the twenty-fifth of November, and continued till the twenty-fourth of March, when they settled the sum of six millions five hundred and sixty-two thousand four hundred and ninety-two pounds to answer the supplies, which was an exceeding of six hundred and fifty thousand ten pounds. To raise this sum the land-tax, at four shillings in the pound, was computed to furnish two millions, the malt tax seven hundred and fifty thousand; one million was taken from the sinking fund; one million was to be borrowed at three per cent. and eight hundred thousand pounds to be raised by a lottery; five hundred and eighteen thousand six hundred pounds were to be borrowed by a loan on the excise bills, and four hundred hundred eighty-one thousand four hundred pounds, being the deficiencies on the pot-duty; besides twelve thousand four hundred and ninety-two pounds overplus in the Exchequer. The amount of the national debt, on the thirty-first of December, was forty-eight millions nine hundred and fifteen thousand forty-seven pounds sixteen shillings and nine-pence half-penny, of which very near two millions had been increased since the thirty-first of December 1741; and though it was so considerable, most of the grants stipulated for the service of the year 1743 met with little opposition, the discontented party being resolved to reserve all their strength for a more important object.

On the first of December the motion was revived for appointing a committee to examine into the conduct of the earl of Orford during the last ten years of his administration, which was carried in the negative by two hundred and fifty-three voices against one hundred and eighty-six; and afforded an instance of the superiority of the ministerial party; because many members who, in the former session, had clamorously insisted on an enquiry, now appeared as openly on the other side, and voted against it. On the third of December a motion was made by Mr. Lyttleton, seconded by sir Watkyn-Williams Wynn, for reviving the place and pension bills; which met with the same fate as the former, being set aside by two hundred and twenty-one against one hundred and ninety-six.

On the sixteenth day of December, the house of commons being then in a grand committee of the supply, a motion was made to resolve, that the sum of two hundred and sixty-five thousand one hundred and ninety-one pounds six shillings and two pence farthing should be granted to his majesty for defraying the charge of five thousand five hundred and twelve horse, and ten thousand seven hundred and fifty-five foot, of the troops of Hanover, together with the general officers and the train of artillery in the pay of Great Britain, from the thirty-first day of August to the twenty-fifth day of December inclusive: that the sum of three hundred and ninety-two thousand six hundred and seven pounds eight shillings and three pence should be granted to his majesty for defraying the charge of the said troops, from the twenty-sixth day of December 1742, to the twenty-fifth day of December 1743: and that the sum of one hundred and sixty-one thousand six hundred and seven pounds seventeen shillings and one penny halfpenny should be granted to his majesty for defraying the expence of one thousand two hundred and sixty horse, and four thousand nine hundred and eight foot, of the troops of his majesty the king of Sweden, as elector of Hesse-Cassel, in the pay of Great Britain, from the twenty-first day of December 1742, to the twenty-fifth day of December 1743. This motion was opposed with the utmost vehemence; and the debates which happened thereon in both houses were attended with reflections more personal and severe than could well have been expected in an assembly that owned the elector of Hanover for their sovereign. It was asserted that the act of settlement, which provides against Great Britain ever being engaged in a war on account of the dominions belonging to her king on the continent, had been violated. It was farther pretended, that the whole of the bargain for the electoral troops was an imposition upon the English nation, inasmuch as those troops durst not act against the head of the empire without exposing his majesty in his electoral character to the ban; and of the justness of this reasoning, the late neutrality for Hanover was urged as an irrefragable proof. The measure of sending the British troops to the continent, before a promise had been obtained of the concurrence of the States-general, was severely censured; and, in answer to that part of his majesty's speech, wherein it is said, that this had been done in pursuance of the repeated advice of his parliament, it was alleged, that such advice was given only upon the supposition that the States-general, or some other power in Europe, would have joined Great Britain in her endeavours to preserve the house of Austria.

The ministry, towards the close of the last session, had contracted for sixteen thousand Hanoverians to be taken into the British pay, without the concurrence of parliament, whose approbation was expected when they assembled the next session. This procedure was now represented as highly unconstitutional, and derogatory from the honour and dignity of that august assembly. It was now publicly asserted by some of the leaders of the opposition, that the interests of Great Britain had been made subservient to the aggrandizing and enriching of Hanover, ever since the accession of the house of Brunswick; and that it was the grossest imposition, to make so opulent a kingdom dependent on and regulated by the interest of that electorate. Lastly, it was urged that no supply ought to be granted on so improper an occasion as the present; and that it was contrary to the national interest to retain such unserviceable auxiliaries in the British pay. The ministry, on the other hand, laboured to prove, that the preservation of Europe required that the crown of Great Britain should assist the queen of Hungary; and that such assistance could not be properly granted without this body of Hanoverians. The result was, that the house came to a resolution agreeable to the terms of the motion.

Though the continuance of the Hanoverian forces in the British pay had thus gained the approbation of the house of commons, it was afterwards more vigorously opposed in the house of lords; for on the first of February, 1743, when their lordships took into consideration the several estimates of the expence occasioned by the forces in the pay of Great Britain, earl Stanhope rose up; and, after observing that these troops were raised without the advice or consent of parliament; that it was a new burthen laid upon the nation by the despotic will of the ministers; and that the demands made for their support might be said to be a tax laid upon the people, not by the parliament, but by the court, his lordship moved, "That an humble address should be presented to his majesty, to beseech and advise him, that, considering the excessive and grievous expences incurred by the great number of foreign troops now in the pay of Great Britain; expences, increased by the extraordinary manner, as there was reason to apprehend, of making the estimates relating to them, and which did not appear to be conducive to the end proposed; his majesty would be graciously pleased, in compassion to his subjects, already loaded with such numerous and heavy taxes, such large and growing growing debts, and greater annual expences than the nation at any time ever before sustained, to exonerate his subjects of the charge and burden of those mercenaries who were taken into the British service last year, without the advice or consent of parliament." This motion was seconded by the earl of Sandwich, who took occasion to speak with great contempt of Hanover, and even seemed to forget, in mentioning certain illustrious personages, that decorum the subject required. The intent of this motion was to prevail on his majesty to disband this body of Hanoverians; but though it was strongly supported, after a long and warm debate it was rejected, by the determination of ninety lords against thirty-five, which occasioned a protest, entered and signed by those lords. The chief speakers for the motion were, the duke of Bedford, the earls of Chesterfield and Sandwich, viscount Londale, and lord Hervey, who were opposed by the lord-chancellor, the duke of Newcastle, the earls of Cholmondeley and Bath, lord Carteret, and lord Bathurst.

The British nation had for a long time entertained a great jealousy of Hanover: the frequent visits of the late and reigning monarch to their electoral dominions, contrary to the original terms on which the crown was conferred on them, had inclined their British subjects to entertain a suspicion that they had only the second place in the affection of their sovereign; and no attempt for many years had raised a greater heat of resentment, or excited louder clamours of indignation among the people, than the hire of the electoral troops; not that they had any just reason to imagine that his majesty would incur, either by contempt or neglect, the disaffection of his subjects, but because they apprehended the ministry, ever since the accession, had, to gain the affections of their sovereign, preferred the interest and advantage of his electoral before his royal dominions.

It was represented by the gentlemen in the opposition to the present ministry, that while Great Britain was exhausting herself almost to ruin, in pursuance of schemes pretended to be founded on engagements to the queen of Hungary; the electorate of Hanover, though under the same engagements, as well as under the same prince, did not appear to contribute any thing, as an ally, to her assistance, but was paid by Great Britain for all the forces it had then in the field. The restoring the balance of power in Europe, by raising the house of Austria to its former condition of influence, dominion, and strength, was represented as an object not attainable by the arms of Great Britain alone. If the queen of Hungary, however, was to be assisted, the ministry, they said, had entered into wrong measures for granting her the proper assistance, because, from the situation of her affairs, and that of all Europe, as well as the particular interest and policy of Great Britain, she would have been more effectually served with a supply of money than with a reinforcement of men, as the thirty-eight thousand troops in pay in her service cost the British nation near a million and an half of money; one half of which sum, it was said, would have enabled her to maintain a greater number of men, capable of acting wherever her affairs might require.

In answer to these arguments, uttered by some of the most eminent and distinguished men in the nation, it was said by the friends of the new ministry, that if it was really the intention of Great Britain to prevent the house of Austria from being crushed, it was certainly more eligible to support it with men than money: by perpetually recruiting so considerable an army, the Austrian dominions, populous as they are, might in time become unable to oppose France: there is a natural superiority confederated forces have over a single nation, which was manifested in the last general war, by the advantage that the united powers had over France; for the loss of men with the former falling more equally, was the less felt; while the whole loss of the latter fell upon her own nation, from whence alone she was able to recruit; which circumstance must enable the queen of Hungary to sustain the war longer, and with less inconvenience than the French: not only so, but there was another objection against furnishing that princess with a pecuniary aid, because it could not be less than a million; and so glaring a sum might have tempted the Austrian ministers to a misapplication of a considerable part of it. Such was the substance of the principal arguments urged for and against this famous measure.

It has been proved by repeated experience, that less abilities are required to oppose than to conduct, or even to defend an administration in England. The distinguished talents for which the gentlemen of the new ministry had been so idolized, while engaged in the late opposition, were all obscured from the eyes of the public, the moment they attained to the direction of affairs. The truth is, the number of their friends was small, and they had little or no interest; for though the remains of the late administration, who were still very powerful, concurred with them in, and supported all their measures; yet was not that from any real regard they bore them, but, as they thought it a common cause, to prevent the progress and success of a third party, which they equally dreaded: and what added to the unpopularity of the new ministry was, the disgrace they had incurred by having changed their party and principles, without having acquired any real power, particularly in money affairs, which was all vested in the members of the old administration.

The minister (so lord Carteret was now termed) exerted himself with equal spirit and ability in defending the measures which the government had embraced; but foreseeing that if the opposition in parliament should continue to gain strength, it might be attended with fatal consequences to the internal peace of the kingdom; and rightly considering that the opinions of the people are regulated in a great measure by the determinations of the parliament, he was not satisfied with the bare refusal of the lords to censure the measure of taking the Hanoverian troops into pay, unless they also came to a resolution which might imply a full and unlimited approbation of that measure; and therefore, by his procurement, a motion was made (after the conclusion of the debate upon earl Stanhope's motion) by the earl of Scarborough, that an address should be presented to his majesty, importing, That in the unsettled and dangerous situation of affairs in Europe, the sending a considerable body of British forces into the Austrian Netherlands, and augmenting the same with sixteen thousand of his majesty's electoral troops, and the the Hessians in the British pay; and thereby, in conjunction with the queen of Hungary's troops in the Low Countries, forming a great army for the service of the common cause; was a wise, useful, and necessary measure, tending to the support and encouragement of his majesty's allies, the real and effectual assistance of the queen of Hungary, and the restoring and maintaining the balance of power in Europe. This motion occasioned a violent debate; but in the end it was carried by the court party, seventy-eight against thirty-five.

The ministry, however, had a very severe opposition to encounter, in their endeavours to carry a bill for repealing certain duties on spirituous liquors, and licences for retailing those liquors, and imposing others at an easier rate. This, it must be confessed, was a dangerous expedient; but the ministry could not at that time fall upon any other feasible method of producing the sums that had been granted to the government: besides, experience had shewn that the public revenue had not been in the least advantaged by the late imposed severe duties, nor the health or morals of the people any wise mended. A motion was therefore made to resolve, That the duty of twenty shillings per gallon upon spirituous liquors should be discontinued; and that, towards raising the supplies granted to his majesty, there should be paid for every gallon of low wines, and spirits of the first extraction, made or drawn from any foreign or imported materials, six-pence over and above all other duties charged or chargeable on those liquors. This bill made its way through the commons with very little opposition, but among the peers it produced the most obstinate dispute which had happened since the beginning of the parliament.

The lord Hervey had lately been divested of his post of privy-seal, which had been bestowed upon lord Gower, and these two noblemen from that instant exchanged principles: the first commenced the splenetic patriot, opposing every measure indiscriminately that was adopted by the ministry; the other as obsequiously falling in with and supporting them. Lord Hervey on this occasion made a florid harangue upon the pernicious effects of that destructive liquor they were about to let loose on their fellow-creatures. The archbishop of Canterbury, with several other prelates, expatiated on the same topic, who were joined by the duke of Bedford, the earls of Aylesford, Sandwich, and Chesterfield, and the lords Lonsdale and Talbot. The duke of Newcastle, the earls of Ilay, Cholmondeley, and Bath, with the lords Carteret and Bathurst, were numbered among its advocates, and shrewd arguments were advanced on both sides of the question; in the course of which there frequently appeared some brilliant sallies of wit and humour. After very long, animated, and repeated debates, the bill passed without amendments, though the whole bench of bishops voted against it. Experience has since shewn, that this measure has not been attended with the dismal consequences that were predicted by the lords in the opposition.

The minority in both houses were now convinced that the ministry this session had too much influence to be retarded in their measures. More provoked, however, than discouraged by their defeat, they resolved to tease those in power with every motion they thought would prove most disagreeable to them. The first was, to make an enquiry into the contract for the remittance of the money abroad necessary for the public service; but this was over-ruled. The next was, to address his majesty to order the proper officer to lay before the house (of commons) copies of all the memorials, representations, and declarations, together with the answers that had passed between the courts of London and Vienna, relating to the state of the war in the empire, for the interest and support of the house of Austria, from the first of September, 1741, to the sixteenth of November, 1742.

The promoters and advocates of this motion urged in its favour, that nothing could be more reasonable than that the parliament should be made acquainted with all the particulars of an affair, for the support of which they had granted such immense sums of money. To this the friends of the minister replied, with great appearance of justice, that if this motion should pass, no court in Europe could be safe in their political dealings with us. They affirmed, that the transactions between two courts might be, and generally were, of such a nature, that were they to be published, the whole operations depending upon them might be defeated; and consequently, that nothing could be more prejudicial to the queen of Hungary than the agreeing to such a motion; and as success was the best proof of prudence, the present crisis was so favourable to that princess, that it ought to entitle the ministry to the thanks of the house, rather than subject them to any invidious enquiry into their conduct. For these, and other reasons of the like nature, the motion was rejected by a considerable majority.

The last motion was to address his majesty, that he would be pleased to communicate to the house copies of all the letters and memorials which had passed between the courts of London and Berlin, relating to any auxiliary or foreign forces entering into Germany in support of the queen of Hungary.

This motion appears to have been founded upon very wise, reasonable, and equitable considerations. The king of Prussia had expressed great uneasiness at the situation of affairs in Germany, where the emperor, he said, was on the point of being dethroned. The queen of Hungary was mistress of his dominions; and in all appearance a total revolution of the German system was about to take place. His Prussian majesty frankly declared, that notwithstanding the treaty of Breslaw, he could not be an indifferent spectator of such cruel degradations of the imperial dignity, which, as an elector of the empire, he was bound to support. He hinted at the same time, that, as a German sovereign, he could wish that the government of England would not think of sending their arms into Germany, because he could not behold the introduction of foreign troops into that country without the greatest jealousy and disgust. The question, however, upon a division, was rejected by a majority of eighteen voices.

No other material transaction passed in either house this session; for on the twenty-first day of April, 1743, his majesty went to the house, where, after passing the several acts ready for the royal assent, he made a speech to both houses, in which he observed, "That, to the end that the British nation and the common cause might reap the most beneficial fruits from the vigorous resolutions of his parliament, he had, at the requisition of the queen of Hungary, ordered his army, in conjunction with the Austrian troops, to pass the Rhine, as auxiliaries to her Hungarian majesty, to oppose any dangerous measures that might affect the balance and liberties of Europe, or hinder the re-establishment of public tranquillity upon just and solid foundations: that he had continued a strong squadron in the Mediterranean, and another in the West Indies, in order to prosecute the great work of distressing his enemies the Spaniards, and compelling them to accept of safe and honourable terms of peace, as well as of maintaining the rights of navigation and commerce belonging to his subjects; adding, that from the former of these squadrons his allies in Italy had found, and still continued to receive, a most useful and advantageous support." The lord-chancellor then, by his majesty's order, prorogued the parliament.

The affairs of Europe were at this time in a very perplexed and complicated situation. All the provinces, from the heart of Silesia to the extremity of Italy, experienced different reverses of fortune. Austria was at this time at open war only with Bavaria; the queen of Hungary depended for support on the king of England; and Charles VII. upon his most Christian majesty: yet neither Great Britain nor France had hitherto acted as principals in the war. Her Hungarian majesty and the king of Sardinia had mutual claims upon each other, which would soon have effected a rupture between them, had they not been bound together by their common dread of the house of Bourbon. Naples, Florence, Geneva, and Rome, were neuter. The people of the Milanese, of Mantua, of Parma, of Modena, and Guastalla, long accustomed to be the prey of the conqueror, without daring to vote either for or against him, beheld with an impotent concern the frequent shocks they were exposed to. Spain, who was a principal in the war against England, risked every thing in order to procure a sovereignty in the heart of Italy for the son of her ambitious queen. The court of Spain had demanded of the states of Switzerland a passage through their territories for some troops they were going to send into Italy, and were refused. The Swiss nation is ever ready to lend out its soldiers to any prince who is ready to hire them; but they will suffer the troops of no potentate to enter their territories: the government is pacific, and the people warriors: hence their neutrality is always respected. To give a proper weight to her's, Venice levied twenty thousand men.

All Germany seemed to behold with indifference the quarrel between Austria and Bavaria: even the elector of Cologne did not dare to take the part of his brother, who was emperor, fearing the fate of the duke of Modena. If Hanover took part in the quarrel, it was only as a country subject to the king of England, and her soldiers were paid by that crown. The German princes themselves, although their troops were let out as mercenaries, were yet regarded as neutrals.

England was more urgent with Holland than ever to declare war, and France laboured hard to prevent it. The marquis de Fenelon, the French ambassador at the Hague, had employed all his address in persuading the Dutch to declare themselves neuter: but the English, with the prince of Orange at their head, prevailed so far, that in July of the preceding year their High Mightinesses were brought to agree to a proposition of putting forty thousand foot and five thousand horse into a proper condition for marching on the first notice. This vigorous resolution was in some measure owing to the spirited conduct of a young gentleman named Van Haren, one of the deputies, who exerted himself with great zeal and activity in support of the common cause. He composed some allegorical pieces to animate his nation against the king of France. These pieces were full of beautiful strokes of writing: the author knew well how to enrich his language, and to give it an harmonious turn, which it greatly wanted. He compared the ancient state of Greece to that of Holland, at this time overawed by the French, as the Greeks had been by the Persians and Macedonians. His style, though sublime and allegorical, was adapted to the understandings of the people, because it was natural, and the allegory clear. They were read by the Dutch of all denominations: they were recited publicly after divine service in the most frequented parts of towns, and even in the little villages; and those who read them in public were handsomely rewarded by the auditors, as had been formerly the case with those who pronounced Homer's pieces in public: in fine, these writings excited such a spirit among the people, that the States-general found themselves under a necessity of adopting still more resolute measures. The friends of the house of Orange began to exert themselves: the states of Groningen and West Friesland protested in favour of the prince against the promotion of foreign generals which was made in consequence of the resolution of the States general to augment their forces by sea and land; in the distribution of which promotions, they made the prince but a lieutenant-general, which he rejected with indignation.

The French court had expected to bring over the new empress of Russia, Elizabeth, to their measures; but they found her not disposed to listen to their offers. She remitted a considerable sum of money to the queen of Hungary, and at the same time congratulated the elector of Bavaria on his election to the imperial throne. She had declared her nephew, the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, her successor, by the title of grand prince of all the Russias.

The king of Sweden being of an advanced age, the diet assembled in order to settle the succession; and the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, as grandson to the eldest sister of Charles XII. was declared next heir to the crown; but understanding that he had embraced the Greek religion, and had been acknowledged successor to the throne of Russia, they annulled his election for Sweden.

The king of Prussia, though surrounded by the tumults of war, was cultivating in his own dominions the arts of peace, but still with such vigilance and attention as kept him always prepared for action.

In this critical situation were all the European powers in the beginning of the year 1743, when cardinal de Fleury departed this life at the age of eighty-nine. In him France lost an able minister, who had for many years managed the affairs of that

that kingdom. He was always a friend to pacific measures: he endeavoured to accomplish his purposes, by raising and fomenting intrigues at foreign courts; but the French to this day accuse him of having been too neglectful of the military glory of France, and of having suffered her marine to be almost annihilated. No sooner, however, were the cardinal's eyes closed, than Lewis XV. took the reins of government into his own hands, declaring he was ready to accept of an honourable peace, or to prosecute the war with vigour: and as he expected the allied army in Flanders would march into Germany, and act offensively, he resolved to assemble a numerous force to oppose them; and ordered the marshal de Noailles, one of his best generals, to post himself on the banks of the Rhine with an army of eighty thousand men, and on the approach of the English and their allies to march out against them.

His Britannic majesty had repeatedly plighted his faith for the support of the pragmatic sanction. Urged by this consideration, he resolved in the course of the ensuing campaign to head his troops in person. Accordingly, immediately upon the prorogation of the parliament, he set out for Germany, accompanied by his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, the lord Carteret, and other persons of distinction, and arrived at Hanover on the sixth of May, his majesty, before his departure from England, having thought proper to make a grand promotion of general officers, as also to appoint a regency for the government of the kingdom during his absence, consisting of the following persons; his grace the lord archbishop of Canterbury; the lord chancellor; the dukes of Grafton, Dorset, Devon, Newcastle, Bolton, Montagu, and Richmond; the marquis of Tweeddale, secretary of state for Scotland; the earls of Harrington, Bath, Wilmington, Pembroke, Winchelsea, and Illy; lord Gower, lord Carteret, and Henry Pelham, esq.

At this period the queen of Hungary, who at the beginning of the last campaign seemed devoted to inevitable destruction, now appeared to triumph over all her enemies. The French were driven out of Bohemia and part of the Upper Palatinate; and the Bavarian and French forces being divided into too many separate bodies, mouldered away by degrees. The mortality which got footing among the French troops in Bavaria was the beginning of their misfortunes. The French soldiers spent the latter end of the year 1742, and the beginning of 1743, crowded upon each other in German stoves, which alone destroyed them in great numbers; but that which was their greatest bane, was a misunderstanding between marshal Broglie and count Seckendorff, who then commanded the Bavarians: the latter, who acted under the emperor, was urgent with Broglie to send him reinforcements, which the marshal constantly refused, alleging, that he had enough to do, with all the forces he could muster, to make head against prince Lobkowitz, who having taken possession of Prague, proceeded to Egra, which he immediately invested, though without success.

By this time the campaign had been opened between the several parties engaged in the war. The emperor had exerted himself with great activity in recruiting his army; and having assembled a body of about twenty thousand men, he pitched his camp at Lembach, in the neighbourhood of Brenau; while prince Charles of Lorraine, assuming the command of the Austrian troops in Bavaria, advanced against his Imperial majesty, and attacked him with great fury in his entrenchments. The Imperialists continued for some time to make a most desperate resistance; but about five thousand of them being killed on the spot, and a great number taken prisoners, they were at last obliged to abandon the camp, with all their baggage and artillery, to the victors. The remains of the defeated army retired to Brenau, and all Bavaria was soon laid open to the incursions of the Austrians, there being nothing now to oppose the progress of prince Charles, who took Dingelsing, Deckendorff, and Landshut, upon the Isser, making a great number of prisoners every-where. The emperor saw himself once more forced to abandon his dominions, and shelter himself in Augsburg, an imperial town; but he did not remain there long, the approach of the famous partisan Mentzel, at the head of a strong body of Pandours, obliging him to retire for shelter to Franckfort. This rapid course of military events fell out in the months of May and June.

Prince Charles, flushed with victory and success, advanced to the banks of the Danube, where the French marshal Broglie was posted, whom he obliged to quit his strong camp at Pladling, and retire to Ratisbon, and from thence to Ingoldstadt. In this retreat the French suffered greatly from the Austrian hussars and Irregulars, who hovered continually on their flanks and rear, cut off a great number of their men, and took a booty amounting to upwards of a million of florins.

Mean while, the campaign was equally vigorous and active in other quarters. As his Britannic majesty had promised the queen of Hungary to order his troops into Germany, in pursuance of his engagement, the British forces commanded by field-marshal earl of Stair began their march thither in the month of February, and on the nineteenth of May passed by the town of Aix-la-Chapelle, where they were joined by the Hanoverians in the pay of England. They were likewise in expectation of being soon reinforced by another body of six thousand troops belonging to that electorate, as well as by the Hessians in the service of Great Britain. As Franckfort was a neutral city, marshal Stair, before he approached its neighbourhood, sent a message to the emperor, who then resided in that city, to assure his Imperial majesty, "That nothing farther was intended by the march of the British troops into Germany than to restore the public peace and tranquillity: that his Britannic majesty, upon appointing him to the command of them, had expressly charged him to avoid every thing that might in the least injure the dignity of the head of the empire: and that therefore his Imperial majesty might assure himself, that the march of these troops should be directed in such a manner as not to disturb his residence at Frankfort." At the same time, the marshal caused it to be notified to the neighbouring princes and imperial towns, that he had no orders to act against the emperor, but only to oblige the French to leave Germany. In return, these several states, and the regency of Frankfort in particular, expressed their intention to observe a strict neutrality. The emperor, however, thinking it somewhat unsafe to remain in a neutral neutral city, retired to Munich, in company with the prince royal his son, and did not return till he was compelled to it, by the loss of his hereditary dominions, as above related.

The Dutch having at length consented to join the allied army with twenty thousand men, believing also that now they could take such a step without any hazard, and that without declaring war against France, they might help to crush her; they sent six thousand men into Flanders to replace the Austrian garrisons, and proposed to send an army of fourteen thousand men into Germany; but they proceeded, in the true spirit of that republic, very slowly.

In the mean time, the army of the allies continued their march along the banks of the Rhine till the beginning of May, when they began to assemble near Hœchst, on the borders of the Mayne, where proper ground was laid out for their encampment. The Austrians under the command of marshal Neuperg and the duke d'Aremberg arrived about the same time, and encamped on the right, at a league distance from the British troops; and the Hanoverians under lieutenant-general Blton coming up soon after, encamped on the left, marshal Stair taking up his quarters at Hœchst, which was about the center of the whole. The army of the allies, after making allowance for all deductions, was supposed to consist of about thirty-seven thousand men.

The court of Versailles expected these motions of the allied army, and had been making preparations to obstruct their junction with the Austrians in Bavaria. No sooner, therefore, had the allies passed the Rhine, than marshal Noailles, at the head of eighty thousand men, entered the Palatinate; and after detaching count Segur to reinforce Broglie, advanced towards the Rhine, where he seized Spire, Worms, Oppenheim, and all the places on that side the river above Mentz, as also the city of Heidelberg on the Neckar; but was disappointed in his attempt to surprize Hailbron, a well fortified town on the same river, by the vigilance of the garrison. The French made no attempt to pass the Rhine till the fourteenth of May, when they crossed that river, and by a variety of marches and counter-marches, reduced the allies to great straits for want of provisions: they even endeavoured to make themselves masters of Aschaffenburg, where there was a bridge over the Mayne; but the earl of Stair had the good fortune to prevent them in that enterprize.

On the nineteenth day of June his Britannic majesty, attended by his royal highness the duke of Cumberland and lord Carteret, arrived in the camp of the allies, where he was received with the most joyful acclamations by the army, which he reviewed the same afternoon, and that evening took up his head quarters at the palace of Aschaffenburg, belonging to the elector of Mentz.

The French had possessed themselves of all the upper posts upon the Mayne: the boats below, obstructed at once by the enemy's hussars and the rapidity of the stream, were unable to come up with provisions; and thus the allies, by a concurrence of untoward circumstances, were surrounded on all hands by a superior army, commanded by a cautious and vigilant general, who had taken his measures so wisely, that nothing appeared left for the confederates but to surrender prisoners of war, or run the risk of being cut in pieces in their retreat. While the allies were in this disadvantageous situation, short of provisions, unable to procure forage, and almost surrounded by the French, couriers arrived from prince Charles, with intelligence of his successes in Bavaria; and at the same time advice was brought, that the six thousand Hanoverians and six thousand Hessians, which his Britannic majesty furnished in his electoral capacity, and were now upon their route to reinforce the allied army, had effected a junction, and were within two days march of Hanover, under the command of prince George of Hesse-Cassel and general Druchleben, who wanted to know by what means they could conduct them to the confederates. As the French commanded the lower part of the Mayne, it was apprehended if the prince of Hesse attempted to advance beyond Hanau, he might be intercepted; and as it was absolutely necessary to accomplish the junction between him and the main body of the confederates, his Britannic majesty took a resolution of marching the army back again to Hanau, and sent orders to the prince of Hesse to halt at that city; but in this case his majesty found he must be exposed to the fire of the batteries which the enemy had raised upon the Mayne. His rear was likewise in danger of being cut off by the French; for marshal de Noailles had taken the precaution to throw bridges over the river between Dettingen and Aschaffenburg, on the road to Hanau, which, by an unaccountable neglect, the allies had suffered him to do without interruption. On the twenty-sixth of June the king caused his army to decamp before daylight without beat of drum, and ventured upon a most dangerous march, which indeed by no means could be avoided.

The road the allied army was to take was bounded by hills and woods on the right, and flanked on the left by the river Mayne, on the opposite side of which the French marshal was encamped, who was no sooner informed that our troops were in motion, than he declared they were marching to their destruction. He immediately caused thirty squadrons, consisting of the French household troops, dragoons, and light horse, to cross the river, and advance towards the village of Dettingen, by which the English must necessarily pass. Four brigades of infantry, with that of the French guards, were marched over two bridges, with orders to remain in the village of Dettingen, on one side of a hollow way, where they could not be perceived by our troops, of all whose motions marshal Noailles had a clear view, and gave express orders for his men not to fall upon the allies but at a certain advantage, as the very situation of the ground was a snare from which they could not escape. The enemy had before them a narrow pass; the village of Dettingen was on their right, a wood on their left, and a morass in their center. M. Noailles earnestly recommended to his nephew, the duke of Grammont, who commanded the troops sent to oppose the march of the confederates, to wait in that position till the latter should fall into his hands, which was unavoidable. In the mean time, he sent five brigades to secure the post of Aschaffenburg, which his Britannic majesty had just quitted, who by this motion found himself surrounded on all sides, and reduced to the melancholy alternative of submitting at discretion, or fighting at very great disadvantage.

All

All these wise dispositions of the marshal were, however, disconcerted by the mad fierceness of temper of the duke de Grammont, who imagining that the first column of the allies had already passed, and that he had only to fall upon their rear, which could not withstand him, quitted the very advantageous post he occupied, which he ought by all means to have kept, and advanced to give the confederates battle on an accessible ground, where his whole front was exposed. The latter, who were filing off in order of battle, soon formed; and the French now fell into the very snare they had laid for the confederates, whom they attacked in disorder, and with unequal force. The cannon which the enemy had planted on the other side of the Mayne raked us in flank, and killed a great number of our men, the Hanoverians especially; but our batteries took the French in front. The advantage of cannon, which is very great, was soon overbalanced, the artillery on the opposite side of the river being rendered useless, as in the confusion it must have annoyed the French themselves, if it had been properly served.

Marshal Noailles, who had continued on the other side the river, that he might the better observe the disposition of both armies, when he understood that the duke de Grammont had passed the defile, exclaimed in a violent passion, that he had ruined his whole scheme; and when he found the fatal event resulting from the temerity of this officer, he passed over the Mayne to assist him; but it was too late: for the French having charged with a mad impetuosity, which at first put some regiments of British cavalry into disorder, continued running on with so little discipline and regularity, and the infantry of the allies behaved with so much intrepidity and deliberation, under the eye of their sovereign, that the fate of the day was soon determined in favour of that army, which a few hours before seemed devoted to unavoidable destruction.

During the whole of the engagement, his Britannic majesty rode up and down the ranks flourishing his sword, and crying out to the British infantry, "Now boys! now for the honour of England! fire! advance boldly, and the French will soon run." The event fulfilled his prediction. The battle began about twelve o'clock, and about two in the afternoon the French gave way, and passed a rivulet which was behind them, where they again posted themselves in order of battle, upon an eminence commanding the plain: but notwithstanding this advantageous disposition, on a body of three thousand English cavalry marching up towards them, they abandoned that post, and retreated over the Mayne with such precipitation and confusion, that several perished in the river, which they had so lately crossed with all the pride of certain victory. It has been thought by several experienced commanders, that had the enemy been vigorously pursued, before they recollected themselves from their first confusion, it is more than probable they would have sustained a total overthrow. The earl of Stair proposed this measure, but his advice was over-ruled.

Thus ended this memorable engagement, in which the French lost about five thousand men, either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners, and amongst them most of their generals and officers of distinction, as also six standards. The loss of the allies in this action amounted to near three thousand: the chief officers killed on our side were lieutenant-general Clayton, who was shot by a random ball as the French were retreating; and major-general Monroy, of the Hanoverians. Among the wounded were the duke of Cumberland, who behaved very gallantly, and received a shot in the leg; the duke d'Arenberg, the earl of Albemarle, major-general Huske, colonel Ligonier, and colonel Piers.

Immediately after the action, his majesty continued his march to Hanau, where he was joined by the twelve thousand Hessians and Hanoverians. Before the allies left the field of battle, the earl of Stair sent a trumpet to marshal Noailles, recommending to his protection the wounded that were left behind: and it is but doing justice to the French general to observe, that he treated them with the utmost care and tenderness. A general thanksgiving was performed on the twenty-fourth of June by the whole confederate army at Hanau, on account of the late battle. The French also sung Te Deum on the same occasion; and assembling all their forces, afterwards removed their camp to Offenbach, a town on the south side of the Mayne, at an equal distance between Hanau and Frankfort, and directly in sight of the confederates.

While the two armies continued in this situation, prince Charles of Lorraine accomplished his work in Bavaria, and obliged marshal Broglie to retire before him through Suabia, who repassed the Rhine on the borders of Alsace with much precipitation about the end of June, at the same time nearly that the emperor, believing himself no longer safe in Augsburg, had returned to take shelter in Frankfort, where he arrived the very evening of that day on which the battle of Dettingen was fought. As Frankfort was a neutral town, the officers of the French and allied armies repaired thither indiscriminately after the action, and M. Noailles found the emperor infinitely chagrined, on account of marshal Broglie's retreat; and to augment his misfortunes, he was without subsistence for himself and his family, in an imperial town, where no one would advance him any money, though the head of the empire. M. Noailles on this occasion furnished him with forty thousand crowns upon a letter of credit.

The two armies continued on different sides of the river Mayne till the twelfth day of July, when M. Noailles, receiving intelligence that prince Charles of Lorraine was bending his march towards the confederate army, in order to put him between two fires, and that his highness was actually advanced as far as Heidelberg, the capital city of the elector-palatine, situate on the Neckar, and not above forty miles from Frankfort; he resolved to prevent his design, by decamping on the twentieth at night, after setting fire to his magazines; and made so speedy a retreat, that in four days the whole French army repassed the Rhine, between Worms and Oppenheim. His Britannic majesty was visited by prince Charles and count Khevenhuller at Hanau, where the future operations of the campaign were concerted.

In the mean time, his Imperial majesty, wearied out with a destructive war, relenting for the calamities he had brought upon his electoral subjects, deprived of the means of supporting his august dignity; and above all, finding that he could expect no other assistance from the French, now made advances towards an accommodation with the queen of Hungary, and ordered his general count Seckendorf, to enter into a treaty of neutrality in his name with prince Charles of Lorraine. Accordingly, the general had an interview with count Khevenhuller, deputed from prince Charles, at the convent of Lower Sconfield, near Rain, where a convention was signed on the thirtieth of June, importing, that the emperor should remain neuter during the continuance of the present war; and that his troops should be quartered in Franconia: that the queen of Hungary should keep possession of Bavaria till the peace: that Brenau and Scharding should be delivered up to the Austrians: that the French garrison of Ingoldstadt should be permitted to withdraw, and be replaced by Bavarians; but that the Austrian general should be put in possession of all the artillery, magazines, and warlike stores, belonging to the French, which should be found in the place.

When this treaty of Hanau was sent to London for ratification, the lords justices thought proper to annul it, owing to the representations of the queen of Hungary, who insisted that the elector of Bavaria could not be considered as a neutral party in his own cause, and that this treaty was only intended to deprive her of the assistance of her allies. His Imperial majesty, still panting after peace, offered to allow the strong towns in Bavaria to be garrisoned by neutral troops, and to renounce all pretensions to the Austrian succession: nay, he even offered to give his daughter in marriage to the archduke, who was then three years of age, and to secure the imperial dignity in reversion to the house of Austria, by procuring the young archduke to be elected king of the Romans; and that he would abide by the judgment of the maritime powers, on the single condition of obtaining a restitution of his hereditary dominions, even with the mortifying restriction of leaving all the fortified towns in the possession of neutral troops. But all these considerable offers, though not immediately rejected, terminated without any effect, being evaded by the excuses of dispatching couriers, and such-like pretences, till the conclusion of the treaty of Worms in September following; after which not a single step was taken towards an accommodation, this last treaty establishing the future violence of the war, in opposition to the pacific propositions made at Hanau, when the war in Germany might certainly have been as satisfactorily terminated to all the contending parties, as it was after the loss of so many thousands of lives. In fact, several princes of the Germanic body began to resent the inflexibility of the queen of Hungary, and to be alarmed at the success of the house of Austria, and pitied the desperate situation of the emperor, who now experienced every possible stroke of ill fortune; for while the above treaty was agitating, Egra and Ingoldstadt, the only towns that were left him after the retreat of Broglie, were reduced by the Austrians. In Ingoldstadt they found all the emperor's domestic treasure, plate, jewels, pictures, cabinets, and curiosities, with the archives of the house of Bavaria, the most valuable effects belonging to the nobility of that electorate, a prodigious train of artillery, and a vast quantity of provisions, arms, and ammunition. To increase the mortifications of this wretched head of the empire, if they could be said to admit of addition, his old friend the elector of Mentz was dead, and his successor was an avowed supporter of the Austrian interests. Not contented with the insults they had already offered him, the council of Austria presented to the imperial diet, even in the town of Frankfort, a rescript, wherein the election of Charles VII. was protested against as null and absolutely void. The new elector of Mentz, in his quality of high-chancellor of the empire, to which dignity he had been advanced against the emperor's inclination, registered this protest in the protocol or journal of the diet. Charles could only complain, which he did by written remonstrances, that produced a warm dispute among the members of the Germanic body.

The king of Prussia in particular, who had backed the imperial negotiations with the strongest remonstrances, finding the treaty of Worms had abolished all pacific sentiments at the court of Vienna, and willing to shew his influence in Europe, had an interview on the thirtieth of September with general Seckendorff at Anspach, and from thence proceeded privately to Frankfort, where he had a conference with the emperor. This tour at that time occasioned various speculations: however, the nature of these conferences may be easily conjectured, from his future conduct in opposing the queen of Hungary, and by his protesting against the investiture of the duchy of Saxe-Lauenburgh, claimed by the king of Great Britain as elector of Hanover, which afterwards gave rise to a difference between them.

On the twenty-fourth day of August the allied army passed the Rhine at Mentz, and king George fixed his head-quarters in the episcopal palace of Worms; the French marshal Noailles having retreated into Upper Alsace, where he took possession of the lines of Lauterburg, formerly cast up by the Germans to defend their frontiers. The allies continued encamped about Worms till the latter end of September, when they advanced to Spire, where they were joined by twenty thousand Dutch auxiliaries from the Netherlands. Continuing their operations, they took possession of Gimmersheim, and demolished the lines which the enemy had formed on the Queich: then they returned to Mentz, and in October were distributed into winter quarters. While the allies lay at Worms, colonel Mentzel, at the head of a large body of Croats and Pandours, belonging to the queen of Hungary, made an irruption into a part of Lorraine, which they ravaged without mercy.

In September prince Charles with the Austrian army entered the Brisgau, and attempted to pass the Rhine; but marshal Coigny, who commanded a French army in that neighbourhood, appearing on the opposite banks of the river, with a body of fifty thousand men, he was obliged to desist from his design; and returning into the Upper Palatinate, quartered his troops in that country, and in Bavaria.

By this time the earl of Stair had solicited and obtained leave to resign his command. His lordship appears to have been disgusted at a supposed preference which the king shewed to the foreign generals in the service of Great Britain: and this report gained so much ground among the people of England, as greatly to lessen the satisfaction they they would otherwise have received from the glorious action of Dettingen, and, perhaps, their demonstrations of gratitude towards their sovereign, who by his distinguished bravery had been so eminently instrumental in the success of that day. In the latter end of October the king of Great Britain returned to Hanover, and the army separated; the troops in the British pay marched back to the Netherlands, the rest took the route to their respective countries.

In the month of September a treaty had been concluded at Worms, between his Britannic majesty, the king of Sardinia, and the queen of Hungary; by which the latter of these sovereigns engaged to maintain thirty thousand men in Italy. The king of Sardinia obliged himself to maintain forty thousand infantry, and fifty thousand horse, on condition of his having the command of this combined army, and receiving an annual subsidy of two hundred thousand pounds from Great Britain. As a further gratification, her Hungarian majesty yielded to the king of Sardinia the city of Placentia, with several districts in the duchy of Pavia, and in the Novarese, and all her rights and pretensions to Final, at present possessed by the republic of Genoa, which, they supposed, would make no difficulty to relinquish it, upon being repaid the purchase-money, amounting to three hundred thousand pounds. This sum his Britannic majesty promised to disburse; and, moreover, to maintain a strong squadron in the Mediterranean, the commander of which should be ordered to act in strict concert with his Sardinian majesty. Lastly, the contracting powers agreed that Final should be constituted a free port, like that of Leghorn.

This treaty, which was ratified by the regency at London, as soon as it could be transmitted thither, exposed the British minister (lord Carteret) who conducted it, to great blame and censure. It was represented as a violation of common justice, since the Genoese were hereby negotiated out of their property, they having purchased the marquisate of Final of the late emperor, for a valuable consideration; and the purchase had been guaranteed by Great Britain. Besides, they were further injured by the condition of its being made a free port, which could not fail of prejudicing their commerce upon the Mediterranean. The Genoese themselves seemed so sensible of the hard measure that had been dealt them by this latter article particularly, that they made strong remonstrances against it at the courts of London, Vienna, and Turin; and as little or no regard was paid to their representations, they threw themselves into the arms of Spain and France for protection.

The good understanding between the Czarina and the queen of Hungary was destroyed in the course of this year, in consequence of a conspiracy that had been detected by the court of Petersburg, for removing the empress Elizabeth and recalling the princess Anne to the government; in which conspiracy the marquis de Botta, who had resided at the court of the Czarina, was suspected of having been concerned. The empress demanded satisfaction of her Hungarian majesty for the ill-conduct of her minister. The queen appointed commissioners to enquire into his conduct; by whom he was acquitted, to the great displeasure of the empress of Russia, who highly resented that the court of Vienna should require any other proof of the marquis's guilt than her asseveration. We must not forget, that a treaty of alliance was this year concluded between the Czarina and the king of Great Britain.

Let us now take a view of the campaign in Italy, which proved very unfavourable to the Spaniards.

His Sardinian majesty on the close of the last year had been dispossessed of the whole duchy of Savoy, when the Spanish Infant took up his winter residence in Chamberry, while the king of Sardinia was obliged to retire to his Piedmontese dominions. During the severity of the winter nothing was attempted on either side. In the spring of the year 1743, his Sardinian majesty had assembled an army of forty thousand men; but though he was greatly superior to the Spaniards, he continued inactive; and the Spaniards in Savoy waited in expectation of a reinforcement from their court. But though the Spaniards were quiet on the side of Savoy, the Spanish queen, who lived only for the aggrandizement of her family, prevailed on her uxorious consort, to send his general count de Gages a peremptory command, to attack without delay, the Austrians and Piedmontese under count Traun and count Aspremont, in the ecclesiastical territories. This was accordingly done, without attending to the prior representations of the count, who had sent repeated advices to the Spanish ministry, of his army having been so much reduced by sickness, death, and desertion, as not to muster above twenty-eight thousand men, out of forty thousand men that the duke of Montemar had left when he resigned his command to him.

The royal command, however, was too absolute to leave de Gages aught but compliance. Accordingly, he privately passed the Panaro in the beginning of February, and made himself master of Campo Santo and Final. On the eighth of February the count offered the Austrians and Piedmontese battle, which was accepted by them. The two armies were nearly equal, and a most obstinate and bloody engagement ensued, which, however, was far from proving decisive. The Spaniards lost about four thousand men, killed, wounded, and taken; among whom were the duke de Arcos, and three other generals. The confederates did not suffer quite so much; if we except the loss of one of their principal generals, count de Aspremont, who died of his wounds soon after the action. Some colours and cannon were taken on both sides; and each sung Te Deum for the victory.

Count de Gages, however, finding his army to diminish daily, and, having received advice that count Traun had been reinforced by seven thousand men, repassed the Panaro, retreated suddenly out of the Bolognese, and marched to Rimini, in the ecclesiastical state, where he fortified himself in a very advantageous camp. Before he quitted the Bolognese, he had, by several different expresses, warmly solicited his Sicilian majesty, to assist him with a body of Neapolitan forces; but that prince, though undoubtedly inclined to give assistance to the Spaniards, was so overawed by the proximity of the British fleet, that he durst not venture on such a step.

After this engagement, the Austrians remained wholly inactive in the Modenese, till the month of September; when count Traun, whose age now rendered rendered him little able to support the fatigues of a winter campaign, solicited, and obtained leave of her Hungarian majesty to resign the command, and prince Lobkowitz was ordered to succeed him. This general, immediately on his arrival at the army, determined to enter upon action: accordingly, on the twenty-fourth of September he suddenly decamped, and advanced towards count de Gages; who with his forces being reduced, by the united calamities of famine and desertion, to not more than seven thousand men, retreated precipitately to Fano, a sea-port town in the gulph of Venice. Here, however, the Spanish general seemed determined to wait for the enemy; as such precautions had been taken, that the Austrians could make but little use of their cavalry, in which their superiority chiefly consisted. In the mean time, the count repossessed himself of Pesaro, and began to fortify all the passes of the Foglia, in order to dispute the passage of that river: but prince Lobkowitz knowing that the Spaniards would venture any engagement, to extricate themselves out of so miserable a country; and that the severity of the approaching winter must greatly diminish their numbers, when they would be obliged to fly before him, without hazarding a stroke; thought it most adviseable to discontinue his pursuit for the present; and put his troops into winter quarters about the middle of October.

The season was far advanced before the Spanish troops, commanded by Don Philip, entered upon action, the French court having spent the summer chiefly in negotiations to draw off the king of Sardinia from the alliance; but finding that expedient fail, they at length sent the prince of Conti, at the head of twelve thousand men, to reinforce the Spaniards in Savoy, and force a passage into Piedmont, which the marquis de las Minas had unsuccessfully attempted, with the loss of three thousand men. A body of four thousand Spaniards were also sent from Catalonia to join the young infant's army. In the mean time, the king of Sardinia had entered Savoy with forty thousand men; upon which the young Spanish prince and the marquis de las Minas abandoned Chamberry on the twenty-second of August, and defiled through Dauphiné towards Briançon, thirty-six miles distant from Turin, where they were joined by the Spaniards and the French auxiliaries, when the whole army consisted of fifty-six thousand men. Here they continued some time, to give the French army leisure to recruit from the fatigue of their long march, as well as to concert the future operations of the campaign; and notwithstanding the advanced season, the prince de Conti, who was brave, fond of arms, and of an enterprising disposition, persuaded the marquis de las Minas to concur with him in a resolution to attempt forcing the Piedmontese lines at Chateau-Dauphiné. This important post had been reinforced by the king of Sardinia and admiral Matthews; which latter had landed eight hundred men, and a great number of cannon, from his squadron at Villa Franca, to secure it as much as possible from the vigorous attack expected from the enemy.

The French and Spanish generals decamped from Briançon on the twenty-eighth of September, and arriving on the confines of Dauphiné early in the morning on the first of October, they made a warm attack upon the Piedmontese, who receiving them as warmly, obliged the assailants to retire with the loss of eight hundred men. Nevertheless, they renewed the attack eight days successively, but were always defeated, and at length obliged to quit their enterprize with very considerable loss, and retire to Chamberry; but the French made good their winter quarters in Dauphiné and Provence, and the Spaniards maintained their footing in Savoy.

Our naval armaments in the Mediterranean continued in the same situation as at the conclusion of the preceding year, admiral Matthews continuing still at the isles of Hieres, to prevent the French and Spanish fleets from coming out of Toulon, which, as it was of the highest consequence to their affairs in Italy, it was apprehended they would speedily attempt. In fact, the Spaniards had for some time been particularly earnest with the court of France to afford them a more effectual assistance than it had done for some time; and the French being at length determined to come to an open rupture with us, the courts of Versailles and Madrid came to an agreement, that M. de Court, the French admiral, who was blocked up with admiral Navarro in Toulon, should be now joined by the French ships that were fitting out in that harbour; that in the mean time a squadron should be equipped at Brest, to intercept the squadron which was on the point of sailing for the Mediterranean to reinforce the British fleet there; and that at the same time orders should be sent to the combined fleets to put to sea from Toulon, and fight Matthews. Of this design, however, the British admiral got intelligence, by intercepted letters, which he transmitted to the ministry in England, accompanied with the most pressing solicitations to supply him with fresh ships, those he had with him being so foul, and otherwise out of repair, that he apprehended he should not be sufficiently strong to make head against the combined fleets with any prospect of success, should they come out and attack him. In this situation were the English naval affairs at the close of the year 1743.

In America they wore a more disagreeable aspect; for though sir Chaloner Ogle, who had been left there, on the return of Vernon and Wentworth to England, in the double capacity of admiral of the fleet, and commander of the land forces on board, was an officer, in every respect, worthy of so important a trust; yet he was deterred from personally attempting any material enterprize, because the Spanish squadron, under admiral de Torres, which was stronger than that he commanded, still continued at the Havannah. Sir Chaloner, however, determined to commence some attack against the Spaniards, which might not too greatly weaken his fleet. In the beginning of the year he ordered captain Knowles, commander of the Suffolk, a seventy-gun ship, who was well acquainted with the coast, to take under him the Burford, of seventy-guns, the Assistance, Norwich, and Advice, of fifty, and the Scarborough of twenty guns, and three sloops, and to proceed to Antigua, where he was to be joined by the Eltham of forty guns, and the Lively of twenty; and with this squadron to make an attempt upon La Guera and Porto Cavallo, on the Caracca coast; but the governor of the Caraccas having received intelligence of this expedition, had neglected nothing that tended to his security, by erecting new batteries, ries, and augmenting the garrisons with a numerous body of Indians, Mulattoes, and Negroes; besides, he had prevailed on the Dutch governor of Curaçoa, an island of the Lesser Antilles, to supply him with a considerable quantity of ammunition; so that when commodore Knowles made the attack upon the place, he met with so warm a reception, that he was compelled to abandon the enterprize, and made his best way for the Dutch island Curaçoa; where he repaired the damage he had suffered in the attack of La Gueira. We had one lieutenant and ninety-two men killed, and three hundred and eighty wounded: among the latter was captain Lushington, a gallant and experienced sea-officer, commander of the Burford, who had his thigh taken off by a cannon shot, and expired at Curaçoa two hours after he was carried ashore. The Spaniards, however, had no great cause for exultation, as their town and fortifications were almost destroyed, and they lost above seven hundred men.

Commodore Knowles, not discouraged by the repulse he had lately sustained, and determined not to part with the Spaniards till he had made them feel the effects of his visit, had no sooner refitted his squadron than he put to sea, in order to make an attempt upon Porto Cavallo, off which place he came to an anchor on the fifteenth of April.

The commodore, taking a view of the situation of the Spaniards, saw twelve of their smallest ships, and three gallies, hauled up to the head of the harbour out of gun-shot, and two large ones, one of sixty, and another of forty guns, moored close over to the other shore, as there was not depth of water for them to go up the harbour: one ship was laid across the channel in the mouth of the harbour ready to be sunk, to prevent any entrance, with a chain from the castle to her stern, and another from her head to the main, where the Spaniards had lately erected three fascine batteries, which extended a considerable length. On a low point, called Punta Brava, were two other new fascine batteries, one of twelve guns, the other of seven: but commodore Knowles perceiving they were ill designed, and might easily be flanked, thought it would be no difficult matter to render himself master of them; and that if the attempt succeeded, the guns of both might be made use of against the castle. Accordingly, it was agreed at a general consultation held the next morning, to send in two ships to cannonade those batteries, which was done; and they being silenced, the forces, consisting of twelve hundred soldiers and sailors, were landed in the evening under major Lucas; but being seized with an unaccountable sudden panic, they fell into the greatest confusion, firing upon each other, and flying with the utmost precipitation to their ships. On the twenty-first a general consultation of officers was held, when it appearing that most of the ships had spent the greatest part of their ammunition, and were all miserably shattered in their masts and rigging; in fine, that the squadron was no longer in a condition to renew the attack, the commodore abandoned the enterprize, sent away the squadron to their respective stations, and after an exchange of prisoners with the governor of Porto Cavallo, returned with the other ships to Jamaica.

On the continent of America the operations of the war were very languid. General Oglethorpe having received intelligence, that the Spaniards meditated another invasion from St. Augustine, was determined to prevent them. Accordingly, in the beginning of the spring of this year, he began his march towards St. Augustine with a body of forces, consisting of Indians, and a part of his own regiments, together with the Highlanders and Rangers, and encamped for some time in the neighbourhood of the town by way of defiance: but the Spaniards did not think proper to venture on an engagement; and the British general being too weak to undertake a siege, he returned to Georgia, which he continued to put in so defensible a condition, as to leave nothing to fear from any attempt of the enemy. Towards the close of the summer he embarked for England, and arrived in London on the twenty-eighth of September, where he met with a most gracious reception from his royal master, by whom he was soon after promoted on the military list.

Let us now take a survey of the most important domestic transactions of the year 1743.

The remains of the regiments lately in the West Indies returned home, were scarce the shadow of those who were sent out. As an instance of which, general Blakeney's regiment, which went out eight hundred strong, now consisted only of eight men. Soon after the departure of his majesty for Germany, an affair happened which, tho' inconsiderable in itself, threw London into a great consternation. The Scottish regiment of Highlanders, commanded by lord Semple, had greatly distinguished themselves for their regularity, sobriety, and military discipline. With these troops it was determined to replace those lately arrived from the West Indies. Accordingly, they were ordered up to London, and on the fourteenth of May reviewed by general Wade upon Finchley-common, and next day ordered to march to Gravesend. This they exclaimed loudly against, as a breach of the terms on which they had enlisted, namely, not to be sent out of Great Britain; and on the seventeenth of the same month about one hundred and fifty of them mutinied, and marched off in a body towards their own country, but were soon overtaken, obliged to surrender, and brought prisoners to the Tower, where three of them were shot, and the rest sent to Jamaica and Georgia, and the main body of the regiment to Flanders, where they afterwards did excellent service.

On the nineteenth of October her highness the princess Louisa, his majesty's youngest daughter, set out for Germany, in order to be married to the prince royal of Denmark. She was attended in her voyage by the countess of Albemarle, and baron Solenthall the Danish envoy, and arrived on the twenty-ninth at Hanover. From thence she went to Altena, where she was met by the prince royal, and married on the eighteenth of November; and on the eleventh of December the princely pair made their public entry into Copenhagen. It was rumoured that a cross marriage between the same families was proposed at the same time: it did not however take place.

A great contest happened this year amongst the proprietors of the South-sea company, relating to Mr. Knight, who had been their cashier in the fatal year 1720, and had ever since lived in France as an exile: he had already procured his pardon from the crown, owing to some favourable circumstances that pleaded in his behalf; and he now offered the company ten thousand pounds by way of composition for all their claims against him. This offer was strenuously opposed by a great number of the proprietors, who thought it would have the appearance of a most scandalous composition on the part of the company. Innumerable pamphlets and other writings flew about on the occasion: however, upon a ballot, the offer of Mr. Knight was accepted, by a majority of four hundred and ten against two hundred and seventeen. This year died the celebrated John Campbel, duke of Argyll and Greenwich, so eminent for his shining talents in the field and senate. He was succeeded in his Scottish title by his brother Archibald, earl of Ilay. The title of Greenwich by his death became extinct.

During the recess of parliament, every endeavour had been exerted by the anti-ministerial writers, to poison the minds of the people of England with suspicions of the worst tendency, to raise in them a settled aversion to those at the helm, and even to alienate their affections from their sovereign. With this view, all the arts of calumny and misrepresentation were employed: the burdens of taxes were exaggerated; the interest of the nation was affirmed to be directly sacrificed to views of aggrandizing a foreign electorate; and no pains was spared to increase the jealousy and national quarrel between the English and Hanoverians. The better to answer this last purpose, a report was as confidently as successfully propagated, that the king had on all occasions, during the last campaign, given preference to the foreign over the British troops, and that it was on this account only that the earl of Stair had thrown up his commission, being no longer able to support the insults the British troops sustained from their own mercenaries: they even went so far as to affirm, that the sovereign himself appeared at the battle of Dettingen in a yellow scarf (the Hanoverian colour) and that his electoral troops were so securely posted, as not only to be out of all danger, but also of little or no service in that engagement. These reports, though many of them manifestly false, wrought their whole effect, and the minds of the people were inflamed to the highest degree of discontent, when the parliament, after several prorogations, resumed its session on the first day of December.

His majesty in his speech told the members, That the dominions of the queen of Hungary had been evacuated by her enemies, and that the powerful armies which had marched to her assistance had retired out of the empire: that, in this conjuncture, it was with great pleasure he could acquaint them, that he had been joined by a body of troops of his good friends and allies the States-general: that, in further prosecution of these measures, the definitive treaty between him, the queen of Hungary, and the king of Sardinia, had been happily concluded; a treaty which in time should be laid before them: that the advantages which must result from this alliance to the common cause were sufficiently apparent; and it would be particularly conducive to the interests of his kingdoms, by disappointing the ambitious views of the crown of Spain, with which they were at present engaged in so just and necessary a war; that, as he made no doubt but they would proceed upon these foundations with firmness and constancy, they might reasonably hope to see the public tranquillity soon re-established, and a safe and honourable peace speedily obtained: that such were the ends which he had in view, and to the attainment of which he should bend his whole study and attention; but, in order the more thoroughly to accomplish them, vigorous and resolute measures were necessary; and to concert and carry on such measures, he did, with a just confidence, rely on their zealous, chearful, and effectual support.

In the upper house lord Sandwich moved for an address, beseeching his majesty to discontinue the Hanoverian troops in the pay of Great Britain, in order to remove the popular discontent, and stop the murmurs of the English troops abroad. In support of this motion it was alleged, that these Hanoverians, though in the pay, could hardly be said to be in the service of the British nation: that some of them refused to form in the first line at the battle of Dettingen, and retired to the second: that others refused to obey the orders of lord Stair, the British general, to march in pursuit of the enemy after the battle; and the greatest number of them who, together with some of the British guards, composed what was called the rear-guard, under the command of a Hanoverian lieutenant-general, took a different route from the rest of the army in their march to Aschaffenburg: that this step not only rendered them wholly useless to the army when attacked by the French in front, but would have rendered them equally useless if the French from Aschaffenburg, where the passage was left open to them, had attacked the allies in the rear, in which it was pretended that these troops were left as in the post of honour: that not contented to avoid being of use either in the front or in the rear, but determined to be of no use in any station, they halted as soon as they came within sight and reach of the battle, though pressed by the British officers, and invited by the ardour of the British troops to share the glory and complete the victory (as they might have done) of the day: that as by these means the future co-operations of the national troops with these mercenaries had been rendered impracticable, and even their meeting dangerous, it seemed indispensibly necessary to remove the object that occasioned the many instances of partiality by which the Hanoverians have been unhappily distinguished, and the British forces undeservedly discouraged. These, and many other assertions of the like tendency, boldly thrown out, and no less powerfully supported by those in the opposition to the government, appeared to make a considerable impression upon many of the peers, which lord Carteret, who had accompanied his majesty abroad, and was on the field of battle, observing, he rose up to answer and confute them.

“From all, said his lordship, I could see, and from all I could hear, from gentlemen who were in the action, the Hanoverians showed as much courage, and as much obedience to the command of their superior officers, as any troops ever did: from whence I infer, that they could do as much service as any troops whatever; and that they were willing to do us service, and to march whithersoever they were commanded by our generals.” Some of the lords having, during the course of the debate, advanced, that the Hanoverian troops

durst not fight against the emperor, because he was their sovereign, and elected with the concurrence of their master, his lordship observed, that this was a very mistaken notion. "The emperor, my lords, continued he, neither began, nor does he now carry on the war against the queen of Hungary as emperor: he is engaged in war with her only as duke of Bavaria; and consequently the members of the empire may assist either the one or the other, without committing any breach of any law of the empire. If our army did not attack the French, it was not to any backwardness in the Hanoverians, but to our not having an opportunity to attack them with any advantage."

In another passage of the same speech (which made a great noise at this time) he observed, "that the noble lord (meaning the earl of Stair) who had the chief command, under his majesty, of all the British troops, as well as the troops in British pay, is well known to most of your lordships; and any one who knows him must be convinced, that he would not tamely submit to such an affront as that of a disobedience to his command. If he had resented it, or if he had complained, I should certainly have heard of it in the army; and as I never did, I must suppose there never was the least occasion for any such complaints."

A great number of other members spoke both for and against the motion; the substance of whose arguments being in the main the same as already recited, shall not be here repeated. Upon a division, the motion was rejected by a majority of 71 against 36 peers: but this occasioned a very stinging protest, signed by about twenty-five peers. When the term for keeping the Hanoverians in British pay was nearly expired, and the estimates for their being continued the ensuing year were laid before the house, lord Sandwich renewed his motion; but the chancellor, as speaker of the house, interposing, declared, that by their rules a question once rejected could not be revived during the same session. A debate ensued, and the second motion was over-ruled.

The Hanoverian troops were voted in the house of commons. Nevertheless, the same nobleman moved in the upper house, "That the continuing sixteen thousand Hanoverians in British pay was prejudicial to his majesty's true interest, useless to the common cause, and dangerous to the welfare and tranquillity of the nation." He was seconded by the duke of Marlborough, who had resigned his commission in disgust, and the proposal gave rise to another warm dispute; but the minority, as formerly, were foiled in their attempts.

The ministry were no less warmly attacked in the house of commons. Mr. Grenville (the present earl Temple) moved for an address to beseech his majesty, that he would not engage the British nation any farther in the war on the continent without the concurrence of the States-general, on certain stipulated proportions of force and expence, as in the late war. Another motion was made for laying a duty of eight shillings in the pound on places and pensions, and a third for repealing the septennial act. These proposals were each of them productive of violent debates; but the court still continued to maintain their superiority. So great indeed was the credit and influence of the ministry, that although the national debt was increased by above six millions since the commencement of the war, the commons indulged them with a very large sum for the expence of the ensuing year. The grants specified in the votes amounted to six millions five hundred thousand pounds. To this sum were added three millions five hundred thousand pounds, paid in perpetual taxes; so that the expence of the year arose to TEN MILLIONS; an amazing sum! The funds established for the annual charge were, the land-tax at two millions, the malt-tax at seven hundred fifty thousand pounds, one million paid by the East India company for the renewal of their charter, one million two hundred thousand pounds by annuities, one million from the sinking fund, thirty-six thousand pounds from the coinage, and six hundred thousand pounds by a lottery.

The dissensions of the British parliament were suddenly suspended in the beginning of the year 1744, by an event that seemed to call upon both parties to unite in their common defence. This was the intelligence of an intended invasion in favour of the pretender, whose eldest son, Charles-Edward, had passed through Italy in December, in the disguise of a Spanish courier, embarked at Final, landed at Antibes, and prosecuting his journey to Paris, had been indulged with a private audience of the French king; who thought, by the parliamentary disputes and general dissatisfaction of the people of Great Britain, that the whole nation was ripe for revolt, and therefore determined to make use of young Charles, who was a youth of promising talents, secret, brave, and enterprising, to effect the projected invasion of this kingdom; which, should it at last miscarry, would, he foresaw, make a considerable diversion from the continent in favour of France, and embroil and embarrass the king of England, who was the chief support of the house of Austria and all its allies. The old pretender was persuaded to suffer his son to try the experiment: the young man embraced the offer with the greatest alacrity. The French ministry began to make preparations for carrying the scheme into immediate execution, and every thing was proposed to be conducted with equal secrecy and dispatch. The court of Spain, equally concerned in the success of the project with that of Versailles, undertook to furnish the necessary sums, which the exhausted state of the French finances would not suffer them to advance.

Count Saxe was appointed by the French king commander of the troops designed for this expedition, which amounted to fifteen thousand. The count had been in England; and having observed the few number of strong towns and fortresses in it, he had formed an idea that it might be easily over-run. Matters being at length completely settled, the troops began their march to Picardy, and a great number of vessels were assembled for their embarkation at Dunkirk, Calais, and Boulogne, the young pretender himself repairing to those places to superintend the preparations.

In the mean time, the British ministry being apprised of his arrival in France, were no longer at a loss for the destination of the French armaments. Accordingly, orders were sent to Mr. Thompson, our resident at Paris, to make the strongest remonstrances thereupon to the French ministry, but he received only evasive answers.

It had been determined in the cabinet at Versailles to land their troops in Kent, under a strong convoy of men of war equipped at Brest, and commanded by monsieur Roquefeuille, an officer of experience and capacity. This commander sailed on the twenty-sixth day of January from Brest, directing his course up the English Channel with eighteen ships of the line. They were presently descried by an English cruizer, who ran into Plymouth, and the intelligence was conveyed by land to the board of admiralty. As the French had been the greatest part of last summer equipping a considerable armament at Brest, a fleet of twelve men of war had been ordered to rendezvous at Spithead, under the command of sir John Norris; but as no intelligence arrived that the French squadron was in readiness for the sea, sir John did not take the command of these ships: but now that it was known for certain that the French fleet was at sea, and perhaps in the Channel, he was immediately dispatched down to the squadron, which he brought round to the Downs from Spithead; and being soon after joined by seven or eight ships of the line from Chatham, he found himself of superior strength to the enemy.

Every other possible precaution was taken by the government to guard against the impending danger: several regiments marched to the southern coasts of England; all governors and commanders were ordered to repair to their respective posts; the forts at the mouth of the Thames and the Medway were put in a posture of defence; and directions were given for raising the militia of Kent to defend the coast, if occasion should require. On the fifteenth day of February his majesty in a message informed both houses of the French designs; in answer to which they jointly presented a loyal address, which was followed by others from the city of London, and most of the corporations in the kingdom, expressing their abhorrence of the French attempt, and promising to stand by his majesty with their lives and fortunes. A proclamation was issued for putting the laws in execution against papists and nonjurors: the parliament also addressed his majesty to augment his forces by sea and land. And now it being known that the late dissensions among the great men in the army and state had been the chief encouragement to the French to meditate their present scheme, the earl of Stair and the duke of Marlborough, in order to evince their loyalty to his majesty, made him a voluntary tender of their services in any station which he should think proper. Their offer was accepted: the earl of Stair was re-invested with the chief command of all the forces in Great Britain: the duke of Montagu was permitted to raise a regiment of four hundred horse at his own expence; and orders were sent to bring over six thousand of the British troops from Flanders, in case the invasion should actually take place.

Mean while, the French court proceeded with their preparations at Boulogne and Dunkirk, under the eye of the young pretender, and seven thousand men were actually embarked; while Roquefeuille endeavoured to beat round the Channel, and take the transports under his convoy; but meeting with contrary winds and bad weather, it was the seventeenth of February before he got the length of the Isle of Wight. Here he lay to, and sent out a frigate for intelligence of what force was assembled at Spithead, which brought him information that no ships could be discovered in that road; upon which the French admiral, over hastily concluding that the English, apprehensive of an insult from his superior force, had withdrawn their ships into Portsmouth harbour, dispatched M. de Barreil, his second in command, with five men of war to Dunkirk, to hasten the arrival of the transports with the troops on board, while he himself, taking advantage of a spurt of fair wind, made sail with the remainder of his fleet, and came to an anchor on the twenty-second of February in the evening, off Dungeness, a steep promontory or head-land on the coast of Kent, about eighteen miles south-west of Dover, and eight miles east of Rye. While the French admiral lay here, sir John Norris with his fleet, amounting to thirty sail, the least of which was of sixty guns, weighed anchor from the Downs; and on the twenty-fourth in the forenoon M. de Roquefeuille, to his infinite surprize, saw the British fleet doubling the South Foreland and making towards him; and although the wind was against them, by the help of the tide gaining greatly upon him; but the tide of flood being spent, and the wind dying away, sir John Norris found himself under the necessity of coming to an anchor, which he did about two leagues distance from the French. M. de Roquefeuille, finding that the British squadron was not only more numerous, and much superior in force to that under his command, but that they had been likewise blocked up in a bay, from whence there appeared no possibility of escaping, summoned all his officers to a council, to demand their opinion how he should act in this miserable situation; when it was unanimously agreed to avoid an engagement, weigh anchor at sun-set, and make the best of their way for their own coast. The council then broke up, and every officer returned to his ship to execute what had been resolved upon. While they were weighing their anchors, a fresh gale of wind started up at east north-east, which increasing every minute, soon became a storm that hurried them down the Channel at the rate of ten miles an hour; so that next morning at day-break they were off Cape Barfleur: after which they were separated by a thick fog, and arrived at Brest in a very disorderly manner, being greatly shattered by the storm, to which however they owed their safety. A great number of their transports were driven ashore and shattered to pieces, and the rest were so much damaged, that they could not be repaired for a considerable time. The English remained masters of the sea, and kept the whole French coast in alarm. The designed invasion was therefore quite laid aside; the French generals returned to Paris, and the young pretender set out for the place of his former residence.

The British squadron was much damaged in the storm; and sir John Norris being thus disappointed of attacking the French, and finding they had entirely effected their escape, thought proper to return to his station in the Downs, where he arrived on the twenty-seventh of February, having before sent away sir Charles Hardy with all the three-decked ships to Portsmouth, where they could ride with greater security. On the second of March the Habeas Corpus act was suspended, and several persons of distinction, among whom was the earl of Barrymore, of the kingdom of Ireland, were apprehended, apprehended on suspicion of treasonable practices; but every one of those suspected persons were afterwards admitted to bail, and discharged as soon as all fears of an invasion were over. By virtue of the perpetual defensive league between England and Holland, signed the third of March, 1678, and renewed and confirmed by the last treaty, which their High Mightinesses concluded in the year 1728, with his reigning majesty, the Dutch were obliged to furnish, as auxiliaries to the British nation, a succour of six thousand troops and twenty men of war, to be employed in the service of that crown, whenever demanded: the requisition was made by our resident at the Hague as soon as ever the designs of the French became apparent; and their High Mightinesses immediately gave orders for the transportation of six battalions, of five hundred men each, into England as soon as possible. These arrived at Gravelend on the eighteenth of March, and were followed soon after by three thousand men more.

When Lewis found himself entirely disappointed in his hostile schemes against the British nation, either to gratify his own resentment, or to sooth the anger of the court of Madrid, in which large sums had been thus uselessly squandered, he resolved no longer to preserve any measures with the English nation. Accordingly, Mr. Thompson, our resident at Paris, was given to understand, that a declaration of war must ensue; and this was actually published at Paris on the twentieth day of March, 1744, wherein the French king charged his Britannic majesty with having dissuaded the court of Vienna from entertaining any thoughts of an accommodation; with having infringed the convention of Hanover; with having exercised piracy upon the subjects of France; and even blocked up his most Catholic majesty's fleet in his harbour of Toulon. In answer to this his Britannic majesty, on the thirty-first of March, published a counter-declaration of war against France, to the great joy of the nation, which had long reflected with indignation upon the many insults we had received from that faithless people. The Dutch, who upon such an event were to supply us with twenty ships of war, did vouchsafe to send five or six, which, for any service they were of, might as well have staid at home. The elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse refused their stipulated succours till we had an army formed in Hanover sufficient to protect them. The Russians alleged it was too late in the year to give us the assistance we had a right to demand. The king of Prussia insisted we were the aggressors, and therefore would send us no succours. In April the French also declared war against the queen of Hungary, who returned a like declaration against France in the succeeding month; and thus all Europe was lighted up in flames.

On the third of April his Britannic majesty went to the house of peers, and made a speech to his parliament, in which he acquainted them with the French king's having declared war against him on the most ill-grounded and injurious pretences: that he had on his part also declared war against the French king, and had made the proper requisitions to the States-general for performing their engagements on this important occasion. His majesty then declared, that in the prosecution of his just cause, he relied on the divine protection, and the vigorous support of his parliament, assuring them that he would do his part: that he had no interest at heart but theirs; and that common interest conjured them all to unite. To this pathetic speech both houses returned the most affectionate and loyal addresses, promising effectually to stand by and assist his majesty in prosecuting the war against France with the greatest vigour, and to furnish whatever expences should be found necessary for the same, as became a free and grateful people in defence of their liberties. The commons also, more evidently to demonstrate their loyalty, brought in a bill for inflicting penalties of high-treason upon those who should maintain correspondence with the sons of the pretender. This bill was sent up to the lords on the twenty-seventh of April, when lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, moved that a clause should be inserted for continuing the penalty of treason upon the posterity of those who should be convicted of holding such correspondence, during the life of the two sons of the pretender to the crown. This motion was supported by the duke of Newcastle, lord Carteret, and the whole strength of the ministry, and opposed by the duke of Bedford, the earl of Chesterfield, lord Talbot, and lord Hervey, who argued against it in the most pathetic manner, as an illiberal expedient, contrary to the dictates of humanity, the law of nations, the rules of common justice, and the precept of religion; as tending to involve the innocent with the guilty; and meant only to augment the ministerial power, to plunder the nation, and enable courtiers to grow rich by public calamities. The lords who defended the motion ascribed this proposal purely to motives of preserving their constitution and liberties, and of defeating the schemes which had been formed for dispossessing the present royal family of the throne. After a long and violent debate the question was carried in the affirmative, though not without occasioning a protest, signed by eighteen lords. When the bill was returned with the amendment to the commons, the amendment was strenuously opposed by lord Strange, lord Guernsey, Mr. W. Pitt, and other members by whom the original bill had been countenanced: but the ministerial party here, as in the upper house, carried their point: the bill was approved by the majority, and soon after received the royal assent.

On the fifteenth day of May his majesty put an end to the session with a speech, in which he returned both houses "his hearty thanks for the many demonstrations they had given him during the course of it, of their good affections, and of their zeal for the support of his government. He observed, that the great preparations made by France on the side of the Austrian Netherlands, must convince all Europe of the ambitious and destructive views of that crown in beginning the present war: that it should be his care, in conjunction with his allies, to pursue the most proper measures to disappoint these designs, and to prosecute the war in such a manner as might be most effectual for obtaining a safe and honourable peace: that his good friends the States-general had already, in pursuance of his requisition, agreed to furnish the succours stipulated by treaties, and had given the strongest assurances of their sense, not only of the common danger, but also of the inseparable connection of their interests with those of Great Britain; a disposition which he would not fail fail to improve to the general good of the common cause: that he hoped the members of both houses, upon their return to their respective counties, would be particularly careful to preserve the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom, especially at this critical conjuncture, when they were called upon by every motive of duty and interest, to cherish a more than ordinary zeal for the maintenance and defence of their religion and liberty, against the malicious designs of their enemies."

The late projected invasion was replete with many ills against England, and its timely detection and prevention was consequently a most fortunate circumstance for her. The scheme had been laid with such deep art and secrecy, that the commanders of the French fleet did not know the place of their destination till the moment they were to set sail: it was, moreover, closely connected with another which, had it proved successful, must have given the French the entire dominion of the sea. The queen of Spain, impatient of the difficulties which retarded her son Don Philip in his progress in Italy, and enraged at the detention of the French and Spanish squadrons in the harbour of Toulon, had, by promising to sustain all the loss that might be suffered in such an attempt, prevailed on the court of Versailles to agree that the combined fleets should sail out of the harbour and attack that of England; after which, should they gain the victory, they were to repair into the English Channel, in order to assist in the projected descent.

Accordingly, orders were dispatched to the united fleets to put to sea with all expedition, and dare the utmost hazards of an engagement. Admiral Matthews had by this time been reinforced from England, so that he had the superiority of the French and Spaniards; and on the eleventh of January this year found himself at the head of forty sail, of which twenty-eight were of the line*, having on board two thousand four hundred and ninety guns, fifteen thousand seamen, and eight hundred soldiers from Minorca; so that it is more than probable the enemy would have gladly avoided an engagement, had not their orders from their respective courts been so peremptory. Their whole force consisted of twenty-eight ships of the line; one of them, the Spanish admiral's, named the Royal Philip, mounted one hundred and fourteen guns: they had likewise six frigates; but all their ships were clean, and completely manned.

On the ninth of February, 1744, in the morning, the combined fleet came out of the harbour; and Matthews, who lay in the bay, and had intelligence of their design, made the proper dispositions to engage them. He immediately got under sail with his whole fleet; but the wind dying away, he was obliged to come to an anchor again in the bay. According to the disposition of the line of battle made by the British admiral, the van was conducted by Mr. Rowley, rear-admiral of the white; the center by Mr. Matthews himself, lately made admiral of the blue; and the rear by Lestock, who had been promoted to be vice-admiral of the blue. The next day, a small breeze springing up at east, the two fleets neared each other; but it was night before Matthews could get near enough to the enemy, who seemed to decline the line of battle. By this time, however, vice-admiral Lestock and his squadron was full five miles astern of the admiral; and the Spanish ships were astern of De Court, the French admiral, who still avoided to engage with the English van under Rowley. Matthews, finding that the combined fleets kept aloof, and fearing that they might, by a change of wind, be enabled to elude the engagement, determined to break the form of a line of battle, which he had hitherto studiously endeavoured to preserve, and about twelve o'clock, on the eleventh, he made the signal for engaging: himself began the attack upon the Spanish admiral, Don Navarro, in the Real; rear-admiral Rowley singled out M. de Court, who commanded the French squadron; but Lestock still remained a great way astern. During the engagement, the captains Cornwall, Osborne, Hawke, and Forbes, exhibited the most exemplary courage; but several other captains, who were immediately under the eye of Matthews, behaved in the most dastardly and pusillanimous manner. Mr. Matthews, however, by the assistance of the Marlborough, reduced the Real to a perfect wreck; but the Marlborough, driving too near the admiral, in the very heat of the action, obliged him to fill his sail and shoot a-head, to prevent her being on board of him, which, as there was very little wind, and a heavy swell, might have proved fatal to both of them. The Marlborough was now left alone to contend with the greatest ship in the world. The brave captain Cornwall, her commander, after performing wonders, lost both his legs and his life by a chain-shot. The first lieutenant taking the command, continued to fight with equal bravery; but being at length utterly disabled, she was about five o'clock towed out of the line of battle. The Royal Philip, however, was in as miserable a condition, lying like a mere hulk upon the water; which admiral Matthews perceiving, he made a signal for the Anne galley fire-ship to go down and burn her. These kind of vessels are filled with gun-powder, and every other kind of combustible, and they fasten upon an enemy's ship with grappling-irons fixed at their yards, arms, and at booms, spread out in different places for that purpose. The moment the fire-ship is fastened to her object, a match is set to the train of powder, while the crew hurry into a boat that waits a-stern for them. The captain is the last who enters it. In the mean time, the train catching, the fire-ship is instantly all in flames, and is blown up, together with the vessel to which it is grappled. It is always customary to order a large ship to go down with this machine, to cover it from the fire of the enemy. Matthews took this precaution; but the ship he ordered to this service did not obey his signal: nevertheless, the brave captain Mackay, who commanded this engine of destruction, continued advancing. By this time four Spanish ships had passed by Lestock, and hastened to the protection of their admiral: they poured their broadsides into the poor defenceless, and undefended Anne galley, which had by this time got within her own length of the Real; but unable to sustain so terrible a salute, was now on the point of sinking; which the captain perceiving, and seeing his own destruction inevitable, determined at least to avenge himself in the hour of his death: he set fire to the train, hoping he might yet be able to get alongside of the Spanish admiral, and blow her up along with himself; but it was too late: his vessel was in an instant on fire, and blew up within a few feet of the Royal Philip, whose deck was covered with the wreck, but without receiving any damage from this dreadful explosion.

The four ships which had passed Mr. Lestock now directing their whole fury against the Namur, Mr. Matthews' ship (who still lay within musket-shot of the Real, with his masts and rigging terribly disabled) raked him fore and aft for some time. About five o'clock Mr. Matthews made the signal for the line a-head, and wore round; but he was only followed by the Dorsetshire, Essex, Rupert, and Royal Oak, which were a-stern of him: these however formed the line with the admiral, and engaged the Royal Philip, and six other ships which had got into a close line with their admiral. One ship of the Spanish line, named the Poder, struck to captain Hawke of the Berwick, who sent a lieutenant to take possession of her: she was afterwards retaken by the French squadron; but was found so disabled that they left her deserted, and she was next day burned by order of admiral Matthews.

It is agreed that the Spanish division must have been entirely destroyed, had it not been for M. de Court, the French admiral, who continued so closely to engage rear-admiral Rowley as to prevent his going down to the assistance of Mr. Matthews. About five o'clock the French admiral made the signal for the van to tack, with an intention to put admiral Matthews between two fires. This obliged Rowley to tack likewise, to join the center of our fleet, which was threatened with the most imminent danger by the above manœuvre of the French admiral, Lestock not having, during all this time, brought up his division to reinforce it; which was the more extraordinary, as four Spanish ships had actually passed him, and arrived to save their admiral, Navarro, in the Real. Night coming on, the firing ceased on both sides, and the combined fleets took that opportunity of towing all the crippled ships before the wind, and making the best of their way from the British fleet, who lost sight of them about ten o'clock; and there being but little wind, Matthews brought to, that Lestock and the sternmost ships might get up to him. Next day the enemy appeared to leeward, and the admiral gave chase till night. They were observed again on the thirteenth at a considerable distance, and pursued till evening. On the morning of the fourteenth a great number of the ships of the combined fleets were seen distinctly from the mast-head; and a fresh gale springing up, Lestock gave chase to, and had gained on them considerably by noon: but just as he was in full view of coming up with them, Matthews threw out his signal to leave off chase, and afterwards bore away for Port-Mahon to refit; while the enemy, continuing their course towards the coast of Spain, M. de Court, with his division, anchored in the road of Alicante, and Don Navarro sailed into the harbour of Carthage.

Admiral Matthews, on his arrival at Minorca, accused Mr. Lestock of having misbehaved in the action, suspended him from his command, and sent him prisoner to England. This action off Toulon was, notwithstanding the superior force of the English, rendered indecisive, or rather fruitless, by the mutual aversion the two commanders had for each other. Whether Lestock would have willingly deprived Matthews of the glory of a victory, or whether Matthews did not chuse to share with him that glory, is a question we cannot here decide. This much is certain, that the only fruits of our vast expence, and preparations of both us and the enemy in the Mediterranean, was the slaughter of a great number of men, and the disabling many vessels. There were complaints on all sides; and the same disgust appears to have prevailed between the Spanish and French admirals as between the two British commanders. The Spaniards accused the French of having sacrificed them to the whole fire of the British fleet; and though it was plain that De Court had saved them from destruction, yet, to gratify the Spaniards, the French commandant was disgraced, though he was afterwards restored to his command with circumstances that reflected double honour upon him.

It may easily be supposed that the conduct of our fleet on this important occasion, would become the subject of a parliamentary enquiry in England. The trial of the delinquents came before a committee of the house of commons in the March following, when Lestock exhibited a countercharge against Matthews, who had resigned his command to rear-admiral Rowley, and had arrived in England. The house, however, not finding itself able to determine in this intricate affair, in which so many points of seamanship and naval manœuvres continually started up, presented an address to his majesty, desiring that a court-martial might be appointed to try the delinquents.

The court-martial was accordingly constituted and appointed, and proceeded to trial; but by reason of the many delays and obstructions thrown in by both parties, did not pass sentence till the latter end of the year 1746, when several captains of Matthews' division were cashiered, vice-admiral Lestock was honourably acquitted, and admiral Matthews rendered incapable of serving for the future in his majesty's navy. The issue of this court-martial was thought to be the more extraordinary, as the admiral, who had displayed the greatest courage and spirit, possibly not sufficiently tempered with conduct, scarce escaped suffering an ignominious death for cowardice; while the vice-admiral, who had kept aloof during the whole engagement, and hazarded the destruction of his superior and half of the fleet, by disobeying, or pretending not to understand his signals, was acquitted with honour. Unhappily, decisions of this kind are too frequently the result of interest and prejudice, rather than of a due attention to reason, or the merits of the cause.

Proper regard, however, was in other instances paid to real merit: a noble monument was erected to the memory of captain Cornwall in Westminster-abbey, by a vote of the British parliament, and at the public expence; an honour to which, by his gallant behaviour in this and in several former actions, this commander was universally allowed to be justly entitled. The captains Forbes, Osborne, and Hawke, had afterwards distinguished honours and rewards bestowed upon them suitable to their spirit, spirit, courage, and conduct, as had rear-admiral Rowley: in fine, nothing can be more probable than that, had all the commanders of the British fleet during the engagement off Toulon, done their duties equally well, the Spanish squadron, if not the French likewise, might have been totally destroyed, and a glorious end put at once to the war.

The consequence however proved, that the advantage in the Toulon engagement was on the side of France and Spain. The Mediterranean was left open at least for some time, and Don Philip was easily supplied with provisions, which he much wanted, from the coast of Provence; but neither the French nor Spanish squadrons were able to make head against Matthews when he returned to his station, after having refitted his ships. France and Spain being under a necessity of always supporting very numerous land armies, have not that continual fund of seamen, which are the resource of Great Britain's power. It was now more evident than ever of how great importance the possession of Minorca was to us, and the great prejudice Spain had sustained in the loss of that place.

In the beginning of this year, 1744, Don Philip in Lombardy, with the marquis de las Minas under him, found himself, by the arrival of an augmentation from Spain, and the junction of twenty thousand French under the prince de Conti, at the head of sixty thousand men; with which his highness was advised, after the retreat of the British fleet to Minorca, to enter Dauphiné, pass the Var, and renew his attempts to penetrate into Piedmont on the side of Nice, where his Sardinian majesty could not immediately collect an army sufficient to make any formidable resistance, because he could expect little support from prince Lobkowitz, on account of his Sicilian majesty having determined to assist the Spaniards in Italy. It was a bold resolution of the enemy to attempt penetrating into a country, where a single battalion may stop a whole army; where you are every instant obliged to fight amongst rocks and torrents; and where all these obstacles are heightened by the difficulty of getting provisions. All the passages into Piedmont were defended with such security as to deny any entrance on the side of Savoy, and an army of thirty thousand Piedmontese was assembled in the neighbourhood of Villa Franca, where his Sardinian majesty fortified his camp with strong entrenchments, which were rendered more inaccessible by the mountainous situation of the country; and his majesty continued in this camp, to prevent the incursions of the confederate forces, who were expected to make their attempt on the side of Nice.

The confederate army of French and Spaniards having quitted their cantonments, passed thro' Dauphiné, and made the necessary preparations for repulsing the Piedmontese troops from the passage on the side of Nice. About the latter end of March the infant Don Philip and the prince of Conti passed the Var, a river which falls from the Alps, and empties itself into the sea of Genoa, below Nice: that city, with the whole country to which it gives name, being incapable of making any defence, quickly surrendered. The confederates then passed the river Paglioní, with an intent to encamp between Nice and Montalban, and seize on the fortified posts which encompassed the king of Sardinia's camp; but before they could advance any farther, they were under a necessity of attacking the intrenchments near Villa Franca, and those of the fortress of Montalban, in the midst of rocks which form a long chain of inaccessible ramparts. There was no possibility of marching but through narrow defiles, and over frightful precipices, exposed to the enemy's artillery. Full in the front of this, they were obliged to climb up from rock to rock; and even on the Alps they had as great difficulties to encounter. Admiral Matthews having careened his ships, was returned to reassume the empire of the Mediterranean sea. He landed a body of men at Villa Franca, who joined the Piedmontese, and some English gunners whom he lent them from his fleet did great service: but the two young princes, who commanded an army of veteran troops who were every way fit for such an expedition, and into whom they infused fresh ardour by their own example, concerted their measures so well, that they surmounted all obstacles. The marquis de Bissy, at the head of a detachment of French, and the marquis de Campo Santo at the head of another of Spaniards, soon made themselves masters of the enemy's batteries which flanked the passage of Villa Franca. Every thing was so well planned, so quick and so vigorously pushed on the side of the confederates, and they made such prodigious efforts, that this chief pass of Villa Franca, the rampart of Piedmont, which was above the height of two hundred fathoms from the level, and defended by five thousand troops, and which the king of Sardinia imagined to be quite inaccessible, was carried by the French and Spaniards, though with the loss of near six thousand men, while that of the Piedmontese, who defended it, was about three thousand killed and taken prisoners. Amongst them was the marquis de Suze, natural brother to his Sardinian majesty, who commanded the troops that defended the entrenchments. The confederates then pursuing their advantage, advanced from post to post, from rock to rock, carrying every thing before them.

In the mean while, another large detachment had made a furious assault upon the intrenchments of Montalban, commanded by general Sinzan, with five thousand men. Twice were the enemy at the very top of these intrenchments: they had even made themselves masters of two batteries of cannon, but were obliged to abandon them, and to retire, with the loss of four hundred men killed and as many wounded, besides a great number of prisoners, among whom were a major-general, a brigadier general, a lieutenant-colonel, nine captains, and thirty-three subalterns. The Piedmontese defended themselves so well as to have only one hundred men killed, sixty wounded, and one hundred and forty made prisoners. Sinzan, however, finding that the marquis de Suze had been defeated, and that the French would now have it in their power to cut off the communication with Villa Franca, he held a council of war, in which it was agreed to abandon the entrenchments. This was done on the twelfth of April, three days after those of Villa Franca had been forced; and a garrison of three hundred and forty men being put into the citadel of Villa Franca, and sixty into the fortress of Montalban, the Piedmontese troops, to the number of four hundred and fifty, with all the ammunition, provision, and artillery, embarked on board the English English men of war for Oneglia, a port town in the territory of Genoa, but subject to his Sardinian majesty, seven miles south-west of Genoa, and forty-eight south-east of Coni, where they arrived on the twentieth of April, after a tedious and stormy passage.

The French immediately entered Villa Franca and Montalban, and a detachment of ten thousand Spaniards was sent under the duke d'Arcos, one of the Spanish generals, to attack the Piedmontese in Oneglia. Mean while, his Sardinian majesty quitted his encampment, and retired towards Coni. The Spanish general having crossed the territory of Genoa, arrived on the tenth of May before Oneglia, from whence general Sinzan retreated to Garesio, where he fortified himself among the eminences in so advantageous a situation, that he deterred the Spaniards from attempting to dispossess him from his post. The duke d'Arcos then received orders to penetrate through the territories of Genoa into the Milanese, whither he was to be followed by the whole combined army: but admiral Matthews, who was then off the Genoese coast, acquainted the republic, "That if the senate permitted the combined army to pass through their dominions, his Britannic majesty should regard it as a breach of their neutrality." This intimidated the doge and senate: they immediately intreated the confederate generals to abandon their designs, and had the happiness of procuring a compliance.

In fact, notwithstanding the successes of Don Philip and the prince of Conti, the scaling of those mountains at Villa Franca and Montalban, and the victories obtained among these precipices, they had not as yet been able to open a passage on that side: they could not advance for want of subsistence through those defiles, and over those rocks, where they were obliged to have the cannon dragged by soldiers, the forage carried on the backs of mules, and to march in several places on the declivity of a mountain, the foot of which was washed by the sea, and where they were exposed to the artillery of an English squadron stationed there to annoy them: they had moreover lost above twelve thousand men since the passage of the Var. The prince of Conti duly weighing all these considerations, proposed to the infant and the marquis de las Minas to return into Dauphiné, and endeavour to force a passage on the side of Demont, which was readily assented to. The Spanish troops who had possessed themselves of Oneglia were recalled; and having joined the marquis de las Minas at Nice, the confederate army, on the first of June, repassed the Var, and defiled towards the Upper Dauphiné. On the ninth of July they arrived near the passes of Chateau-Dauphiné, and encamped about Briançon, Guillestre, and Tournous, to be in readiness to force their way into Piedmont, by Demont; and the adjacent passes were strongly fortified by his Sardinian majesty, who had removed from Coni for their protection.

The confederate forces having made the proper dispositions, on the eighteenth of July, early in the morning, began the execution of their projected attacks. M. du Bois de Givry, a French lieutenant-general, and the bailli (or bailiff) of the great cross of Malta, led nine French battalions of the regiments of Poitou, Conti, Salis, Provence, and Brie, betwixt two mountains: the count de Campo

Santo followed him at the head of three Spanish battalions through another defile on the mountains of Traversiera. The bailli de Givry having made good his passage, came and drew up on the side of a summit which terminated at the redoubt of Monte Cavallo, and was defended by a detachment of twelve hundred Piedmontese. The assailants had no artillery, and were exposed to their enemy's cannon. Givry was wounded in the beginning of the action; and the marquis de Ville-mur being informed that a passage of equal importance had been just then luckily discovered, sent orders for a retreat. Givry obeyed, and prepared to draw off his men; but both the officers and soldiers were too greatly animated to obey his directions. The lieutenant-colonel of the regiment of Poitou was the first who leaped into the Piedmontese entrenchments; the French grenadiers darted themselves one upon another; and by the favour of a fog, which prevented the Piedmontese from taking any object for their fire, made themselves masters of the covered way; and the chevalier de Castagnola, who commanded the works, being wounded, and only four hundred and sixty men remaining of the twelve hundred in the redoubt, which was extremely harassed, the commandant thought proper to retire with the troops which had sustained the garrison, leaving the French to take possession of the redoubt, which was of the greatest importance, as it opened them a passage into Piedmont; though this advantage was dearly purchased, the French having lost one hundred and forty-three officers, and upwards of three thousand five hundred men.

His Sardinian majesty perceiving the loss of these advantageous posts, drew his troops from the frontiers, sent his heavy cannon off before him, and afterwards marched to prepare for the security of Turin, by defending the village of Varita and the Po, according to the motions of the confederates. While these latter were taking Chateau-Dauphiné, they were obliged to take the place known by the name of the Barricades: this is a pass of about three fathoms wide, between two mountains which rear their heads to the sky. The king of Sardinia had turned the river Stura, which waters the adjacent valley, into this precipice. The post on the other side of the river was defended by three entrenchments and a covered way. This was the last passage that was forced: and such was the consternation of the Piedmontese, that, impregnable as it was thought, it was carried by the French and Spaniards with very little loss. This advantage gained, the confederates left the Piedmontese army on the left, and invested Demont, a strong fortress at the foot of the mountains, in the road to Coni. This fortress had been built, at an immense expence, on the top of a rock that stood by itself in the midst of the valley of Stura, and was defended by a garrison of fifteen hundred men, provided with fifty-eight brass cannon, fourteen mortars, and a great quantity of ammunition and powder; and on account of its great strength, it was expected that it would have made a vigorous defence. The trenches were opened on the fourteenth of August, when the besiegers began to play; and on the eighteenth, having accidentally thrown a red-hot bullet into a place near the great magazine, general Vialetri, the governor, being afraid that he and all his garrison should be blown up, up, called for the assistance of the besiegers to extinguish the flames: and thus the allies, with the loss of only five men, got possession of a fortress in four days, that otherwise would have cost them several weeks siege, with the loss of many thousands of lives. By the reduction of Demont, the French and Spanish powers became masters of the flat country of Piedmont, which they laid under heavy contributions. His Sardinian majesty, dispirited with his losses, and thinking it improper to venture a battle in the plain against a superior army, flushed with the most extraordinary successes, retired to Saluzzo, seventeen miles south from Turin, to cover that metropolis, where he continued in expectation of a reinforcement of eight thousand Austrians under general Pallavicini, from Mantua and the Milanese.

The princes were now determined to invest Coni, a strong town and castle, seated upon a hill at the confluence of the rivers Shira and Gueffa, thirty-two miles south of Turin, and thirty-five north of Nice. Coni was garrisoned by twelve hundred men, commanded by baron Leutrum, who made the necessary measures for an obstinate resistance. The prince of Conti on the eighth of September appeared before the town, and opened his trenches on the thirteenth. On the fifteenth his Sardinian majesty had the satisfaction of being joined by general Pallavicini with his reinforcement, when his army consisted of thirty-six thousand men, which was superior to the French and Spaniards, who were now reduced to thirty-three thousand: they however had the superiority in cavalry.

His Sardinian majesty now resolved to hazard a battle, sensible that this was one of those occasions in which such an attempt is warranted by all the rules of sound policy. If he won the day, the confederates had few resources, and their retreat would have been attended with great difficulty: if he lost it, the town was still able to hold out in this advanced season, and he had a safe retreat. Nothing could be more judicious than this prince's disposition of his army; for having less cavalry than the besiegers, and more infantry, he made his attack in such a manner as to give his infantry the whole advantage of the ground, and secure his cavalry from any danger of a defeat.

The prince of Conti, informed of his Sardinian majesty's intention to attack the confederates in their lines, took every necessary measure, in conjunction with the royal infant and the Spanish generals, for giving the Piedmontese a proper reception; and drew the army out of their intrenchments to meet the king of Sardinia, who arrived in the plain near Madonna de l'Olmo, in sight of Coni, on the twenty-third of September. On the twenty-fourth the two armies engaged. His Sardinian majesty maintained the fight till night, without flinching; when finding it impracticable to force the enemy's intrenchments, he retired in good order to a camp at Murassio. He afterwards found means to throw a reinforcement of men and a supply of provisions into Coni, which enabled baron Leutrum, the governor, to hold out the place till the middle of October, when the marquis d'Ormea, who was posted with a detachment of five hundred Piedmontese on the eastern side of the town, found an opportunity of getting count Soto, with six hundred men, into the garrison. The besiegers, discouraged by this augmentation of the garrison, the advanced season of the year, the heavy snows and rains, the over-flowings of the rivers, and the considerable and perpetual losses they sustained by the fate of war and sickness, whereby their army was almost one half diminished, thought it most advisable to abandon the siege and make a retreat. Accordingly, in the beginning of November they quitted their trenches, and marched back to Demont, leaving their sick and wounded, to the number of two thousand, to the mercy of the Piedmontese. Having destroyed the fortifications of this place, they continued their retreat with great precipitation to Dauphiné, dreadfully harrassed by the Vaudois and light troops in the service of his Sardinian majesty, who once more recovered possession of Piedmont.

Thus terminated the campaign in Lombardy, which proved a most expensive and fatal one to the Spaniards, whose ministry, to gratify the clamours of a discontented populace, caused the marquis de las Minas to be disgraced and sent into exile, to keep company with the duke de Montemar. The conduct of the prince of Conti, however, was universally applauded; and indeed with great justice; for during this whole campaign he had on every occasion commanded like an experienced general, and fought like a valiant soldier. The French now took up their quarters in Dauphiné; the Spaniards resumed theirs in Savoy; and his Sardinian majesty cantoned his troops in Piedmont, returning himself to pass the remainder of the winter at Turin.

Prince Lobkowitz continued to command in Italy, against the Spaniards and Neapolitans under the duke of Modena and count de Gages, who, with the remainder of their enfeebled army, consisting of only ten thousand men, had taken up their winter-quarters in the neighbourhood of Fano, while the Austrians posted themselves at Rimini. The queen of Hungary had been persuaded by the bishop of Gurck, her ambassador at Rome, to attempt the conquest of Naples and Sicily, as the only means of indemnifying herself for the cessions she had made by the treaty of Worms; and she had actually declared war against the king of those countries, who having renounced his neutrality, openly espoused the cause of his father, ordered twenty-five thousand of his own troops, under the duke de Vieuville, to join them; and, after sending his queen and family to Gaeta, he set out to command them in chief himself. He then published a manifesto in vindication of his conduct; in which he observed, that his moderation had not been properly valued by the courts of Vienna and London; that his frontiers were threatened with the calamities of war; and that the queen of Hungary had even formed a design to invade his dominions. This charge appears to have but too good foundation; the emissaries of the house of Austria had endeavoured to raise a rebellion in Naples, which prince Lobkowitz was ordered to favour by an invasion. This general had quitted his cantonments at Rimini early in the spring, and began his march towards the Spaniards, who on his approach retired from their fortified passes on the Foglia, and departed from Pesaro in their retreat to the Neapolitan dominions. The Spanish general continued his retreat by Semigallia, and passed the river Tronto, which divides Naples from the Ecclesiastical State, taking post under under the cannon of Pescara, a port-town in the province of Abruzzo, situate on the gulph of Venice, ninety miles north of Naples. Prince Lobkowitz did not immediately continue to pursue the Spaniards to the Neapolitan territories; but having received positive orders to penetrate into those dominions, he prosecuted his march towards the Ecclesiastical State, and on the thirteenth of May the Austrian army arrived at Narni, within forty miles of Rome; and by the fifteenth was at Civita Castellana, within twenty-five miles of that city.

The army under count Gages was, by the juncture of the Neapolitans, become superior to that of the Austrians; whereupon it was resolved by his Sicilian majesty, the duke of Modena, and the count, to advance to the neighbourhood of Rome, and check the progress of prince Lobkowitz. In pursuance of this determination, the combined army arrived in the Campagna di Roma, and on the twenty-second of May posted themselves in an advantageous camp, on the eminences in the neighbourhood of Velletri, a town twenty miles east of Rome, where they threw up entrenchments. Prince Lobkowitz, on his side, seized upon the rising grounds opposite to the confederate camp, where he also entrenched himself; and both armies lay in sight of each other for some time, without coming to any considerable action.

In the mean while, prince Lobkowitz detached a large body of forces under count Brown, who made an irruption into the province of Abruzzo, where he dispersed a manifesto, in which the queen of Hungary exhorted the Neapolitans to shake off the Spanish yoke, and return to their allegiance to the house of Austria. This step, however, produced very little effect; and the Austrian detachment retired, at the approach of the duke of Vieuville with a superior number of forces.

Prince Lobkowitz having received intelligence, on the tenth of August, that the flank of the Spanish camp, lying next to the plain, was negligently guarded, it incited him to form a design of surprising it, together with the town of Velletri, where the enemy had their head-quarters. Night being come, the Austrian general divided his army into three bodies, with which he intended to surround Velletri, and carry off his Sicilian majesty and the duke of Modena. The better to cover his design, he ordered several false attacks to be made, in order to amuse the enemy, and divert their attention from the place he had chosen for the important scene of action. Every thing succeeded to his wish. About midnight count Brown, at the head of six thousand Austrians, having surprised and beaten the grand guard of the enemy behind Velletri, forced one of the gates and entered the town. The main guard were slain: those who resisted were cut in pieces; and those who made no resistance were taken prisoners: in short, terror and alarm were spread every-where. The king of Naples and the duke of Modena were very near being taken: the marquis de l'Hospital, ambassador from France to the court of Naples, had just time to awaken the king and the duke, who found an opportunity of escaping through the gardens to the village of Juliano, just before their apartments were entirely surrounded. The fire and the noise having roused the rest of the Spanish and Neapolitan forces who were in Velletri, they flew to arms; an obstinate engagement ensued; and count

Brown, finding that his Sicilian majesty and the duke of Modena had escaped, and were returning with count Gages and a strong reinforcement to prevent his retreat, thought it most proper to retire, which he did in good order, taking with him all the baggage, plate, and furniture of his Sicilian majesty and the duke of Modena, the French ambassador, and several other noblemen and officers of distinction: an immense booty! In their retreat the Austrians burnt the tents of the confederate camp behind Velletri. In this action the Spaniards are said to have lost two thousand men, with eight hundred taken prisoners, together with some standards and colours. The Austrians lost about six hundred men; and general Novati, the second in command, fell into the hands of the enemy: but the exploit was attended with no consequence of importance.

The heats of the autumn proved so fatal to the Austrians, that prince Lobkowitz saw his army mouldering away, without any possibility of being recruited: the country, moreover, was so exhausted, that he could with the utmost difficulty procure even common subsistence for his remaining troops. These considerations determined him to think of a retreat. Accordingly, on the thirty-first of October he decamped suddenly to cross the Tiber at Ponte Molle. Count de Gages was no sooner informed that the Austrians were retreated, than he marched out with his whole army in pursuit of them. The Austrians marched under the walls of Rome, and on the 2d of November crossed the Tiber, and broke down the bridges, though not so expeditiously but the confederate forces came up and attempted to do the same, which occasioned a warm action, in which the Austrians lost one hundred and twenty men, and the Spaniards about double that number. Seven hundred of the Austrian rear-guard were taken, with count Soto, who commanded them at Nocera; and the army of prince Lobkowitz suffered greatly by desertion. Nevertheless, he continued his retreat in a very masterly manner, crossed the mountains of Gobbio, and arrived in the estates of Bologna and Romagna, when his highness was informed of the expulsion of the French and Spaniards out of the Piedmontese dominions, which occasioned him to put his army in cantonments, and to fix his head-quarters at Imola, one hundred and eighty-two miles north-west of Rome; while count de Gages settled his in Terni, forty-six miles north-east of Rome, and quartered his troops as far as Viterbo, determined to renew the next campaign with all possible vigour, and effect a junction with Don Philip.

The war in Germany, which had been almost extinguished in the last campaign, began to revive, and raged with redoubled violence. All the concessions the emperor had offered to make were rejected; and the treaty of Worms dispelled all hope of accommodation. The inflexibility of the house of Austria, however, proved in the end serviceable to the emperor. The forlorn condition of this unfortunate prince excited the compassion of divers princes: they could not behold without indignation the head of the empire stripped of his dominions, and reduced to live upon a precarious pension, which was furnished him by France, and which was hardly sufficient to procure him the necessaries of life. These considerations, added to the intrigues of the court of Versailles, brought about a German confederacy against the queen of Hungary; and on the eleventh of May a treaty of alliance and union was concluded at Frankfort between his Imperial majesty, the king of Prussia, the elector-palatine, and the king of Sweden, as landgrave of Hesse, reciting, that as in regard to the Austrian succession things had been pushed to such an extremity as to endanger the total subversion of the German empire; therefore the contracting parties, animated by a paternal affection for their dear country, as well as for the firm support of the system of the empire, had made between them an act for a binding and constant union, to the following purport:

"They agreed to employ their good offices, either to persuade or compel the queen of Hungary to recognize the emperor's title, or restore his hereditary (Bavarian) dominions, and to give up the archives of the empire which were in her possession. They guaranteed to each other their respective territories; the disputes about the succession of the late emperor they referred to the decision of the states of the empire: they promised to assist one another, in case of being attacked; and they invited the king of Poland, the elector of Cologne, and the bishop of Liege, to accede to this convention." So far the treaty of Frankfort had a harmless tendency; and these were all the articles ever published by the contracting parties: but the court of Vienna afterwards published another separate article, which they asserted was annexed to this treaty, and contained the great secret of this alliance. It imported, "That as there was but too good reason to believe, that the queen of Hungary could not be persuaded by gentle means to consent to a peace, according to the intent of the treaty, his majesty the king of Prussia thought it indispensibly necessary to have recourse to stronger and more effectual methods; and as he was always desirous of co-operating towards the pacification of Germany, he was, after the most mature reflection, firmly of opinion, that a shorter and more decisive expedient could not be employed, than for him to promise and engage, as he did by the present article, to make an expedition towards conquering all Bohemia; to put his Imperial majesty in possession of that crown; and to guaranty it to him, his heirs, and successors for ever: that, in return, his Imperial majesty, touched with the most lively gratitude, did, for himself, his heirs and successors, give up to his Prussian majesty, irrevocably and for ever, in the strongest and most authentic manner, the right which he had to the circle and town of Konigsgratz, and the circle of Buntzlau and Leutmeritz, so that the country situated between Silesia and the river Elbe, and running from the town and circle of Konigsgratz to the confines of Saxony, should belong to the king of Prussia, and that the course of the Elbe should be the barrier of the two states; but that the country which was situated on the other side of that river within Bohemia, should remain to his Imperial majesty, although it should be appendant to the circles ceded to his Prussian majesty, excepting the lordship and town of Partuwitz, and the town of Collin, which his Imperial majesty did from that time give up to the king of Prussia. The two contracting parties farther agreed, that, after each should be put in possession of the respective territories mentioned in the article, they should mutually guaranty them to each other for themselves, their heirs, and successors, for ever."

His Imperial majesty publicly denied that there was such, or any separate article to the treaty of Frankfort; but the subsequent conduct of his Prussian majesty, and the other confederating powers, shewed the queen of Hungary to be right in her assertion. The great object of this prince seems to have been to reconcile his conduct to his good understanding with his Britannic majesty: with this view he published a manifesto, which was extremely concise and well drawn up, and which was printed in the London Gazette, July 30, and was in substance as follows:

"That he could no longer remain an idle spectator of the troubles in Germany, but found himself obliged to make use of the force God had given him to restore the power of the laws, and the authority of the empire: that the queen of Hungary had treated the emperor's hereditary dominions with inexpressible cruelty: that Germany had been over-run with foreign troops, which had marched through neutral countries without making the usual requisitions: that the emperor's troops had been attacked under neutral fortresses, and obliged to abandon the empire, whereof their master was the head: that the imperial dignity had been treated with indecency by the Hungarian troops: that the queen, declaring the election of the emperor void, and the diet of Frankfort illegal, had not only violated the imperial dignity, but injured all the princes who had the right of election: that he had no particular quarrel with the queen of Hungary, and that he desired nothing for himself, and only engaged in the war as an auxiliary for the liberties of Germany: that the emperor had offered to yield his pretensions to the dominions of Austria, on condition that his hereditary countries should be restored to him: that this proposal had been made to the king of England at Hanau, and rejected in such a manner as shewed the king of England had no intention to restore peace, but rather to make his advantage of the troubles: that the mediation of the Dutch had been desired; but they had declined to interpose, knowing the inflexibility of the English and Austrian courts: that the same terms had been offered again at Vienna, and again rejected; and that therefore the queen must impute it to her own council that her enemies find new allies: that he was not fighting for any interest of his own: that he asked nothing for himself, but was determined to exert all his power in defence of the emperor, in vindication of the rights of election, and in support of the liberties of Germany, which the queen of Hungary would enslave."

Such was the substance of this famous manifesto, which was calculated with a view to induce the people and parliament of England to withdraw their assistance from her Hungarian majesty: that this was the king of Prussia's intention, appeared more plainly from a rescript which he sent to M. Andrie, his ambassador at London; whereby he was ordered to declare to the British ministry the motives which obliged his master to supply the emperor with auxiliaries. This also was published in our news-papers; and the composition of of it plainly shews that his Prussian majesty had acquired a perfect knowledge of the state of parties in England.

In one part of it he expresses himself thus: "I hope, however, that no judicious Englishman, nor any Briton who is zealous for the constitution of his country, can possibly entertain the least doubt with regard to the equity of my resolution, of which he may easily convince himself, by barely transporting on the theatre of England what now passes on that of Germany: that as every true English patriot would look with indignation upon all such intrigues as should be carried on in his country towards making the now reigning family descend from the throne, in order to advance the pretender to it, and would oppose all such practices to the utmost of his power; in like manner, there is no patriot or powerful prince of the empire, that can behold with indifference the present state of the country, or can coolly suffer another member of the empire, such as the queen of Hungary, to endeavour to spoil of his dignity and authority the emperor lawfully elected, in order to invest with that rank a candidate destitute of the qualifications which are most essential to fill the imperial throne. As, in consequence of the same principle, no German prince has a right to meddle with the internal policy of Great Britain, nor the constitution of its government, I have some reason to hope that the English nation will not meddle with the affairs of the empire; and I entertain those hopes the more confidently, because England has no reason to interfere in this quarrel from any considerations of her trade or commerce: and although she may have more regard for one German court than for another, yet I imagine she will not pretend that such powerful and respectable princes as those of the empire should be obliged to regulate their conduct according to the inclinations of those among the English, who strive to make their countrymen enter into foreign quarrels; in which England can have no manner of concern."

The emperor's health was at this time in a very declining condition, and the court of Vienna had formed a design, in the event of his death, of raising the grand duke, her Hungarian majesty's consort, to the imperial throne. The electors of Saxony, Mentz, and Cologne, seemed very well inclined to favour such a project. Of all the princes of the empire, the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, was the most capable of affording assistance to her Hungarian majesty. This prince, who at first had joined the king of Prussia against her, was now inclined to enter into an alliance with this princess against Prussia. In pursuing this measure, he did not intend to declare war against Frederic, but only to assist the queen in the same manner the States-general had joined with her against France, without declaring war against that crown. It did not appear that the elector of Saxony could have any great interest in making the queen of Hungary and the new house of Austria more powerful: nay, it rather seemed strange that he should chuse to aggrandize that house than to raise himself upon its ruins: but a private pique betwixt him and the king of Prussia, the powerful negotiations of England, the apprehension of the rising grandeur of the house of Brandenburg, and the expectation of humbling it, produced a total alteration of maxims in the court of Dresden.

As soon therefore as the king of Prussia had set his hand to the treaty of Frankfort with France and the emperor, the king of Poland signed an agreement privately with the queen of Hungary in the month of May, by which he promised to assist her with thirty thousand men; and the queen yielded to him a part of Silesia, which she hoped to recover, and to which that prince pretended some ancient rights, as all the German princes have some pretensions or other to the territories of their neighbours. On this occasion, however, his Polish majesty demanded a considerable subsidy; but it was thought unreasonable that Great Britain should load herself with the whole of the expence. Application was made to the States-general, who promised to contribute one third of the sum; but the proportion was deemed too small, and it was judged more equitable that the States should pay two thirds of the subsidy.

While these transactions were in agitation, the king of France, secured of his influence in Germany by the potent confederacy he had brought about between the emperor, the king of Prussia, the elector Palatine, and the landgrave of Hesse, no longer wore the mark of an auxiliary to the emperor, but having signed a declaration of war against the queen of Hungary, determined to make his first campaign in person in the Netherlands, where he had assembled a formidable army. He had appointed marshal Coigni to defend the passage of the Rhine with sixty-one battalions and one hundred squadrons; the Bavarian troops, consisting of near twelve thousand men, and paid by France, were commanded by count Seckendorff, an officer in whom they at that time had the greatest dependence. Marshal Noailles was general of the army in Flanders, which consisted of sixty-eight battalions and ninety-seven squadrons complete. Count Saxe was made marshal of France, and commanded a separate corps, composed of thirty-two battalions and fifty-two squadrons, also complete; thus the whole French army in Flanders amounted to above one hundred and twenty thousand fighting men. The situation of the French, especially in Flanders, was very different from what it had been the preceding year: the English might then have attacked the French frontiers with advantage, but now it was too late; and the Dutch, who refused to engage with us when the enterprize was easy, now took a share in it, when it was become in a manner impracticable.

Lewis chose rather to make his first campaign in Flanders than in Alsace, supposing that on the Rhine the war would only be defensive; whereas every thing was disposed for making it offensive in the Austrian Netherlands. His army intended for this expedition assembled in the neighbourhood of Lisle, the capital of the French Netherlands, where the French monarch arrived on the first of May, attended by marshal Noailles, count Saxe, count Clermont, and many other officers of distinction. On the fourth his majesty reviewed his forces, and made some new regulations for the establishment of military discipline; a thing difficult to maintain, and at that time greatly wanted.

Two days after the arrival of the French king at Lisle, the confederate army took the field, amounting to twenty-two thousand English, sixteen thousand thousand Hanoverians, eighteen thousand Austrians, and twenty thousand Dutch; in all, seventy-six thousand men, if the respective quotas, which were greatly deficient, had been complete: these troops formed an encampment in the neighbourhood of Brussels. The English and Hanoverians were commanded by general Wade, an old officer, who had been bred up under the great duke of Marlborough, and was well acquainted with every part of Flanders, where he had served a great many campaigns. The duke of Aremberg, of the house of Ligue, governor of Mons, and grand bailiff of Hainault, had the command of the queen of Hungary's troops: he was trained up under prince Eugene, had served against the Turks and French, and was not a little instrumental to the success of the battles of Belgrade and Dettingen; in both which he was wounded at the head of his troops. Count Maurice of Nassau, who commanded the Dutch, was a descendant of the celebrated prince Maurice of Nassau, one of the three brothers to whom the United Provinces were indebted for their liberty and greatness.

These three generals certainly had it in their power to oppose the designs of Lewis; but the Dutch were, as usual, temporizing and negotiating. On the one hand, they were strongly pressed by the English to fulfil the treaty of alliance concluded between them in 1678, by which they are mutually bound to declare war within the space of two months against any power that should attack either of the two nations. On the other hand, they flattered themselves with keeping the appearances of neutrality, even in the midst of war itself, and were arming against France at the very time they were afraid of provoking that crown. In this dilemma, they deputed count de Wassenauer to Lewis, expressing their apprehensions at the warlike preparations his majesty was making in the neighbourhood of their states, and intreating him to desist from any design of attacking their barrier. Their remonstrances, however, produced no effect, and their request was disregarded. The French king told the Dutch minister, that as his moderation had hitherto served to no other purpose than that of rendering his enemies more untractable, he was determined to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour.

Accordingly, on the eighteenth of May he made himself master of Courtray, a small town, which had an Austrian garrison. The day following the Dutch ambassador saw him invest Menin, one of their barrier towns, defended by the troops of the republic, to the number of fifteen hundred men, commanded by the baron d'Echteren. Menin, though one of the most regular and most tenable fortresses in the Netherlands, being one of the celebrated Vauban's masterpieces, was compelled to surrender in four days, the French losing forty men only in the reduction; whereas the same place had cost the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene nineteen days, and at least four thousand men. Before the surrender of Menin, a detachment of thirty thousand French, commanded by count Clermont, grandson of the great Condé, had invested Ypres, where the prince of Hesse-Philippsthal commanded a garrison of two thousand five hundred men. The trenches were opened on the first of June, when the king and marshal Noailles arrived in the camp. The garrison made a gallant defence; but upon the twelfth, at night, the French carried the covered way; upon which the lower town was abandoned, and on the fourteenth Ypres capitulated. In the several attacks the besiegers lost about three thousand six hundred men, and the garrison had about three hundred killed and wounded. This conquest, however, was cheaply purchased on the side of the French, as it brought them into possession of the whole chatellany, comprehending the towns of Mont Cassel, Baileul, Rouffelaer, Poperingen, Warnton, Commynes, and Houaric.

Every moment was now improved; for whilst the French king's troops were taking possession of Ypres, the duke of Boufflers reduced fort Knock, where baron de Hompesch commanded a Dutch garrison of one thousand men, who surrendered on the seventeenth of June upon honourable conditions. On the twenty-eighth count Clermont laid siege to Furnes, which capitulated the fifth day after opening the trenches.

The allied army beheld the progress of the French without being able to oppose it. Marshal Saxe, with an army of observation, consisting of twenty battalions and twenty-eight squadrons, lay posted behind the Lys, between Ghent and Courtray, in so advantageous a manner as to be able to prevent any attempt of the confederates, and to facilitate the operations of the besiegers; while the duke d'Harcourt commanded a flying camp of six thousand men on the one side of Maubeuge, in the province of Hainault. While Furnes was invested, the French monarch made his public entry into Dunkirk, where he continued for some time, highly elated with the success of this his first campaign. He had taken such precautions for the security of Alsace, which was defended by Coigni and Seckendorff, with two considerable armies under their command, that he thought he had nothing to fear from the Austrians in that quarter: besides, he had by this time received intelligence that the king of Prussia had made an irruption into Bohemia, so that he resolved to prosecute his conquests in the Netherlands.

All these towering projects, however, were on a sudden disconcerted, by advice that prince Charles of Lorraine, after joining the Austrian army assembled under count Traun, near Hailbron, in the circle of Suabia, had passed the Rhine in the neighbourhood of Spire, within sight of the French and Bavarians; that Alsace was invaded, and the frontiers of Lorraine. At first this intelligence met with no credit; but nothing was more certain. Prince Charles, by alarming the French in several places, and making different attempts at one and the same time, at length succeeded on the side where count Seckendorff was posted, who commanded the Bavarians, Palatines, and Hessians. Thus the Austrian army, consisting of seventy-two thousand effective men, entered Alsace without the least opposition: they immediately made themselves masters of Lautenberg, a post of no great strength, but of the utmost importance. This passage of the Rhine, which did such honour to prince Charles, was entirely owing to his diligence, and the negligence of the general of the Bavarian troops, whom marshal Coigni was obliged to intrust to guard the banks of the river towards Gemersheim and Rosanbeau. Seckendorff undertook took to defend them; and this was the very place where prince Charles effected his passage in the latter end of June.

Marshal Coigni, whose army extended along the Rhine, now saw, with equal surprize and indignation, that his communication with France was cut off; that Alsace, the country of Metz and Lorraine, were on the point of falling a prey to the Austrians: in fine, that there was no other resource left but to cut his way through the enemy, in order to re-enter Alsace, and cover the country. Having resolved upon this measure, he instantly set out with the greatest part of his army for Weissemburg, of which an advanced body of the enemy, under general Nadaſti, had taken possession. After a bloody engagement, the French retook Weissemburg and the lines; but they were soon obliged, upon the arrival of prince Charles with his whole army, to retire towards Haguenau, which they were likewise forced to abandon. Flying parties of the enemy laid all the country of Lower Alsace under contribution, and spread terror even to the borders of Lorraine, and king Stanislaus was obliged to quit that country with his whole court.

When the French king received this news at Dunkirk, he did not hesitate a moment concerning the part he had to take: he resolved to interrupt the course of his victories in Flanders; and leaving marshal Saxe with forty thousand men to preserve his new acquisitions, to fly himself to the assistance of Alsace. After having caused M. Noailles to set out before him, he sent the duke de Harcourt with a body of troops to guard the pass of Phalsburg, and prepared to march himself for the Rhine, at the head of twenty-six battalions and thirty three squadrons. He set out from Dunkirk on the nineteenth of July, and on the fourth of August arrived at Metz, the capital of Lorraine, where he made a magnificent entry. Here he received tidings of an event which changed the whole face of affairs, obliged prince Charles to repass the Rhine, restored the emperor to his dominions, and reduced the queen of Hungary to a more dangerous situation, if possible, than any she had yet been in.

The king of Prussia thinking his manifestos and rescripts had given a sufficient sanction for the renovation of hostilities on his part, resolved to make an irruption into Bohemia, conformable to the propositions of the court of Versailles, whenever prince Charles should appear too formidable on the Rhine. Although there were then in Saxony no less than forty thousand regular forces, yet his Prussian majesty seems to have had so contemptible an opinion of their valour or discipline, that he chose to make his invasion of Bohemia through that electorate, which he entered at the head of eighty-four thousand men in the month of July, attended by a formidable train of artillery, having under him in the command the prince of Anhalt-Dessau and marshal Schwerin. The Saxons suffered him to march unmolested. At the same time general Marwitz, with a separate body of twenty thousand Prussians, advanced thro' Silesia into Moravia; and though the Austrians had taken all possible care to retard the progress of both armies, by destroying the roads, bridges, and provisions, the Prussians soon made themselves masters of Pardubitz and Podiebrad.

The two armies having joined on the frontiers of Bohemia, his Prussian majesty entered that kingdom on the twenty-fifth of August; and having taken up his head-quarters at Peterſwald, he published a proclamation, which was dispersed through the country, importing, "That he had entered that kingdom as an auxiliary to the emperor, and with a view to restore the authority of that prince, the constitution of the empire, and the peace of Germany. He promised protection to all the Bohemians who should behave quietly and inoffensively, and deliver up their arms; but threatened those who should resist his army, which he affected to call the imperial auxiliary army, with all the rigours of military execution."

The king of Prussia, after the dispersing of this proclamation, continued his march, and made such rapid progress, that on the second of September he invested Prague, though his heavy artillery was not yet come up, and actually made himself master of some of the advanced posts. His artillery was, in the mean time, attacked by a detachment of Austrians, commanded by count Bathiani, who defeated the convoy; but the king having detached a party to recover it, the Austrians fled, and left them masters of the cannon. The next step his majesty took was to cut off all communication between the city and count Bathiani's army, which was effected after a bloody skirmish, wherein the Prussians gained the advantage. The outworks of Prague were now attacked, and carried without much opposition: in a word, after the new and old towns, and the Jews town, were partly reduced to ashes, general Ogilvy the governor once more surrendered the city (on the tenth day of its siege) with fifteen thousand men in the garrison, who were taken prisoners of war. Prince Frederic-William, the king's cousin, was killed at the first general attack, which was made in four different places.

As soon as the king had made himself master of Prague, wherein he put a garrison of six thousand men, he marched to Tabor, and took the towns of Budweis and Teyn, with the castle of Frauenberg, wherein was a considerable garrison, who were made prisoners of war. There was now nothing to oppose him in Bohemia. Moravia was at the same time invaded: one French army was returning into Germany, whilst another was victorious in Italy. Every one now imagined the king of Prussia would march to Vienna, prescribe laws to the queen of Hungary, and terminate the war by a division of the Austrian dominions.

But the victor found it more easy to make conquests than to retain them. The court of Vienna, immediately upon the irruption of the Prussians into Bohemia, had sent express orders to prince Charles to repass the Rhine, and hasten to the succour of that distressed country. The marshals Noailles and Belleisle had been successively sent by the French king to reinforce marshal Coigni, who thereby became superior to the Austrians under prince Charles. A dangerous fever which seized the French king soon after his arrival at Metz, and which brought him to death's door, had prevented him from conducting his troops in person; and marshal Noailles, to whom the command in Alsace now devolved in right of seniority, suffered prince Charles to repass the Rhine with very little molestation, although much superior to him him in numbers. He then marched to the Danube, laid the Upper Palatinate under contribution, and entering Bohemia, joined the troops under Bathiani. The king of Prussia complained most bitterly against the French generals for letting an enemy escape who was coming to wreak his vengeance upon one of their allies. By this time also the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, had openly declared in favour of her Hungarian majesty; and prince Charles of Lorraine had the satisfaction to find himself reinforced by twenty thousand Saxon troops, under the command of the duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, by which he was rendered superior to his Prussian majesty, whom he determined to attack. That monarch, however, retired before him, and the Prussians successively evacuated the different posts which conducted to Prague, and were in the end forced to evacuate that capital itself. After having disputed the passage of the Elbe, the king gave orders for the garrison, composed of eleven thousand men, to quit the town, which they did on the nineteenth of November, leaving behind them their magazines and heavy artillery, among which were seven remarkable fine pieces of cannon, called the Seven Electors. The Prussians carried with them their field artillery, and a great number of waggons laden with stores and contributions; but the Austrians and Saxons harrassing them in their march, great part of them fell into their hands, so that the king's troops were almost naked, and in great want of provisions and necessaries. At length, having gained Silesia, his Prussian majesty distributed his army into winter quarters, and he himself returned to Berlin, extremely mortified at the issue of the campaign.

During these transactions, count Seckendorff advanced into Bavaria at the head of a strong army, compelled the Austrians under general Bernklau to abandon that electorate, and the emperor once more entered his capital city of Munich on the 22d day of October. His Imperial majesty on the third of November appeared before Passau, and summoned cardinal Lamberg, the bishop, to admit a neutral garrison; but the prelate answered, that as the Austrians were in possession, it was not in his power to accede to the proposal: therefore his Imperial majesty, finding the season too far advanced to think of besieging such strong places as Passau and Ingoldstadt, and that general Bernklau had received a strong reinforcement out of Bohemia, dispersed his troops into winter-quarters as far as the Upper Palatinate, and returned to Munich on the seventeenth of December, with the satisfaction of seeing himself securely reinstated in his electoral dominions; a satisfaction, however, which he did not long live to enjoy.

General Bernklau did not follow the example of the Imperialists in retiring into winter-quarters; but being joined by general Thungen with a large reinforcement from Bohemia, he suddenly changed the face of affairs in Bavaria, seizing upon the greatest part of the Upper Palatinate. He also fortified and strongly garrisoned Stadt-am-hoff, a place of great importance for securing his quarters along the Danube. This general also, on the twentieth of December, invested Newmarck in the Upper Palatinate, where was a garrison of two thousand French and Imperialists, commanded by the marquis de Crussol, who, after a little resistance, surrendered the town, and his men prisoners of war. Hemen and Amberg next capitulated, by which the Austrians were now in possession of the whole Palatinate, where they remained quiet till the approaching spring again enabled them to resume their operations.

While count Seckendorff was on his march in Bavaria, the French marshals Noailles, Belleisle, and Coigni, at the head of eighty thousand men, entered the Austrian dominions in the circle of Suabia, where most of the places belonging to the queen of Hungary submitted, and on the twenty-first of September the French invested the strong and important city of Friburg, for which they had made the most formidable preparations. This city is capital of the territory of Brisgau, opposite to the Upper Alsace, situate twenty-eight miles south of Strasburg, and the same distance north from Basil, and was taken by marshal Villars in 1712, without any considerable resistance; but the French at this time expected an obstinate siege, from the known valour and abilities of general Damnitz, who commanded in the place with a garrison of five thousand veteran troops, well provided with every thing for maintaining a vigorous defence. The French monarch having recovered from his illness, which had so long confined him at Metz, in Lorraine, set out from thence in the beginning of October; and having in his way made a public entry into Strasburg, where his reception was one of the most magnificent ever beheld, he arrived in the camp before Friburg on the eleventh, where his majesty was attended by the marshals Noailles, Maillebois, Coigni, and Belleisle, marshal Schmectan the Prussian envoy, and the Saxon and Palatine ministers. Some little time before his arrival, Lewis had the good fortune to engage in his service, as a lieutenant-general, as great a genius in the art of besieging fortifications, as any that modern times have produced. This was the famous count Lowendahl, to whose intrepidity and skill the taking of the place was chiefly owing. General Damnitz made a gallant defence, disputing every inch of ground; and by his continual fire, frequent sallies, and the springing a great number of mines, made a terrible havock among the besiegers, who now, animated by the presence of their sovereign, redoubled their efforts with incredible fury; and their bombs, of which they had thrown no less than eleven thousand into the city, having reduced it to one common heap of ruins, the brave Damnitz was at length obliged to think of capitulating; and on the sixth day of November hung out a white flag, and went in person to the French camp, to treat with the king about the surrender of the city, and had liberty to retire to the castles, the governors of which were to have a reasonable time for knowing the sentiments of her Hungarian majesty, whether they should capitulate likewise, or hold out. The answer was for the latter; in consequence of which a fresh siege was begun, which continued till the twenty-eighth of November, when the garrison were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war. In this remarkable siege, which, to say the truth, demonstrated the French to be inferior to no nation in the world for power and courage, they lost upwards of eighteen thousand men. They found in the city and forts two hundred brass and one hundred iron cannon, seventy field-pieces, two hundred hundred mortars, and all other military stores in proportion. This conquest terminated the campaign in Germany. The French army was cantoned along the banks of the Rhine, under the command of marshal Maillebois, and Lewis returned to Versailles, where he was received by his people with a degree of joy and homage approaching to adoration.

I have already observed, that the situation of the French army in the Netherlands had for some time prevented the confederates from undertaking any thing of importance; but after the departure of the French troops for Alsace, count Saxe had only fifty-eight thousand men in the field, and twenty-two thousand in the garrisons, while the allies were augmented to ninety-four thousand men. The confederate generals finding their superiority, quitted their encampment, passed the Schelde on the twentieth, and advanced to Helchin, with an intention to draw count Saxe to an engagement; who, instead of accepting the offer, kept close in the strong entrenchments he had thrown up behind the Lys. The allies finding that they could not, with any prospect of success, attempt to attack him in this situation, fled off in sight of Tournay, and on the eighth of August encamped within four miles of Lisle, where they foraged unmolested for several days, and laid the open country under contribution; but they made no attempt upon Lisle itself, which in all probability would have submitted at the first summons, had they attacked it immediately on their approach, for then it had no other garrison than two or three battalions of militia; but count Saxe soon threw in so considerable a reinforcement as effectually to secure this important place. The conduct of the confederate generals was severely censured in England, and served as a matter of ridicule to the enemy. The truth is, that the English general, Wade, was superannuated; his partner in command, the duke of Aremberg, is said to have been unwilling to give umbrage to the French king, great part of his fortune lying within the territory of Lisle, where they were now encamped; the Dutch were averse to any bold enterprize; and the train of artillery was by some fatality retarded, and lay at Ostend. Add to this, that Wade and Aremberg were divided in their opinions, entertained an inveterate hatred and animosity against each other, and studiously avoided all manner of intercourse. In fine, after having remained some time in sight of Lisle, the confederates returned to their former camp on the Schelde, from whence they went into winter-quarters in the month of October; and count Saxe followed their example, having first abandoned Courtray, where he had demolished the fortifications. He afterwards sent a numerous body of his troops to assist in repairing the fortifications of Dunkirk, and also to fortify the sluice at Mardyke.

After the engagement off Toulon, nothing of importance was performed by the British squadron in the Mediterranean; and indeed the naval power of Great Britain was, during this summer, altogether inactive. We shall therefore attend a naval operation of the English in the other hemisphere, which is perhaps the most singular of any that history can produce. Mention has already been made of commodore Anson's destination with a small squadron in the autumn of the year 1740 to the South Seas, in order to distress the enemy there; and we conducted him as far as Port St. Julian, on the coast of Patagonia, where he arrived in the month of January 1741*, reserving the narrative of the rest of his achievements to this year, in which, on the fifteenth day of June, he returned from his voyage of three years and nine months, after having made the circuit of the terraqueous globe.

The secret of this expedition to the South Seas appears to have been so ill kept, that the Spaniards were apprised of all the particulars concerning it, long before it sailed from England; and had fitted out a squadron of five sail of the line and two frigates, under the command of admiral Don Joseph Pizarro, on purpose to defeat it. Had this fleet, which was every way superior to Mr. Anson, been able to have performed its voyage, the success of that officer might have been very indifferent; but by various accidents, the whole of the Spanish armament was reduced to one sixty-six gun ship, which was at length obliged to return to Europe.

While the commodore was in the bay of St. Julian he held a council of war, wherein he fixed the plan of his future operations; and after having coasted along the cold and desert country of Patagonia, he entered the Straights of Le Maire about the end of February 1741: but here the commodore lost sight of the Pearl and Severn, two of his great ships, and never saw them more during his voyage; they having been unable to weather Cape Horn, returned to Europe, having first been refitted at Rio de Janeiro in Brazil: in short, the commodore now saw his whole strength reduced (to use the words of the relator of the voyage) to a couple of shattered, half-manned cruizers, and a sloop, so far disabled, that in many climates they scarcely durst have put to sea. It was the thirtieth of November before the commodore completed his passage round Cape Horn, after surmounting difficulties which affect us with horror in the very relation. Upon doubling the Cape, his little squadron was again shattered and dispersed by violent tempests; one half of the men perished aboard by an inveterate scurvy; the commodore's ship being separated from the rest, put into the island of Juan Fernandez† on the ninth of June, where they were afterwards joined by the Trial sloop and the Gloucester, three of his own ships being yet missing: the Anna Pink came in about the middle of August, and Mr. Anson sent the Trial sloop to Mala Fuera, about twenty-two leagues to the west of Juan Fernandez, in quest of the missing ships, but to no purpose. In the meantime, the people who were landed on the island recovered surprisingly; and nothing was omitted by the commodore that could contribute to their health, security, † Fernandez, or Juan Fernandez, is a small uninhabited island of Chili, in South America, lying in the Pacific Ocean, three hundred miles west of St. Jago, visited by all European ships that go into the South Seas, on account of its harbour, the fruits, herbs, and other provisions to be met with on it. The editor of Lord Anson's Voyage places this island in the latitude of 33 degrees 40 minutes south, and 110 leagues west from the continent of Chili.

We have already observed that the Severn and Pearl were parted from the squadron; the Wager, a twenty gun ship, captain Cheap, had come with the commodore into the South Seas, but had been separated from him in one of those dreadful storms the squadron had encountered, and was unfortunately wrecked on the desolate island of Socoro; but the crew, to the number of one hundred, were all of them saved. Imagining, however, that the authority of their officers had determined with the loss of the ship, they began to mutiny; and having confined the captain, and converted the long-boat into a schooner, eighty of them actually set sail for Rio Grande on the coast of Brazil, where, after their number had been more than one half diminished by sickness, they at last arrived, in the month of January 1742. Cheap, with the small number who remained behind, found means to be conveyed to Chiloe, from thence to Valparaíso, and afterwards to St. Jago, the capital of Chili: there they continued upwards of a year, till at length a cartel being settled between the two nations, they were permitted to return to their own country.

Mr. Anson had now with him the Centurion, the Gloucester, the Trial sloop, and the Anna Pink, which latter was loaded with provisions; and the surviving hands being perfectly recovered, he put to sea on the eighth of September, and took several considerable prizes in cruising near the island of Fernandez: but having soon after advanced towards the equator, he ventured to attack the city of Paíta, upon the same coast of America, where he had learned from the prisoners taken on board one of his prizes, that a large sum of money was at that very time lodged in the custom-house, belonging to the Spanish merchants, and intended to be shipped on board a vessel then in that port. In executing this bold and hazardous enterprize, he neither made use of his ships nor of the land forces on board them, but sent no more than fifty-eight of his own seamen, commanded by his lieutenant, Mr. (since sir Piercy) Brett. These were ordered into boats, and taking advantage of the night, landed unperceived. The sudden surprize, the confusion, and the darkness, added to the shout the sailors set up on entering the town, spread universal terror through the inhabitants, who, with their governor, abandoned the place with the utmost precipitation, thinking a whole army was at their heels. In the mean time the English, without being molested, carried off the treasures which they found in the custom-house and private dwellings. Mr. Anson then caused the town to be set on fire, which was quickly consumed. The loss which the Spaniards sustained by this expedition was much greater than the advantage the English made, for it amounted to about a million and an half of dollars; but the booty of the English did not exceed forty thousand pounds.

Having thus plundered the Spaniards with as much ease as they in past ages had plundered the Americans, the commodore now prepared to sail with all expedition to the southern parts of California, or to the adjacent coast of Mexico, there to cruize for the Manilla galleon, which he knew was then at sea, bound for the port of Acapulco, there to convert her lading into treasure. It was then about the middle of November, and the galleon did not usually arrive at Acapulco till the end of January. By cross winds and bad weather it was the nineteenth of February, 1742, before the English squadron arrived off Acapulco, which lies at the beach of Mexico. The court of Madrid was not then aware of the risk it ran of losing that vast region of the world. Had admiral Vernon, who besieged Carthage upon the opposite sea, succeeded, he might have assisted Mr. Anson, which was easy to be done over the Isthmus of Darien. Thus Panama would have been taken by the English both upon the right and left, and the Spaniards deprived of the very center of their American dominions.

The commodore, on his arrival off Acapulco, had the disagreeable intelligence that the Manilla ship had anchored in that harbour on the ninth day of January; that she had converted her cargo into money, and was to have sailed again on the fourteenth of March; but that, upon his squadron having been discovered by the Spaniards, the governor of Acapulco had countermanded her departure for that season.

The commodore had now a most unfortunate prospect; the rainy season approached, and he had nothing left but to cross the vast Pacific Ocean for the river Canton in China. The Trial was now grown so leaky that she was no longer able to swim, and was therefore scuttled and sunk, as were the prizes which had been taken, and the crews were put on board the Gloucester and Centurion. With these two only remaining ships (the Anne store-ship having been discharged and sent home) the commodore stretched away for the river Canton, which he was in hopes of reaching in about two months; but the elements still continued his implacable adversaries. To add to his distress, the Gloucester sprung an irreparable leak at sea, and the commodore was obliged to take her crew into the Centurion, and burn her. This last named ship was now the only one that was left of his whole squadron, and she was in a most shattered condition. Incredible were the miseries and hardships Mr. Anson and his crew suffered from the leakiness of their vessel, and the scorbutic disorder which raged amongst them with the most alarming violence. At last, towards the end of August, they fortunately made one of the Marian or Ladrone islands*, called Tinian, which was at that time quite uninhabited. Not long before, it con-

* These islands, situate in the Pacific Ocean or South Sea, were first discovered by Ferdinand Magellan, a Portuguese, whom the emperor Charles V. and the king of Spain employed to discover a western passage to the East Indies, on the sixth of March, 1520; when touching at the isle of Guam, one of the most southerly of these islands, for water and fresh provisions, the natives pilfered some of his goods, whence he called them the Ladrone, or Thievish Islands. Guam, lying in the tract to the Philippines and East Indies, is still the most frequented by the European nations; and here the Spaniards have a little fort, with a garrison of thirty men. It is about forty miles in length, and ten in breadth.

tained no less than thirty thousand souls; but the greatest part of the inhabitants had been swept away by an epidemic disease, and the survivors had been removed to Guam, another island, by the Spaniards. Here, upon mustering the whole of their able hands, including some negroes and Indian prisoners, they amounted to no more than seventy-one.

The whole crew owed its preservation to this island, which, according to the account published in Mr. Anson's Voyage, was the most delicious spot imagination can form. It surpassed Juan Fernandez in fertility, abounded on all sides with woods, springs, and rivulets, tame animals, fruits, pulse, and every thing necessary for food, the conveniences of life, and for refitting the vessel: but the most extraordinary thing found there was a sort of tree, the taste of whose fruit resembled that of the best bread: a real treasure to persons in their condition!

It was the middle of October before the commodore was in a condition to put to sea again; and on the 12th of November, after a great variety of other adventures, too numerous to be inserted here, he arrived at Macao, which is a Portuguese settlement, situate in an island at the entrance of the river of Canton, but entirely under the power of the Chinese. Here he had an opportunity of maintaining the honour of his country, by refusing to pay the imposts exacted by the emperor of China from all foreign ships. He insisted that no British ship of war was subject to them. His coolness and intrepidity staggered the Chinese. The viceroy of Canton granted him an audience, to which he was conducted through two ranks of soldiers, to the number of ten thousand; after which the viceroy gave orders for his ship to be hove down, refitted, and furnished with provisions and stores, to enable him to proceed to England.

By the fifteenth of April, 1743, his ship was in a condition to put to sea; and having taken on board some Lascars, or Indian sailors, and some Dutch, whom he thought might be useful to him, he set sail with a full determination to go in search of the Manila ship or ships, which he had reason to believe were at this season of the year returning from Acapulco. By the last of May the Centurion arrived off Cape Espiritu Santo, on the island of Samal, in the direct tract of the Manila ship. At length, upon the twentieth of June, the so much wished-for vessel was descried. This ship, called the Nosra Senhora de Cabadonga, was mounted with forty guns; and the treasure, with other effects on board, amounted to three hundred and thirteen thousand pounds sterling. The Centurion, though mounting sixty guns, had but two hundred and twenty-seven men on board. The captain of the galleon chose rather to venture the loss of the treasure than forfeit his reputation by flying from an enemy. Accordingly, an engagement ensued, in which the resolution and skill of the English overbalanced all the superiority of the Spaniards; and the galleon struck, and surrendered into the commodore's hands, after having sixty-seven men killed and eighty-four wounded; while the Centurion lost only two men, and had one lieutenant and sixteen hands wounded. The conqueror returned with this rich prize to Canton, where, after having refitted his ship, and supplied himself with all the necessaries of which he stood in need, he prepared to return to his native country, to taste the sweet reward of all his toils and labour. Before his departure from Canton, he sold the hulk of the galleon to the merchants of Macao. On the eleventh of March, 1744, he arrived at the Cape of Good Hope; and having, by favour of a fog, unknown to himself, run through a fleet of French ships, he arrived safely at Spithead in the month of June, from whence his treasure was brought up in great triumph to London, attended by those brave seamen who had so well merited, by their unparalleled sufferings and perseverance, the share they were entitled to in it.

There yet remain to be noticed some other naval transactions of the year 1744. The Mediterranean fleet being in the utmost necessity for stores and provisions, a considerable number of vessels, laden with these articles, were ordered to be convoyed thither by sir Charles Hardy, vice-admiral of the red, with a squadron of eleven ships of the line, and one bomb-ketch. The vice-admiral, with the store ships, set sail from St. Helen's on the eighteenth of April, and conducted his convoy to Lisbon, where he was detained a considerable time by a squadron of fourteen sail of the line and six frigates, sent from Brest for that purpose, commanded by M. Rochambault, who cruized off the Rock of Lisbon to intercept sir Charles, in case he should attempt to put to sea. As soon as this was known to the British ministry, they ordered sir John Balchen, who commanded a large fleet at Spithead, having under him vice-admiral Martin and vice-admiral Stewart, to sail with the first favourable wind, and proceed in quest of the Brest squadron, to disengage sir Charles Hardy from his detention at Lisbon. While sir John was putting himself in a condition to obey these orders, he was reinforced by the Dutch squadron of twenty men of war, commanded by admiral Bacchereft, which their High Mightinesses had at length consented to send, in consequence of his Britannic majesty's repeated requisition, and agreeable to the treaty of 1697. On the seventh of August the combined fleets sailed from Spithead, to the number of twenty-one sail of the line (a proper number being left behind for the Channel and port service) and on the ninth of September cast anchor off the Rock of Lisbon. Monsieur Rochambault, the French commandant, upon receiving intelligence that the combined fleets were arrived on the coast, and were so much superior to him in force, thought proper to retire, and leave the sea entirely open to them. By this means sir Charles Hardy was at liberty to proceed according to his destination; but admiral Balchen, after having thus performed the duty he was sent upon, and being upon his return home, was, on the third of October, overtaken in the Bay of Biscay with a violent storm of wind, in which his own ship, the Victory, of one hundred and ten guns, and esteemed the finest first-rate in Europe, foundered on the Caskets, a large and dangerous reef of rocks off Alderney; and this brave commander perished, with all his officers and crew, amounting to between eleven and twelve hundred choice seamen: among these were fifty gentlemen volunteers, of some of the best families in England. The rest of the fleet with great difficulty escaped from the fury of the tempest, and got safe into Spithead.

On the fifth of May this year commodore Barret, with a squadron of two ships of sixty guns, one of fifty, and one of twenty, was dispatched to the East Indies, to protect the British trade and settlements there. On his arrival there, he made prize of several French ships richly laden, and otherwise greatly annoyed the enemy.

The naval war in America produced nothing material between the British and Spanish squadrons, under the command of sir Chaloner Ogle and admiral de Torres, whose squadrons were much of an equality, and continued in their former situation; the first remaining at Port Royal in Jamaica, and the other lying before the walls of the Havannah: but towards the end of this year the Spanish admiral made amends for this inactivity, by bringing under his convoy to Spain a most immense treasure, leaving at the Havannah seven men of war for its defence and the protection of the Spanish trade.

Commodore Warren, who was stationed with a squadron for the protection of the Leeward Islands, took several valuable prizes from the French, and cut off several ships bound with provisions to Martinico, whereby that island was reduced to the utmost distress. In the month of July deputy-governor Hodge, of the island of Anguilla, one of the Caribbees, drove the French out of their half of the island of St. Martin's; and the inhabitants of St. Bartholomew, another of those islands, declared themselves his Britannic majesty's subjects. In North America the French took and burnt our fort of Canso in Nova Scotia, after making the garrison prisoners of war.

On the twentieth of October this year the island of Jamaica was visited by a most dreadful hurricane, which proved very fatal to the shipping there, as well as to the island in general. Six men of war were lost, and upwards of ninety merchant ships. Fortunately sir Chaloner Ogle, with some of the largest ships under his command, was at the time of the hurricane upon a cruise.

A very great number of rich French and Spanish prizes were taken this year by our fleets and cruizers; so that at the conclusion thereof, the balance from Spain, since the commencement of the war with that crown, was one million nine hundred and thirty thousand pounds in our favour: and for this year, the first of the war with France, there remained a surplus on our side of seven hundred and seventy-three thousand pounds; and it was computed we had above eleven thousand French seamen prisoners in England. Many of our ships, however, were taken; and the British navy in particular sustained a considerable loss, by the capture and wrecking of several of its fine ships, particularly the Northumberland man of war of seventy guns, which was taken by three French ships of war and carried into Brest, after her commander, captain Watson, two of his lieutenants, and several of his men, had fallen in the engagement. The fatal loss of the Victory was followed by that of the Colchester of fifty guns, which was wrecked upon the Sands, between the Long Sands and the Kentish Knock, and forty of her crew perished, the captain and the rest being saved by boats from Harwich.

Let me now recapitulate the other transactions of this busy year. On the twentieth of June a pension of four thousand pounds per annum was granted to Robert earl of Orford (late sir Robert Walpole) in consideration of his long and faithful services. He did not, however, long enjoy this mark of his royal master's esteem, dying in the March following. Though he had for such a length of time directed the application of the public treasure, his circumstances were not affluent. He was liberal in his disposition, and had many dependants to gratify; so that little was left for his own private occasions. The reader has already seen his character as a minister: as a private man, he was universally beloved and esteemed; and tho' he resigned his places, he never lost a friend. In his retirement he gave a noble proof of his gratitude and loyalty, by using all his interest to promote the service of his majesty, and never engaging in any opposition that could embarrass it.

This year was also distinguished by the deaths of several remarkable persons, particularly, of Sarah, duchess-dowager of Marlborough, relict of the famous John duke of Marlborough, who, if we except Catherine empress of Russia, was the greatest female favourite of fortune that her age produced; but the most extraordinary thing relating to her was, that though the more than princely estate she left was acquired wholly by the power of the Whigs, with whom both the duke and herself were constantly and closely connected, she was, to the day of her death, in her heart attached to the family of the late king James; and she had even brought her husband, in king William's time, under some difficulties on that account.

Street robberies were arrived to an enormous height towards the close of this year: the robbers marched in bands, armed with pistols, cutlasses, and bludgeons; and were so daring as even to plunder and maim people in broad day-light, till, by proper rewards and vigorous measures, a stop was put to such notorious villanies.

On the fourth day of December the marshal duke of Belleisle, and his brother the chevalier, happened, in their way to the imperial court, to stop at the village of Elbingrode, dependent on the electorate of Hanover, but which they, from misinformation, supposed to be in the territories of his Prussian majesty. There they were arrested by the bailiff of that place, and conducted as prisoners of war to Osterode, from whence they were removed to Stadt on the Elbe, and thence brought over to England, where they arrived on the ninth of December. They resided at Windsor till the summer of the ensuing year, when they were allowed the benefit of the cartel, which had been settled between Great Britain and France at Frankfurt, and released accordingly.

A similar accident happened this year to the earl of Holderneffe, who had been lately sent ambassador to the republic of Venice. His Excellency taking the route of Franconia, was stopped in the month of September by a party of Imperialists, within two posts of Nuremberg: upon which the earl wrote to the count de St. Germain, who commanded a large detachment of imperial troops at some leagues distance, complaining of the insult that had been offered to his character, by a power with whom his master was not at war. The French general replied, that his Excellency was at full liberty to proceed on his journey, provided he would give a letter of reversal, promising to return and submit to his arrest, in case the imperial court should should adjudge him to be a prisoner of war. The earl agreed to the proposal; but the emperor, as soon as he was informed of the affair, ordered his letter of reversal to be returned, and the officer who stopped his Excellency to ask his pardon.

The British cabinet continued still to be agitated by violent dissensions among the members who composed it. The great influence which lord Carteret, the prime minister, enjoyed with his sovereign, raised the jealousy of those who were distinguished by the name of patriots; and the obsequious attention he manifested on all occasions to the views of the court, had ruined him in the good opinion of the populace. The duke of Newcastle and his brother Mr. Pitt, who were possessed of a very powerful interest in parliament, engaged in a political alliance with the leading men in the opposition, against the prime minister. This coalition, in compliance probably with the prevailing taste of the English, who are remarkably fond of distinguishing party epithets, was named "The Broad Bottom," to express its being established on a true constitutional basis, comprehending persons of all parties indiscriminately, whose talents and integrity seemed to fit them for the service of the public. This appellation, however, like most others of the same kind, was afterwards converted into a term of derision. Lord Carteret, who was by this time become earl of Granville, in consequence of his mother's death, foreseeing that his continuance in the ministry would only tend to the embarrassment of his majesty's service and his own continual disquiet, very prudently made a voluntary resignation of his employments. The seals of secretary of state were then given to the earl of Harrington. The duke of Bedford was appointed first lord of the treasury; and the earl of Chesterfield, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and ambassador-extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the States-general. Mr. Doddington was made treasurer of the navy; the privy-seal was returned to lord Gower: even sir John Hynde Cotton was favoured with a place at court, being made treasurer of the chamber. Mr. Lyttleton was admitted into the treasury; and sir John Phillips to the board of trade and plantations, though he soon after resigned this employment. The duke of Devonshire was made lord-steward of the household, in the room of the duke of Dorset, who succeeded the earl of Harrington as president of the council, on that nobleman's being made secretary of state. It was not till Christmas that these alterations were publicly known; and the nation quickly perceived it to be a change of men rather than of measures. The sovereign, however, found his ease and advantage in it, his views being no longer thwarted by an opposition in parliament.

In the mean while, the parliament assembling on the twenty-eighth day of November, his majesty opened the session with a speech to both houses, in which he recapitulated the transactions and events of the current year, such as have been already related. "He applauded the constancy and resolution of her Hungarian majesty, and the firmness and magnanimity of the king of Sardinia. At the same time he acknowledged, that the event of the last campaign had not entirely answered his wishes. Nevertheless, he declared himself determined, in conjunction with his allies, and with their effectual support, and the assistance of his parliament, to carry on the war in such a manner as might be most conducive to a safe and honourable peace: and concluded with observing, that towards accomplishing the salutary purposes he had in view, nothing could be more effectual than the unanimity and dispatch of his parliament in conducting the public business."

The plan of removals and promotions being now fixed, there was the most perfect harmony in both houses, and there was scarcely a division heard of during the session. The usual patriot bills (as they were called) for the repeal of septennial parliaments, the purging the parliament of placemen, the remission of the most unpopular taxes, and the like, were indeed moved for, but met with their usual fate of being rejected; and nothing was wanting on the part of the new ministry to convince his majesty that they were in earnest to carry on the war. New levies for land and sea were ordered, and the commons voted six millions and an half for the service of the year 1745, to be raised by the land, the malt, and salt taxes, the sinking fund, and an additional duty on foreign wines.

In the beginning of the year 1745, the earl of Chesterfield set out on his embassy to the States-general, having in charge to persuade that phlegmatic people, if possible, to engage heartily in the war; a point in which his lordship almost despaired of succeeding; yet his eloquence and address was not wholly lost: for though he could not bring them to become principals in the quarrel about the Austrian succession, he brought them to settle their quota of troops, fleets, and subsidies.

The new ministry having agreed upon the expediency of carrying on the war in favour of the queen of Hungary, thought it was requisite to prosecute it in the most vigorous manner; and that for this purpose a general ought to be employed, who might be above all dread of ministerial power, and possessed of sufficient authority to direct the allies in their operations. On this occasion they cast their eyes on the duke of Cumberland, who had given unquestionable proofs not only of his courage, but likewise of his knowledge in the military art. Accordingly, on the twelfth day of March, his royal highness was constituted captain-general and commander in chief of all his majesty's forces.

Some little time before his majesty had acquainted his parliament of his having concluded a treaty of quadruple alliance, in conjunction with the queen of Hungary and the States-general. By this treaty, which was signed at Warsaw on the eighth of January, "the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, confirmed and renewed the guaranty of the pragmatic sanction, and promised to support it with all his forces. It was further stipulated, that, as the kingdom of Bohemia was actually attacked, his Polish majesty should send to its defence an army of thirty thousand auxiliary troops; that his Britannic majesty and the States-general should pay to that prince an annual subsidy of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling; two thirds to be furnished by Great Britain, and one third by the United Provinces: that as soon as Bohemia and Saxony should be free from danger, his Polish majesty should march ten thousand men to the Netherlands, or to any other place within the empire, which the king of Great Britain and

and the States-general should think most proper: for which a subsidy of ninety thousand pounds should be continued to be paid, according to the former proportions: that if, in consequence of these measures, his Polish majesty should draw a war upon himself, he should be supported by all his allies: that no peace should be made without his consent, and without procuring for him proper satisfaction; and that the emperors of Russia, the republic of Poland, and all the other powers of Europe, should be invited to accede to this treaty, which was to continue after the war was concluded."

A great alteration was expected in the European system by the demise of the emperor Charles VII. which happened on the ninth of January. This occasioned his Britannic majesty to take a resolution of speedily visiting his German dominions, as his presence might contribute to the tranquillity of Europe, and re-establish the imperial dignity in the house of Austria. The parliamentary business being dispatched, his majesty on the second of May went to the house of peers, and concluded the session with a gracious speech from the throne, acquainting the two houses with his intention of going out of the kingdom for a short time.

Many excellent bills for the internal good of Great Britain passed this session, particularly, a bill to prevent excessive and deceitful gaming, and to restrain and prevent the excessive increase of horse races; another, to prevent the pernicious practice of smuggling, which of late years was arrived to such a height as bid defiance to all government; another for encouraging the British linen-manufacture; and another to prevent the importation of cambrics and French lawns. His majesty the same day nominated a regency to administer the affairs of government during his absence, and the day following (May 3) embarked at Gravesend on board the Caroline yacht for Holland, where he was convoyed by a squadron under the command of Mr. Anson, now created a rear-admiral, and landed at Helvoetsluys on the twelfth, from whence his majesty proceeded directly for Hanover.

In the mean time, in order to give an additional effect to the negociation of the earl of Chesterfield at the Hague, and to quicken the resolution of the States-general in favour of the common cause, his majesty was pleased to order the baron Schwigeldt, his Hanoverian minister at the Hague, to declare in his name, that he was willing to be considered as a principal in the war as elector of Hanover, and to furnish thereto his contingent of German troops, independent of the other succours he, as king of Great Britain, intended to give to the queen of Hungary.

This declaration of his Britannic majesty was the more magnanimous, as the events of the last campaign had proved so unfavourable to the house of Austria. Maillebois was still in Germany, at the head of a numerous army, with which he overawed the neutral princes, and oppressed the friends of her Hungarian majesty. The revenues of that princess were greatly exhausted, by the expence she had incurred by maintaining her forces. Her loss of territories in Silesia and Flanders was far from being compensated by the few advantages, and the subsidies she received from Great Britain were altogether unequal to her necessities. On the other hand, France increased in power, in proportion as her difficulties increased: the money they had received from Spain, and the funds they had invented for increasing the royal revenue, had enabled them to make great preparations for continuing the war another campaign: but notwithstanding these favourable circumstances, the death of Charles VII. entirely disconcerted their plan of politics, and dissolved the league of Frankfort, which had hitherto served them, as an excellent pretext for prosecuting their ambitious purposes, under the mark of supporting the imperial dignity.

Upon the death of the emperor it was believed, that as the cause of the war no longer subsisted, peace would be restored to Europe. They could not offer the empire to the young elector of Bavaria, son of the deceased Charles VII. as he was then but seventeen years of age. However, the court of France continued to pay the subsidy to his electoral highness. The princes of Germany flattered themselves that the queen of Hungary would seek for peace, as the surest means of placing her husband, the grand duke of Tuscany, upon the imperial throne: but her majesty was determined, that her endeavours to procure the dignity for her consort should in no wise retard the military operations, which she was resolved to continue. The English ministry, who gave the law to their allies, by being the general pay-masters, thought they should be losers by a peace, and gainers by protracting the war. The king of France, on the other hand, would not abandon his son-in-law the infant Don Philip, in Italy, the young elector of Bavaria in Germany, or the king of Prussia, who was returned to his old alliance. Thus the general war continued, though the object of it was no longer the same.

The court of France now cast an eye upon the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, as a proper person for the imperial crown. He was not only qualified to aspire to this dignity, but he might likewise render it subservient to the enriching his family with a part of the Austrian inheritance, which he had at first attempted to acquire by the sword: at least, by detaching him from his new alliance with that house, there was a probability of strengthening the king of Prussia, and of compelling her Hungarian majesty to accept of terms of peace: but that able minister, count Bruhl, who now managed the affairs of Saxony, clearly seeing thro' the delusive proposals of the French court, persuaded his master, the king of Poland, that he would find it very difficult, if not impossible, to keep the crown of Poland, if he accepted of the empire, as the republic of Poland would be afraid of having in him too powerful a chief; and his majesty would thereby run the risk of losing a throne which he might secure to his posterity; and that, after all, he was not sure of carrying his point in competition with the grand duke of Tuscany. In short, whether his Polish majesty thought himself not strong enough, or whether he was restrained by the treaties of Vienna, Dresden, and Warsaw, which had connected him with England and the queen of Hungary; or, lastly, whether he was convinced by the arguments of his minister, and terrified by the example of the late elector elector of Bavaria, who was a tragical instance, that a grandeur not founded on intrinsic strength, is oftentimes rather a humiliation; instead of making any pretensions to the empire, he entered into a more intimate union with the queen of Hungary, and used his utmost endeavours to place the imperial crown on her husband's head.

France, disappointed on this quarter, would willingly have held out the imperial bait to his Prussian majesty, had she not been convinced of having irremediably incurred his resentment and indignation, by suffering prince Charles to repass the Rhine, and deprive him of all his conquests in Bohemia: she therefore, on the emperor's death, declared, that as the treaty of Frankfort was now dissolved, she was ready to agree to proposals for a general pacification, and not to intermeddle in the election of an emperor. But her Hungarian majesty, who still imagined she should be able at last to dethrone the king of Naples, to recover Silesia, and to beat the French in Flanders, would listen to no terms of accommodation; in which resolution she was not a little confirmed, by the inclination the English discovered for trying the event of another campaign, and the firm attachment their monarch shewed to her interests. The French had now no other resource left but in arms, and to await the issue of the different fluctuating interests which kept Europe in continual alarms.

Lewis XV. had taken the resolution to act upon the defensive in Germany, and upon the offensive in Flanders and Italy; and accordingly he undertook in person to finish the conquests in the Austrian Netherlands, in which he had been interrupted during the preceding year. In the month of February this year he married his eldest son, the dauphin, to the second infant of Spain, in order to cement his connections with that crown: and this young prince, who had not yet completed his sixteenth year, prepared to set out in the beginning of May along with his father. Before the king's departure, marshal Saxe went to take upon him the command of the army in Flanders, which was to consist of one hundred and six battalions, and one hundred and seventy-two squadrons, with seventeen independent companies; so that the whole army, had every thing been complete, would have amounted to ninety-eight thousand men; but as they were greatly deficient, the total amount did not exceed seventy-six thousand men. This army was provided with a train of one hundred and sixty pieces of heavy artillery.

Marshal Saxe, who commanded this army till the arrival of the sovereign, was the eldest of the natural children of the late Augustus II. king of Poland, by Aurora countess of Konigsmark, one of the most celebrated beauties of her age. The marshal had entirely devoted himself to the use of arms: he entered early into the service of France; and by his distinguished bravery justly attained to the highest step of military preferment. The reputation of this general, and the resolution of their monarch to make this campaign, invited the flower of the French nobility to take the field; so that the marshal found himself joined by the dukes de Chartres and Penthièvre, the prince de Dombes, count de Clermont, and count d'Eu; all five princes of the blood royal of France. He also found himself at the head of twenty-two lieutenant-generals and forty-five major-generals, of the most distinguished rank, fortune, and reputation, eager to signalize themselves, being filled with the most sanguine hopes of success, from their great superiority over the allies, whose united forces amounted to no more than fifty-three thousand men.

The duke of Cumberland, as commander in chief, arrived at the Hague on the seventh day of April; and after holding a conference with the States, he posted to Brussels, where he found prince Waldeck, commander of the Dutch troops, and marshal count Konigsegg, the general of the Austrians. William duke of Cumberland was now entering into the twenty-fourth year of his age: he was by nature, brave; and by a close application to the study of the military art, had acquired those lights which others gain only by experience: endowed with sentiments worthy of his high birth, and blessed with the happy talent of conciliating alike the love and esteem of both officers and private men, the allies with pleasure invested him with the extension of the chief command over the whole confederate army. Full of that vivacity so natural to his years, his royal highness disdained the boasted superiority of the French, whose advantage indeed principally lay in the sagacity and experience of their commanders more than in their numbers.

Marshal Saxe having made several feigned marches, which kept the allies in suspense, and seemed sometimes to threaten Aeth, and sometimes Mons, all on a sudden sat down, on the twenty-fourth day of April, before Tournay, on the river Schelde, which was defended by a Dutch garrison of eight thousand men, commanded by baron Dorth. Tournay was one of the masterpieces of the great Vauban, and supposed to be one of the strongest places of the Dutch barrier. The raising of this siege, therefore, appeared to the confederates a point of the highest importance. Accordingly, his royal highness the duke of Cumberland marched immediately from Brussels to Soignies, in the province of Hainault, within twelve miles of Tournay; and continuing his route, encamped on the twenty-ninth of April at Brusseel, with his right at Bougnies, and his left at Montbray, within little more than musket-shot of the advanced posts of the French. Marshal Saxe had foreseen the intention of the allies, and had made the most excellent dispositions by entrenchments and batteries, in which he was greatly assisted by the nature of the ground.

The two armies were separated only by a rivulet, which lay on the left of the allies, and by copes and hedges on the right, which the French had lined with their Grassins, supported by several squadrons drawn up on a plain, that rose by a gentle ascent to their camp, which extended on the brow of the eminence from the village of St. Antoin towards the wood of Barri, which lay on their left; and was secured by lines filled with light troops. At St. Antoin they had erected a most dreadful battery; in their center was another battery; and between them lay the village of Fontenoy intrenched, and most formidably fortified: this latter village is situated about three miles S. E. of Tournay. The French monarch accompanied by the Dauphin, arrived in the camp before Tournay on the 28th of April.

The French king took his station at the bridge of Calonne, close by the village of St. Antoin; the bridge was lined with cannon, strengthened with entrenchments, and defended by a battalion of guards, another of Swifs, and three of militia, to facilitate the retreat of the king and the Dauphin, in case of any unlucky accident. In a word, never was army better secured than that of the French; nor could any troops attack under more disadvantageous circumstances than those of the combined armies did.

The first object of the allies was to drive the French from all their little posts, so as to get into the plain, and this service fell to the share of the English. Accordingly on the 30th of April, six battalions and twelve squadrons, with five hundred pioneers, six pieces of cannon, and ten haubitzers, were detached from each wing for that purpose, and after an obstinate struggle the enterprise succeeded; the army were dislodged from all their posts, and repulsed to the heights near their camp, where they drew up afresh, and began to form new entrenchments. The confederate generals then went upon the ground from which the French had been driven, and, having carefully surveyed it, came to a resolution to attack the enemy early next morning, which was the first day of May.

The right wing, composed of English and Hanoverians, was ordered to form in four lines before the village of Vezon, on this side of Barri wood; the left wing, consisting of Dutch and Austrians, was commanded to advance in three columns; the first to march by the village of Vezon, the second through the heart of it, and the third to stretch into the plain between Fontenoy and St. Antoin. Prince Waldeck, with his Dutch, undertook to attack the former of these places. In order to facilitate these operations, the duke of Cumberland commanded brigadier Ingoldsby, with four battalions, and three six-pounders, to attack a fort in the front of the village of Vezon, which was mounted with cannon. Lieutenant-general Sir James Campbell was ordered to cover the infantry of the right wing, commanded by lieutenant-general Sir John (since earl) Ligonier; and Sir James had instructions to extend himself along the plain, from Barri wood towards the village of Fontenoy; an expedient which would have greatly forwarded prince Waldeck's attack: but the success of the whole depended chiefly upon Ingoldsby's carrying the fort at Vezon.

About nine in the morning the engagement began, at the very beginning of which Sir James Campbell's leg was taken off by a cannon ball, which put an end to his life. By the confusion occasioned by this accident, and the dreadful fire made by the enemy, the English infantry under Sir John Ligonier were left terribly exposed, but were, nevertheless, formed with the greatest dispatch; and the duke of Cumberland putting himself at their head, marched up to the attack of the left wing of the French at St. Antoin, while prince Waldeck, with the Hanoverians and twelve battalions of Dutch, moved at the same time to assault Fontenoy. The British infantry under their duke, drove the French beyond their lines. Upon this, count Saxe ordered his cavalry to advance, while the infantry, which had been formed a-new, opened a concealed battery that swept off whole ranks of our troops at a time; notwithstanding which the English stood firm, and kept up their fire with an intrepidity that struck the enemy with astonishment: and had Ingoldsby succeeded in his attack upon Vezon, which he unfortunately missed by making so long delay in consulting with his officers in what manner it should be done, that marshal Saxe had time to strengthen the fort with a number of additional troops and cannon, the English must have carried the day, the ill success of which was in great measure owing to this delay; or had the Dutch under prince Waldeck done their duty, the French king and his son would, in all probability, have been taken prisoners; but the duke being obliged to march through a hollow-way, commanded by the fort that Ingoldsby should have taken, the English were thereby exposed to all the fire from that battery, as well as to a great number of cross fires, which plied them on all hands, and did prodigious execution. At the same time the Dutch behaved with the most shameful pusillanimity, and instead of supporting the Austrians in the attack of Fontenoy (to which prince Waldeck twice led them with the greatest courage) fled from the field with the utmost precipitation. To add to these disasters, the cavalry forbore to advance to cover the flank of the English infantry, so that his royal highness the duke, unable longer to stand the prodigious fire of the French batteries, to which he was now left exposed on all sides, was obliged to give back in some disorder.

He soon rallied his troops however, who, returning to the charge with redoubled ardour, repulsed the enemy to their camp with a terrible slaughter; but so great was the diminution of the British troops by the perpetual firing of the French artillery, which took them both in front and flank, that being wholly unsupported by the left wing, while the enemy brought up the Irish brigade, and household troops (who were fresh for action, not having yet engaged) to attack them in flank, they began to stagger, nor could support the violence of so rude a shock, and were obliged to retire a second time. The French cavalry endeavoured to break them in their retreat, but were so well received by the British guards, and major-general Zastrow of the Hanoverian troops, that the regiment of Noailles was almost destroyed.

About two o'clock in the afternoon the whole confederate army had orders to retire, which it did in such excellent order that the French did not dare to make the least attempt to disturb them, and they returned to their camp at Brussel; and quitting it the same night about eleven o'clock, marched directly to the camp at Lessines near Aeth, leaving their sick and wounded to the humanity of the victors.

Such was the decision of this memorable battle of Fontenoy, which answered no other purpose than to display the unfortunate bravery of the English and Hanoverians; the latter of whom, by their behaviour this day, silenced all the charges that had been brought against them for their conduct at Dettingen, while the Dutch disgraced all the glories which they had some years before acquired at the battle of Malplaquet, under the duke of Marlborough, where they had eight thousand men killed.

In this action the confederates lost seven thousand three hundred and forty-seven men, including cluding a great number of officers; and among these lieutenant-general sir James Campbell, major-general Ponsonby, the colonels Carpenter and Douglass, and lieutenant-colonel Gee. However, from the number of officers killed and wounded on the enemy's side, their loss must be supposed to be much more considerable; there being four lieutenant-generals, four major-generals, and three brigadiers, killed; two lieutenant-generals, three major-generals, and twenty-two brigadier-generals, wounded, many of whom died soon after the engagement.

The reduction of Tournay was the necessary consequence of the victory of Fontenoy, though baron Dorth, the governor, maintained the place with the greatest bravery to the 21st day of June, and then obtained an honourable capitulation. The duke of Cumberland apprehending that the French would next make an attempt upon Ghent, sent a detachment of four thousand men to reinforce its garrison; but they fell into an ambuscade, when above one thousand were killed and taken. That very night Ghent was surprized by a detachment of the French army. Dendermond, Oudenarde, Nieuport, and Aeth, successively submitted to the victors, who, to crown their successes, made themselves masters of Ostend, after a short siege, on the 13th of August: and the French king, having thus subdued the greatest part of the Austrian Netherlands, returned in the month of September to Paris, which he entered in triumph.

The confederate army lay all this time intrenched beyond the canal of Antwerp, for the disparity between them and the enemy was too disadvantageous to suffer the allies to think of giving the least molestation to the French in their acquisitions. On the 12th of October his royal highness the duke of Cumberland left the confederate army, being called home to ward off the meditated stroke of a rebellion; of which an account will be given in its place. The combined forces soon afterwards took their winter-quarters in Brussels, Antwerp, and Mechlin; but the victorious marshal Saxe, making the most of his superiority, on the 29th of January following, invested Brussels; the garrison of which, consisting of ten thousand Austrians and Dutch under count Kaunitz, after a gallant resistance, were obliged to surrender prisoners of war on the 20th of February. This conquest terminated all the enterprising attempts of marshal Saxe till the returning spring, when Antwerp was expected to swell the number of his successes.

Maximilian Joseph the young elector of Bavaria was the third from father to son, whose cause had been espoused by France. She had restored his grandfather to his dominions, obtained the Imperial crown for his father, and now made a fresh effort to support this young prince. Early in the spring the French king sent six thousand Hessians in the pay of France, three thousand Palatines, and thirteen battalions of German troops, to join the Bavarian forces under count Seckendorff; but these had defended the entrance of their country so ill, that in the beginning of April the elector of Bavaria was obliged to quit Munich, the same capital from which his father had been so often expelled, and to seek shelter in Augsburg. Bavaria had been so much ravaged that it was not able to supply forage to the French troops who came to the elector's assistance, and count Brown declared to count

Segur, who commanded the French forces in Bavaria, that he would not march to meet the Austrians, and that all he could do was to wait for them. To complete the disgrace of the French, count Seckendorff, who commanded the Bavarian army, corresponded with the queen of Hungary, and was negotiating a secret accommodation between his master, the young elector, and the court of Vienna; whereby he defeated every thing that had been done by France. Seckendorff had been long in the service of the house of Austria, but upon some cause of distrust had been confined by Charles VI. the last emperor of this family, upon whose demise he quitted the queen of Hungary to enter into the Bavarian service; and being now disgusted with the court of France, for having refused him a sum of money he demanded for the payment of the Bavarian troops, he resolved to traverse all its projects.

While things were in this situation count Segur, who had only six thousand foot, and two thousand horse, French and Palatines, not having been able to effect his junction with the Hessians and Bavarians, was attacked by general Bathiani at the head of the Austrian army, within a few leagues of Donawert near a little town called Pfaffenhoven. All he had to do in this situation was to save his troops and the military chest; for this purpose he posted his men so well by covering them with a wood, and possessing himself of an eminence, that they maintained a most unequal and a most obstinate fight: the French alone lost about two thousand men killed and wounded; the Palatines, who were less exposed, had very few killed, but one of their battalions was made prisoners of war. The marquis de Crussol, who was entrusted with the care of the rear, and the chevalier de la Marck, behaved with such prudence and intrepidity, that even their enemies gave them the highest commendations.

This little army being obliged to yield to the superiority of numbers, retreated to Donawert, where they crossed the Danube, and joined the French under the command of marshal Maillebois in Suabia. This incident completed the destruction of the French in this part of the empire.

The retreat of the French general obliged the prince of Saxe Hilburghausen to retire with the Bavarian and Hessian troops towards Landsberg; but the latter, to the number of six thousand, being cut off, and surrounded in their retreat by a detachment commanded by general Bernklau, were obliged to lay down their arms, and to continue at Lechausen, till their fates were determined between the courts of Vienna and Cassel. These troops some time after passed from the service of the French into that of the English.

All this while the young elector of Bavaria was at Augsburg, devoured with the melancholy reflections of his own approaching misfortunes, and the past calamities of his unhappy family. The French king, however, was still defending his cause on all sides. Marshal Maillebois, at the head of a numerous army, was driving that of the Austrians, commanded by the duke of Aremberg, beyond the river Lhon, and even menaced the electorate of Hanover. The king of Prussia kept prince Charles of Lorraine employed, and Lewis XV. was himself on the point of making a most powerful diversion in Flanders. But all these considerations were super-perfected,

perfeded, and the projects of France difconcerted by the prefent exigence of the young elector's affairs, the intreaties of the empress his mother, enforced by the interpoftion of his Britannic majefty; the advice of the elector of Cologne, his uncle; and of his general, count Seckendorff, who were inceffantly representing to him the ambitious defigns of France, and earneftly exhorted him to be reconciled to the court of Vienna, and confent to the accommodation which count de Colloredo, the Austrian minifter, was endeavouring to bring about at Tyrol. The minifters of the contrary party opposed thefe efforts, efpecially M. de Chavigny, count del Bene, and M. de Klingarff, the ambaffadors from the courts of France, Madrid, and Berlin, who perfuaded the elector to repair to Manheim, a city belonging to the elector-palatine, and had almoft feducd him to refufe entering into any accommodation. But at length he opened his eyes to the true intereft of his electoral houfe: he put off his defigned journey to Manheim, and fent orders to prince Furftenberg to conclude an accommodation with count Colloredo, who was come to Fueffen, on the Lech, for this falutary purpofe. Thefe plenipotentiaries foon terminated the differences between the ferene houfes of Austria and Bavaria, by concluding a treaty of amity and pacification, figned on the twenty-second of April.

By this treaty her Hungarian majefty agreed to acknowledge the imperial dignity, as having been vefted in the perfon of his father, to his own mother, as empress-dowager; to reftore his dominions, with all the fortrefses, artillery, ftore, and ammunition, which fhe had taken. On the other hand, he relinquifhed all claim to the fucceffion of her father, became guarantee of the pragmatic fanction, acknowledged the validity of the electoral vote of Bohemia in the perfon of the queen, and promifed to give his vote for the grand duke at the enfuing election of a king of the Romans.

Until this fhould be determined, both parties agreed that Ingoldftadt fhould be garrifoned by neutral troops, and that Branau and Scharding, with all the country lying between the Inn and the Saltza, fhould remain in the queen's poffeffion, though without prejudice to the civil government or the elector's revenue. In the mean time, he difmiffed the auxiliaries that were in his pay, and they were fuffered to retire without moleftation.

On the demife of the emperor, the elector of Mentz, as arch-chancellor of the empire, appointed the firft of June for the diet to afsemble, and proceed to the election of a new emperor. The grand duke of Tufcany had already declared himfelf a candidate for that dignity; and the court of Vienna had now engaged the votes of all the electors, except thofe of Brandenburg and the Palatinate. France however was determined, if poffible, to prevent the exaltation of the grand duke, and with that view exerted her utmoft endeavours to procure fuch an army in the empire as might intimidate the princes and neutral circles from electing a prince for emperor, whom fhe would gladly have fet at the remoteft diftance from that auguft dignity. The French army in Germany was therefore augmented to feventy thoufand three hundred men; and the prince of Conti was appointed to take the command, in the room of M. Maillebois, who fucceeded the prince in his command on the fide of Italy, after having, as I have already obferved, obliged the duke of Aremberg, who made an irruption into the Palatinate in the beginning of this year, to repafs the Maine with his army of Austrians and Hanoverians, and afterwards to intrench himfelf behind the river Lohne, in expectation of reinforcements.

About the time that the prince of Conti arrived in Germany, marfhal Traun, who had fucceeded count Bathiani in the command of the Austrian forces in Bavaria (on that general's being appointed to replace the duke of Aremberg in Germany) received orders to advance towards the Maine to join the confederates, and drive the prince of Conti from the neighbourhood of Frankfort, that the electors might be left at liberty to proceed to the election, agreeably to the laws and conftitution of the empire. He accordingly marched from the Danube at the head of thirty thoufand men, and on the fourteenth of June effected his junction with count Bathiani at Wachterspach, upon the river Kintz, when the united armies confifted of feventy-four battalions and one hundred and ten fquadrons, in all fixty-nine thoufand men, who were foon after headed by the grand duke himfelf in perfon, who obliged the prince of Conti to evacuate the imperial territories, and repafs the Rhine at Nordheim with confiderable lofs.

The neighbourhood of Frankfort being thus freed from the prefence of the French army that had been pofted there, under the fpecious pretext of fecuring the freedom of the election, but with a real view to influence the deliberations of the electors; the firft conference was held for the election of a king of the Romans on the ninth of Auguft, at which affifted the minifters of the feveral electors of Mentz, Treves, Cologne, Bohemia, Bavaria, Hanover, and Saxony: but the ambaffadors of Brandenburg and the Palatinate having protested againft every thing that could be done at thofe conferences, were not prefent. However, the electoral college afsembled on the fecond of September for the election of an emperor, when they chofe the moft ferene prince Francis Stephen, duke of Lorraine and Bar, grand duke of Tufcany, and co-regent of the dominions of her majefty the queen of Hungary and Bohemia. On the twenty-fourth the new emperor, with his royal confort, made his public entry with great magnificence, and was crowned with the ufual ceremonies. Their Imperial majefties, after receiving the compliments of the chief princes of the empire, returned to Vienna, and the diet of the empire was removed to Ratifbon, the ufual place of afsembling under the Austrian emperors. The voting electors alfo entered into an afociation to defend the head of the empire, and the circles were required to furnifh a triple contingent for that purpofe.

This agreeable alteration in the affairs of Europe was effected principally by the firmnefs and authority of his Britannic majefty, who fpared no pains to reconcile the princes of the empire in defence of public liberty. He prevailed with the elector-palatine to be lefs fanguine in the caufe of France: he actually fucceeded in bringing the court of Hefle-Caffel to relinquifh its connections with Lewis XV. and to reftore the fix thoufand Heflians to Britifh pay.

The king of Pruffia, fmarting with his lofles fufained laft campaign, thoroughly difgusted with the court of France, and releafed from his engagements ments of the treaty of Frankfort by the death of the emperor, seemed inclinable to embrace a pacific system; but the infatuation of the councils of Vienna would not permit him. Intoxicated with success, they thought of nothing less than stripping him of all he had acquired. This inveteracy roused all the military abilities of his Prussian majesty, which soon struck Europe with astonishment. The Austrians had already made themselves masters of Troppau, Jaggerdorf, Ratibor, and some other places of less note in Silesia: but Frederic, who had hitherto affected to act upon the defensive only, which had made his enemies imagine that he was both unwilling and unable to hazard an engagement, started suddenly into action, attacked the Austrians in his turn, and drove them from Troppau and Jaggerdorf as far as Moravia, whilst other parties of his troops possessed themselves of the castle of Glatz, where a body of six thousand Prussians, under general Lehwald, attacked twelve thousand Austrians commanded by general Helfrich, five hundred of whom were killed upon the spot, three hundred taken prisoners, and the rest completely routed. Ratibor, where was a garrison of three thousand Austrians, next fell into his hands. The defendants were all killed or taken prisoners, and the king entered Silesia in May, at the head of seventy thousand men.

These exploits, however, were but faint preludes to the rapid conquests which were soon to distinguish this young monarch as the first hero of the age in generalship and valour. Prince Charles of Lorraine had by this time joined the confederate army of Saxons, Hungarians, and Austrians, under the prince of Saxe Weissenfels, at Konigsgratz in Bohemia, which was now augmented to seventy-six thousand men, and from thence advanced in the latter end of May towards the mountains which separate Silesia from Bohemia, and on the third of June encamped in the neighbourhood of Friedberg. Upon the first motions of the confederates to enter Silesia, his Prussian majesty had drawn all the troops he had in Upper Silesia, except the garrison of Jaggerdorf, into Lower Silesia to reinforce his army, which was thereby augmented to eighty-four thousand men. This superiority determined Frederic to attack the confederates, who little expected any thing of the kind; for he had ordered his general du Moulin, with the vanguard of his army, consisting of fifteen thousand men, to post himself near Striegau, where the right wing of the allies was encamped, and to make the necessary dispositions to lead prince Charles into a belief that his majesty intended to retreat to Breslau. At their approach the confederates were the dupes of this artifice, and lulled into the most perfect security; when, on the fourth of June, at two o'clock in the morning, they found themselves attacked by the Prussians with a degree of fury that carried all before it. The Saxons and Austrians maintained the fight for a considerable time with a resolution that did them infinite honour; and prince Charles of Lorraine and the prince of Saxe-Weissenfels did every thing that could be expected from the most consummate generals and the bravest warriors, to turn the fortune of the day; but all in vain: the amazing military genius of his Prussian majesty had led him to make such dispositions as must infallibly insure him the victory. In fine, the allies were totally defeated, with the loss of four thousand six hundred men killed, and five thousand three hundred taken prisoners, with all their artillery; and his Prussian majesty carried off from the field a prodigious number of colours, standards, kettle-drums, and other military trophies. The Prussians lost about eight hundred men killed, and fifteen hundred wounded. Such was the issue of the famous battle of Friedberg, which, for the valour and great conduct of the generals on both sides, but more particularly on that of the Prussians; the bravery and intrepidity of the private men; the general and long action, which lasted upwards of twelve hours, and the decisiveness of the victory, may truly be stiled the most memorable of the war begun in SEVENTEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-ONE.

The loss of the battle of Friedberg by the Austrians induced his Britannic majesty, who then resided at Hanover, and was employed as usual in studying every method to restore the peace of Germany, to enter upon a provisional treaty with his nephew of Prussia for that salutary purpose, to which the latter appeared to lend a willing ear. Accordingly, in the month of August a convention was signed at Hanover, wherein the king of Great Britain became guarantee of the king of Prussia's possessions in Silesia, as yielded by the treaty of Breslau; and that monarch promised to vote for the grand duke of Tuscany at the election of an emperor. This was intended as the basis of a more general accommodation: but no sooner was it known at the courts of Vienna and Dresden, than it was rejected in the most peremptory terms. This so enraged Frederic, that he immediately published a declaration of war against the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, in which he accused that prince of having formed a design, in conjunction with her Hungarian majesty, to invade his territories, particularly the duchy of Magdeburg; and that for this purpose his Polish majesty had demanded of the czarina of Russia the succours stipulated by treaty between the two crowns. He then published a manifesto setting forth these particulars, and earnestly soliciting the maritime powers to fulfil their engagements, and interpose their good offices with the court of Petersburg to abandon that of Dresden. But without waiting to see the result of these apprehensions, he made a sudden irruption into Lusatia, took possession of Gortitz, and obliged prince Charles of Lorraine to retire into Bohemia.

Prince Anhalt of Dessau, the Prussian general, then enters Saxony towards the west, and makes himself master of Leipzig without opposition. The king of Poland, elector of Saxony, flies from Dresden and takes refuge in Prague, the capital of Bohemia, whilst his generals collect his forces; and being joined by a detachment of Austrian cavalry under prince Lobkowitz, make a stand to oppose the rapidity of the Prussian conquests at Pima*. The latter, however, making themselves masters of Meyßen, attacked the confederates, though double their number, on the fifteenth day of December, and obtained as complete a victory as that of Friedberg, where, besides great numbers of the Saxons and Austrians left upon the field of battle, near four thousand were taken prisoners, with all their artillery. The city of Dresden, the capital of Saxony, no longer able to withstand the victorious arms of his Prussian majesty, submits. Frederic enters the place in triumph, and the whole country is laid under contribution.

The king of Poland, thus stripped of his dominions, was glad to accept of such terms as the conqueror thought proper to impose. The queen of Hungary also, tired of a dispute in which she had nothing to expect but multiplied losses and disgrace, consented at length to give up her claim to Silesia; and a negociation being set on foot, under the mediation of the king of Great Britain, two treaties of peace were signed on the twenty-fifth of December, 1745; the one between the king of Prussia and the elector of Saxony, and the other between his Prussian majesty and the emperor and the empress-queen.

By the latter of these treaties the king of Prussia acknowledged the emperor, as did also the elector-palatine, who acceded thereto. The emperor confirmed in favour of the house of Brandenburg certain privileges de non evocando, granted to it by the emperor Charles VII. concerning certain provinces in the king of Prussia's possession not belonging to the elector of Brandenburg, and the treaty of Breslau was renewed. By the treaty concluded at the same time between the king of Prussia and the king of Poland, in quality of the elector of Saxony, it was agreed, "That all the contributions that electorate was to furnish to his Prussian majesty to the twenty-second day of December, 1745, inclusive, he should retain to his proper use: that a million of German crowns should be paid the next fair at Leipzig, with interest at five per cent. to be reckoned from the day of signing the treaty till the time of quitting the capital: that the subjects of his Prussian majesty who were interested in the state of Saxony should be punctually paid: that the king of Poland, in quality of the elector of Saxony, should make no innovations to the prejudice of the protestant religion in that electorate; and that the Saxon soldiers who had enlisted themselves in the Prussian service since the king's troops had entered that electorate, should remain therein."

Immediately after the ratification of these treaties, the Prussian forces evacuated Saxony; all hostilities between them and the Austrians ceased, and the peace of Germany was restored.

The campaign in Italy was far from proving favourable either to the queen of Hungary or her ally the king of Sardinia. Count Gages crossed the Appennine mountains in the month of April, in order to reach the state of Lucca, and pass from thence through the Genoese dominions, to join the army commanded by Don Philip in Lombardy. Prince Lobkowitz, who, upon the opening of the campaign, finding himself too weak to obstruct the progress of count Gages, had crossed the Panaro, and retired into the Modenese, no sooner heard of that general's march towards the Appennines, than he sent several detachments to incommode his route, who did great execution upon his rear. However, the Spanish general, with infinite trouble, penetrated through the mountains: but if any snow or rain had fallen during their march, the whole army must have inevitably perished before they had entered the territories of Lucca, where they arrived the tenth of May. The republic of Lucca, notwithstanding its avowed neutrality, was compelled to receive the Spanish general with civility, and even to furnish him with provisions.

Count Gages then proceeded by the eastern coast of Genoa to Leftrade Levant, while duke Philip, who had by this time received very considerable reinforcements from Catalonia, was permitted by the republic to approach through the western part of their dominions; and the two armies at length completed their junction on the fourteenth day of June, within a few miles of Genoa, where they encamped, and then consisted of sixty-eight thousand men. Soon after, the Genoese declared war against the king of Sardinia, and joined the French, Spanish, and Neapolitan forces with ten thousand men, and a large train of heavy artillery. Meanwhile, prince Lobkowitz departed from Modena, and encamped at Parma; but being recalled to serve in Bohemia, he was succeeded by count Schuylemberg, who made the best dispositions for defending the Milanese, the Parmesan, and the Plaisantin.

Don Philip, assisted by marshal Maillebois with forty thousand French and Spaniards, was to penetrate into the Milanese, and act against the king of Sardinia, who was posted with twenty thousand men in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, while the duke of Modena and count Gages, with thirty-eight thousand men, acted against count Schuylemberg, who had assembled twenty-five thousand. Count Gages soon opened himself a passage into the Milanese by the reduction of Serravalle, and advancing on the side of Placentia, obliged the Austrian general to retire under the cannon of Tortona, to preserve a communication with the king of Sardinia. Don Philip, on his side, took possession of Acqui, Seva, and some other places, which opened a passage to Alexandria, where the Austrians and Piedmontese had united their force; but his Sardinian majesty and count Schuylemberg finding they were in danger of being inclosed between the two Spanish generals, retired beyond the Tanaro in the middle of July, wholly unable to resist the progress of the enemy.

Count de Gages then laid siege to and reduced Tortona, while the duke of Modena made himself master of the cities of Parma and Placentia, and recovered the dominions of the house of Farnese. Count de Gages, after the reduction of Tortona, took the city of Pavia by escalade; the rich city of Milan submitted to the Infant, though the Austrian garrison still maintained the citadel. The Spanish general then marched to reinforce the army under Don Philip, who being now at the head of sixty-two thousand men, forced the passage of the Tanaro, and obliged his Sardinian majesty to quit the neighbourhood of Alexandria, and take shelter at Valenza, the capital of the Laumelin, on the other side of the Po.

The army of the three crowns finding nothing to oppose it, marched and laid siege to Alexandria, a considerable town on the Tanaro, which was surrendered within twelve days after its being invested.

invested. In the mean time, prince Lichtenstein was sent to take the command of the Austrian army in Italy, in the room of Schuylemberg: but all this new general or the king of Sardinia could do was to remain inactive spectators of the rapid successes that attended the arms of the Spaniards. Valenza Casal, the capital of the Montferrat, the important town of Asti, the castle of Gabiano, and Verrue, all fell into their hands with very little trouble; and in a word all Piedmont on both sides of the Po, almost as far as Turin, was reduced, and that capital threatened with a siege; so that by the month of October the territories belonging to the house of Austria in Italy were wholly subdued, and the king of Sardinia stripped of all his dominions. Nevertheless, he continued firm to his engagements, and refused to hearken to the specious proposals of the French for a separate accommodation.

The English navy in the course of this year performed several signal services. In the Mediterranean admiral Rowley had succeeded Mr. Matthews in the command. He had bombarded Savona, Genoa, Final, St. Remo, with Bastia, the capital of Corsica, and made prizes of several Spanish ships. The English privateers likewise met with remarkable success; but the most important achievement, and that most worthy of historical notice, was the reduction of Louisburg, the capital of Cape Breton in North America, a place of great consequence, and which the French had fortified at an immense expence.

Cape Breton is an island of North America, in the Atlantic Ocean, separated from Acadia, or New Scotland, by the narrow streight of Canso. It is about one hundred miles in length, and fifty in breadth, situate between forty-five and forty-eight degrees north latitude, and between sixty-one and sixty-two degrees west longitude. It is a country which produces hardly any corn or grass, but large quantities of wood; is excessively cold, being covered with snow in winter, and subject to great fogs even in summer. It has, however, several good harbours, with an excellent fishery on the coast. The knowlege which the French had of the great benefit of this fishery, conjunctly with those of the Banks of Newfoundland and on the coast of Acadia, and the hopes of one time monopolizing it made them, at the peace of Utrecht, stick at no terms to obtain Cape Breton to themselves: and they had no sooner effected this, but they immediately began to settle the island, to which they gave the name of l'Isle Royale. A new colony was set on foot in 1714, to consist of fishermen only: proper encouragement was given for establishing the settlement, forts were erected, and the town of Louisburg was built, and a garrison posted there for the protection of the island. The whole nation of France seemed to have their wishes entirely bent on the prosperity of this valuable colony; so that it annually became more populous, and the fishery flourished so fast, that they could and did afford to undersell the British nation at foreign markets. For the preservation of this trade the colony had yearly reinforcements and ships of war sent there from France, to visit and supply them, with orders to protect and defend not only their sea-coasts, but their vessels on the Banks of Newfoundland. This gave them a liberty of fishing almost wherever they pleased, in which they gradually increased, so as to put the island in a formidable posture of defence.

The scheme of reducing this island is said to have been first suggested by Mr. Auchmuty, judge-advocate of the court of admiralty in New England. It was recommended by their general assembly to our ministry here at home, and was approved by his majesty, who sent orders to commodore (afterwards sir Peter) Warren, stationed off the Leeward Islands, to sail for the northern parts of America, and assist all in his power the forces of New England in this expedition.

A body of six thousand men was raised by the colonists themselves, and put under the conduct of Mr. Pepperell, a trader of Piscataqua, whose interest in that country was very considerable. He was indeed altogether ignorant of the military art; but this defect was amply made up by his amazing courage and resolution. In April this year Mr. Warren arrived at Canso with ten ships of war; and the troops of New England being embarked in transports, sailed immediately for the isle of Cape Breton, and landed on the thirtieth of the month in Gabaron Bay, about four miles from the fort of Louisburg. The ground between the place of landing and the ramparts of the town was extremely boggy, unequal, and almost impassable; but the assailants surmounted all these difficulties, and formed two several camps, which were to direct two different attacks. The one played from the south side of the harbour directly upon the town, and the other from the north part of it, to silence what was called the grand battery, which mounted thirty-five guns, of forty-two pounders each, and commanded the entry and the bay. Besides these, the enemy had a draw-bridge at the western gate of the town, where was a circular battery of sixteen guns, twenty-four pounders each, commanding the upper part of the harbour; at the mouth of which was the island battery, of thirty-four guns, forty-two pounders. The walls, ramparts, and bastions of the place, mounted sixty-four guns, besides sixteen large mortars; and the garrison consisted of twelve hundred regulars, under monsieur Chambon, the governor.

Dismaying as it might have been supposed such a formidable appearance of defence would be to raw and unexperienced troops; yet the New England men proved on this occasion, that natural courage and intrepidity may well supply the place of military knowlege or experience: they waited but for the commands of their leaders to fly to execute them, however dangerous or precarious: they assailed the grand battery with such vigour and resolution, that they compelled the enemy to abandon it; and the immediate seizure of it contributed not a little to the success of the enterprize. This passed on the northern side of the harbour; but the grand approaches were carried on upon the southern side, while the fleet blocked up the place by sea in such a manner as to prevent the introduction of any supplies. The Vigilante, a French ship of war of sixty-four guns, with several smaller vessels, carrying all manner of military and other stores for the service of the place, were intercepted by part of the commodore's squadron, while at the same time the camps of the besiegers were plentifully supplied with provisions from Boston.

Boston. The service on the southern side of the town was extremely laborious, the guns for mounting the batteries being dragged through bogs and incumbered places by the landsmen for above two miles. They succeeded, however, to admiration; and having erected several batteries on eminences that commanded the whole town, which they laid in ruin by their bombs and bullets, the governor, despairing of relief, capitulated on the fifteenth day of June, when the city of Louisburg and the isle of Cape Breton were delivered up to his Britannic majesty. The garrison and inhabitants engaged not to bear arms for twelve months against Great Britain or her allies; and being embarked in fourteen cartel ships, were conveyed to Rochfort in France. The natives of New England acquired great glory from this enterprize; the success of which, however, was in no small degree owing to the vigilance and activity of commodore Warren, as brave and experienced an officer as Great Britain could boast in her service.

The possession of Cape Breton was a most valuable acquisition to Great Britain: it not only distressed the French in their fishery and navigation, but also effectually secured the English fishers on the Banks of Newfoundland from all apprehensions of being rivalled or encroached upon in that lucrative branch of trade: it freed New England from the terrors of dangerous neighbours; overawed the Indians of that country; and secured the possession of Acadia to the crown of Great Britain. His majesty appeared so sensible of the important service done him both by the land and sea commanders on this occasion, that he was pleased to confer the dignity of a baronet on Mr. Pepperell, and to raise Mr. Warren to the rank of admiral.

While the continent of Europe and the isles of America were thus exposed to the ravages of war, and subjected to several vicissitudes of fortune, Great Britain underwent a dangerous convulsion in her own bowels by a rebellion, the most daring, and, considering the little encouragement it met with, the most alarming of any that appears in the English annals; a rebellion which was as fatal in its event, as it was prosperous in its commencement; and which, notwithstanding its occasioning some few calamities, confirmed in the hand of the sovereign the sceptre it meant to shake.

As the various incidents which occurred while this rebellion lasted are recent in the minds of most of my readers, and are transmitted in a number of histories, some of which are in almost every body's hand, I shall not swell this work with a minute detail of particulars, but content myself with giving a brief and impartial account of the most material and interesting circumstances, which I shall carry down, without any interruption, to its conclusion in 1746.

I have already mentioned the miscarriage of the invasion projected in 1744; the ill success of which, and the unanimity the British nation then shewed in defending the person and government of the reigning monarch, had determined the pretender to lay aside all thoughts of resuming an enterprize of that nature; and he had even ordered his son Charles to follow his example. Charles, however, was of a different opinion from his father: burning with ambition, and animated with the hopes of ascending a throne, which he had from his infancy been taught to look upon as the right of his family, he resolved to make one more effort. In this disposition he was encouraged by the extravagant representations of some needy fugitives, and by the persuasion of cardinal Tencin, the prime minister of France, who assured him of the most Christian king's protection and assistance, who, though he entertained a great indifference for the Stuart family, thought it politic, in the present situation of his own affairs, to give them some kind of countenance. Tencin had no small difficulty to persuade the old pretender to be concerned in this scheme. At last, however, he succeeded, but could never bring the rest of the French ministry to be of his opinion, they looking upon the whole to be an idle Quixotic enterprize. Nevertheless, in compliance with the seeming will of their monarch, the council determined that a ship of war should convoy Charles, in case he should chuse to undertake the enterprize.

Charles appears to have founded his hopes of success chiefly on the strength of his own personal interest and qualifications, in which he had been flattered by the sanguine misrepresentations of a few adventurers, who hoped to profit by the expedition, and boldly assured him that the majority of the English nation was disaffected to the reigning family; and that the most considerable persons in the kingdom would cheerfully join him upon his first appearance. Cajoled by these soothing tales, and encouraged by the promise of powerful succours from France, he thought he had but to set his foot on any part of the British shore, and to succeed. Being furnished with a sum of money and a supply of arms by the court of Versailles, he embarked on board of a small frigate at Port St. Lazaro, on the coast of Brittany, accompanied by the marquis of Tullibardine and sir Thomas Sheridan, with a few other Irish and Scottish adventurers; and setting sail on the fourteenth day of July, was joined off Belleisle by the Elizabeth, a French ship of war of sixty-six guns, as his convoy. Their design was to sail round Ireland, and land on the western coast of Scotland; but falling in with the Lion, an English man of war of fifty-eight guns, commanded by captain Brett, who had been lieutenant of the Centurion under commodore Anson, a very obstinate battle ensued; and the Elizabeth being at length disabled, was obliged to return to Brest, while the frigate escaped, and continued her course so expeditiously, that on the 23d of July the young pretender found himself among the western isles of Scotland, where he continued cruizing till the twenty-sixth, between the islands of Barra and South Vista; but finding there was no probability of being rejoined by the Elizabeth, the frigate at last stood in for the coast of Lochaber, one of the maritime counties in the north-west of Scotland, principally inhabited by papists, and on the twenty-seventh of July landed the young pretender with his companions at Moidart, between the islands of Sky and Mull. The young adventurer went immediately to the house of Mr. Macdonald, of Kinloch-Moidart, where he remained for some time, before he was in any condition to make a public appearance.

While he was remaining in these parts, to wait the coming in of the chieftains of the clans affected to his service, the government received notice of such an attempt, aided by the French court; and and a proclamation was published, offering a reward of thirty thousand pounds for the apprehending and securing the eldest son of the pretender, in case he should land, or attempt to land, in any of his majesty's dominions. The regency also sent arms for the militia of Scotland and Ireland; but at the first beginning of the rebellion all intelligence of such an attempt was discredited, because it appeared too vain and audacious.

His Britannic majesty was in his German dominions when he received the first intelligence of the arrival of the young pretender in Scotland, which occasioned his immediate return to London, where he arrived on the thirty-first of August, to the great satisfaction of all his faithful subjects, who knew how seasonable his royal presence was at this juncture. Charles having declared himself in Scotland, soon found his party considerably augmented, both by the accession of several of the nobility and gentry, and the numbers they conducted to his standard; so that his army was quickly increased to 4000 men. In short, the rebellion soon wore too formidable an aspect to be disregarded. On September 5, his majesty sent notice to the lord-mayor of London (sir Henry Marshal) that the pretender's eldest son had landed in Scotland, and that several persons had assembled there, and broke out into open rebellion; upon which the city of London waited upon his majesty with a most loyal address, and the merchants of this metropolis resolved to raise two regiments at their own expence. Orders were issued to keep the trained bands in readiness, to array the militia of Westminster, and instructions were sent to the same effect to the lords lieutenants of the several counties throughout the kingdom. Orders were likewise issued for the return of the three battalions of the foot-guards and seven regiments of foot from Flanders; and requisition was made of the six thousand Dutch auxiliaries.

Upon the first certainty of the young pretender's arrival in Scotland, sir John Cope, who commanded the troops in that kingdom, assembled what forces he could get together, and advanced against the rebels. The latter, however, found means to give Cope the slip; and marching southward, took possession of Perth on the fourth of September, where the chevalier de St. George was proclaimed king of Great Britain, by the name of James III. There his son, the young adventurer, was joined by the titular duke of Perth, the viscount Strathallern, lord Nairn, lord George Murray, and many persons of distinction, with their followers; and the rebel army, now augmented to near five thousand men, though very ill provided with arms, crossed the Forth, in the neighbourhood of Stirling, and advanced towards Edinburgh, of which they took possession on the seventeenth of September, all opposition to them hitherto being weakly or wickedly managed.

By this time general Cope, who had, for greater expedition, in his return southward after the rebels, embarked his troops, was arrived at Dunbar, eighteen miles east of Edinburgh; and having landed his forces, and received a reinforcement of two regiments of dragoons which he had left behind him on his going northward, began his march towards that capital. The rebels did not wait to be attacked by him, but came out to meet him; and on the twenty-first of September, at day-break, they set upon his little army at Preston-pans, seven miles east of Edinburgh, and totally defeated it, making most of his infantry prisoners. The dragoons made their escape to Berwick with little loss, save that of the brave colonel Gardiner, a gallant officer, who disdained to save his life at the expence of his honour. From this victory the young pretender reaped manifold and important advantages. His followers were armed, his party encouraged, and his enemies intimidated. He was supplied with a train of field artillery and a considerable sum of money, and saw himself possessed of all Scotland except the fortresses, the reduction of which he could not pretend to undertake without proper implements and engineers.

These advantages spread a general consternation throughout England; but all orders and ranks vied with each other in displaying their loyalty. Several noblemen raised regiments at their own expence (which however were afterwards paid for by the public) and many associations were entered into for the support of his majesty's crown and dignity, and the constitution in church and state. The success of the rebellion, and dread of a threatened invasion from France, having caused a great run upon the Bank, above eleven hundred merchants and eminent tradesmen met, and subscribed their names to an agreement not to refuse Bank notes in any payment to be made to them. In Ireland every vigorous and salutary method was also pursued, to prevent any abetting of the rebellion there by the friends of France and popery; and a reward of fifty thousand pounds was published, in pursuance of the address of the Irish parliament, for apprehending the pretender's eldest son. It must also be observed, that although the rebels had made themselves masters of Edinburgh, yet the castle, which is a very strong fortress, was secured by general Gueft, an officer of experience and capacity, who had a good garrison under him; and upon the first news of the rebels advancing towards the city, he had taken care to secure all the small arms he could lay hold of, which, with the money of the two Banks, were removed into the castle. Immediately after the defeat of Cope, the six thousand Dutch troops, and three battalions of guards, with the seven regiments of infantry, now arrived from Flanders, were ordered to begin their march northward, under the command of field-marshal Wade, who received orders to assemble an army, which marched to Newcastle; but the inclemency of the weather, and the fatigue that the English veterans had undergone in the campaign in the Netherlands, occasioned a general indisposition and a great mortality among the men. This obliged the marshal to continue at Newcastle, where his army was gradually reinforced by several new-raised regiments of volunteers to 14,000 men.

The parliament meeting on the sixteenth of October, his majesty made a speech to both houses, in which he gave them to understand, that an unnatural rebellion had broke out in Scotland; and that he relied upon their affections to him, and their care and concern for the public safety, to take such steps as might enable him to extinguish this rebellion effectually, to prevent any foreign power from assisting the rebels, and to restore the peace of the kingdom. Both houses returned the most dutiful and zealous addresses to his majesty; so that the whole southern part of the united kingdom was preparing for defence. A general sense of the national danger had diffused itself through every rank of people, and united them as one man, to repel the common calamity with which they were threatened. The commons suspended the Habeas Corpus act; and several persons were apprehended on suspicion of treasonable practices. The government being apprehensive of a descent from France, appointed admiral Vernon to command a squadron in the Downs, to observe the motions of the enemy by sea, especially in the harbours of Dunkirk and Boulogne; and his cruizers took several ships carrying soldiers, officers, and ammunition, for the service of the young pretender in Scotland.

This enterprising youth, after having made some unsuccessful attempts to cut off the communication between the castle and city of Edinburgh; and finding his army now increased to eight thousand men, resolved to make an irruption into England, which he accordingly entered by the west border, on the sixth day of November: on the twelfth he invested Carlisle, which surrendered in less than three days. Here he found a considerable quantity of arms, and caused himself to be proclaimed king of Great Britain. Field-marshal Wade had indeed put himself in march to relieve the place; but when he had advanced as far as Hexham he heard of its surrender. On the twenty-fourth the rebels, without any molestation, arrived at Lancaster, and on the twenty-ninth took possession of Manchester, where they formed a regiment of those who had joined them in England, giving the command thereof to Mr. Townley.

By this time the duke of Cumberland was arrived from the Netherlands, and was followed by another detachment of dragoons and infantry. On the twenty-sixth of November his royal highness set out to take upon him the command of the army, then on its march into Lancashire. In the beginning of December the rebels left Manchester, passed the river Mersey, and advanced to Congleton, as if they intended to meet and engage the duke, whose advanced guard was then at Newcastle-Under-Line; but suddenly they turned off to the left, and marched into Derby, seeming to have an intention to slip by the duke, and take their way directly to London, where, when the news arrived, it occasioned inexpressible consternation. The troops in the neighbourhood of the capital were ordered to march, and form a camp upon Finchley common. The run upon the Bank grew more pressing, and all the public funds fell in their prices. On the fourth of December the rebels entered Derby; and soon after, contrary to all expectation, began to retreat northward by the route they came. As soon as his royal highness the duke got notice of their retreat, he set out in pursuit of them with all the cavalry in his army, and one thousand of his infantry, mounted on such horses as the country afforded. Marshal Wade, who had marched southward as far as Wakefield after the rebels, detached a considerable body of horse, under the command of major-general Oglethorpe, for the same purpose, and returned with the rest of his army to Newcastle. On the eighteenth of December the duke came up with the rear of the rebels at Clifton in Northumberland, and after a smart attack drove them from the village with some loss. On the thirtieth his royal highness retook Carlisle, after a siege of nine days, making their rebel garrison prisoners, their main army having now reached Scotland: the duke then returned to London. Thus the matter stood at the close of the year 1745.

On the fifth of January, 1746, the rebels, who had been some time before reinforced by a small body of French and Irish under the duke of Perth, who had a commission as general of those auxiliaries, closely invested the castle of Stirling*, in which major-general Blakeney commanded: but being so very little used to enterprizes of this kind, they made little progress in their operations. By this time a considerable body of forces was assembled at Edinburgh, under the conduct of lieutenant-general Hawley, who resolved to relieve Stirling castle, and advanced to Linlithgow, on the thirteenth day of January. Next day his whole army rendezvoused at Falkirk, while the rebels lay encamped at Torwood. On the seventeenth they marched to attack the king's forces; and an engagement was fought on Falkirk moor, in which the forces under Hawley, though much superior in numbers to the rebels, were shamefully defeated, and Hawley retreated to Linlithgow, and the next day to Edinburgh, leaving part of his tents and artillery to the victors, who resumed their attempt against Stirling-castle.

Upon this misfortune at Falkirk, it was thought expedient that the duke of Cumberland should take upon him the command of the army in Scotland. His royal highness accordingly hastened thither, and put himself at the head of the troops at Edinburgh, which consisted of fourteen battalions of infantry, two regiments of dragoons, and fifteen hundred Highlanders from Argyleshire, under the command of colonel Campbell. On the last day of January his royal highness began his march towards Stirling; but the rebels, instead of waiting for him, retired with the greatest precipitation northward; the duke, with the royal army, following them as fast as the season, and excessive bad roads, would permit. He did not arrive at Aberdeen, however, till the twenty-seventh of February. The Hessians under their hereditary prince arrived on the eighth at Edinburgh; for the Dutch troops, it was now discovered, could not act, as they consisted of part of the garrisons of Menin, Ypres, &c. which had engaged not to serve against France; and accordingly they were soon after sent home.

* Sterling, Stirling, or Striveling, the capital of a county of the same name in Scotland, and a royal burgh, stands on the declivity of a steep rock, at the foot of which runs the river Forth, with a strong castle inclosed with a wall, except towards the north, where it is bounded by the Forth, which is crossed by a bridge of hewn stone. This castle commands the passes between the north and south of Scotland, was the residence of Scottish kings, and parliaments were formerly held here. The Highlanders in the rebellion of 1715 endeavoured to possess themselves of this castle, but were prevented by the late John duke of Argyll. Stirling lies thirty miles north-west of Edinburgh.

Mean while, the rebels reduced the castle of Inverness and Fort Augustus, and laid siege to Fort William, and Blair-castle of Athol, but failed in both those attempts. They had the advantage in several skirmishes with the king's troops in the Highlands, which however was counterbalanced by the loss they sustained in the capture of their ship the Prince Charles (formerly the Hazard sloop, surprized by them in the harbour of Montrose) which they had fitted out and sent to France for money and arms; in her return with which she was seized by a party of lord Loudoun's men, with all her crew and cargo. The duke was obliged to wait at Aberdeen for a reinforcement from England, and till the river Spey should become fordable; the Hessians, with some British regiments, taking post at Perth.

On the eighth of April his royal highness, with the army under his command, marched from Aberdeen, and on the twelfth passed the Spey without opposition, the rebels retiring upon his approach, though they might easily have obstructed his passage: but indeed, from this, and many other parts of their conduct, they appear to have been under a total infatuation. His royal highness then proceeded to Nairn, where he received intelligence that the enemy had advanced from Inverness to Culloden, about the distance of nine miles from the royal army, with intention to give him battle. In the mean while, the earl of Cromartie and his son, who, with two hundred and eighty of their men, had been in Caithness to raise money and recruits for the rebels, were attacked by the earl of Sutherland's militia, routed, and Cromartie and his son, eighteen officers, and one hundred and eighty-five private men made prisoners.

While the duke was resting in his camp at Nairn to refresh his men, the rebels, in the night of the fifteenth, marched with an intention to attack the royal army by surprize before day-light; but their design proved abortive, by reason of some mismanagement amongst them; whereupon they returned to Culloden, resolving in that station to wait for the duke, who on the sixteenth of April decamped from Nairn early in the morning; and after a march of nine miles, perceived the rebels drawn up in order of battle, to the number of five thousand only, as they had not been able to assemble all their forces together, for want of money and provisions. The royal army, which was much more numerous, much better clothed, fed, and disciplined, was drawn up in excellent order, and about two o'clock in the afternoon the engagement began.

The rebels, with their usual fury, attacked the left wing of the royal army, by which some regiments of the first line were put into disorder: but those regiments being supported by the second line, and the right wing of the rebel army not being properly supported by their left, the whole fell into confusion; and his royal highness obtained a complete victory, with a very small loss. Twelve hundred rebels were slain on the field and in the pursuit; and the road, as far as Inverness, was strewn with dead bodies. The earl of Kilmarnock was taken in the field of battle; the lord Balmerino surrendered himself a few days after; the marquis of Tullibardine followed his example:

but the most extraordinary part of the prisoners were four ladies, who had been very instrumental in procuring friends for the Pretender, and one of them in particular, the lady Mackintosh, though her husband was at that time an officer in the king's army, had forced a great many of her clan to join the young pretender.

The victory of Culloden put a final end to the rebellion; but the duke continued with the army some time, to give proper orders for securing the tranquillity of the country, till having received the submission of almost all the clans and chieftains, he returned at length to London, which he entered amidst the acclamations of the people.

As for the vanquished adventurer, upon his retreat from the field of battle, he had a conference with some of his principal adherents; but finding his affairs desperate, he desired each of them to consult his own safety, while he himself, assuming various disguises, wandered from place to place among the mountains and western islands, often without any attendant, till two ships sent on purpose from France to the coast, took him and about thirty of his followers on board, and landed him about the middle of August at Rescourt, near Morlaix in Brittany, after he had endured, for near four months, a series of greater hardships and calamities than perhaps any other person ever survived.

The rebellion thus happily terminated, and peace and security restored to these kingdoms, addresses poured in from all quarters to his majesty, felicitating him upon the success of his arms, in support of his rightful and just cause, against the insolent attempts of a proscribed popish pretender. The two houses of parliament led the way in these congratulations, and also voted their thanks to his royal highness for his great and eminent services, and soon after settled twenty-five thousand pounds per annum on him and his male-issue.

It was now necessary, that those who had violated their fidelity and allegiance to their sovereign, and involved their country in such calamity and confusion, should expiate their crimes, by satisfying the demands of national justice: the sacrifices made to this claim, however, were as few as could be expected. An act was passed for attaining the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie; and the lords Balmerino and Lovat were tried, and found guilty by their peers. Cromartie was afterwards pardoned as to life, and Kilmarnock and Balmerino were beheaded on Tower-hill the eighteenth of August. Lovat underwent the same punishment the spring of the succeeding year. Charles Ratcliffe, esquire, commonly called the earl of Derwentwater, was also beheaded on the eighth of December, by a rule of the court of King's Bench, in pursuance of a sentence passed upon him in 1715, for being concerned in the rebellion in that year. As to the inferior agents in that unnatural attempt, a very inconsiderable number were executed, but a much greater transported to America; and notwithstanding all the outcries of Jacobitism, strict justice demands the acknowledgement, that no government ever shewed more mercy on such an occasion. A public thanksgiving was held on the ninth of October for the suppression of the rebellion, which was observed with every species of public rejoicings that a grateful people could exhibit.

Having

Having thus connected into one view what relates to the rise, progress, and extinction of this rebellion, I shall now take a retrospect of the other remarkable events, as well foreign as domestic, of the year 1746.

We have already observed, that his majesty opened the session of parliament on the sixteenth of October, 1745; the primary proceedings of which related only to the domestic affairs concerning the rebellion; but as the suppression of that commotion was speedily expected, the parliament began to give their attention to the general state of Europe; and on the fourteenth of January, 1746, the king went to the house of peers, and in a speech from the throne gave his parliament to understand, that the States-general had made pressing instances for his assistance in the present conjuncture, when they were in such danger of being oppressed by France in the Netherlands: that he had promised to co-operate with them towards opposing the further progress of their enemies, and even concerted measures for that purpose. He declared, that it was with regret that he asked any further aids of his people: he exhorted them to watch over the public credit; and expressed his entire dependence on their zeal and unanimity.

To this speech both houses returned the most loyal addresses, replete with the warmest expressions of duty and affection: but just as the grand affair of the supplies came upon the carpet, a violent commotion happened in the ministry, who, on the tenth of February, were all about to resign their places, as the duke of Newcastle and the earl of Harrington, the two secretaries of state, actually did; and the earl of Granville was appointed pro tempore secretary of state. However, after bringing their royal master to their own terms, the former persons again resumed their several functions; and the quiet of the cabinet being again restored, the house of commons provided for forty thousand seamen, nearly the same number of land forces, besides fifteen regiments raised by the nobility, on account of the rebellion, and about twelve thousand marines. They settled funds for the maintenance of the Dutch and Hessian troops that were in England, as well as for the subsidy to the landgrave: they granted three hundred thousand pounds to the king of Sardinia; four hundred thousand pounds to the queen of Hungary; three hundred and ten thousand pounds to defray the expence of eighteen thousand Hanoverians; about thirty-three thousand pounds in subsidies to the electors of Mentz and Cologne; and five hundred thousand pounds in a vote of credit and confidence to his majesty. The whole charge of the current year amounted to seven millions two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which was raised by the land and malt taxes, annuities on the additional duties imposed on glass, spirituous liquors, a lottery, a deduction from the sinking fund, and exchequer bills, chargeable on the first aids that should be granted in the next session of parliament.

With regard to the proceedings of this session, they were so unanimous as scarce to produce a single debate, and therefore are best known by the titles of the acts that were passed. By one of these, the sum of twenty-five thousand pounds per annum was added to the revenue of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, for his gallant behaviour in suppressing the rebellion; and the thanks of both houses was voted him upon his gaining the battle of Culloden. By another, the government was empowered to summon all suspected persons in Scotland to appear at Edinburgh, or wherever it should be judged expedient, and oblige them to find sureties for their peaceable deportment. By a third, the earl of Kellie, the viscount Strathallern, the lord Pittligo, and several other Scottish noblemen and gentlemen, were declared attainted, unless they surrendered themselves to a justice of the peace before the twelfth day of July 1746. By a fourth, the exercise of the episcopal religion was prohibited in Scotland, except by such ministers or pastors as qualified themselves according to law, by taking the oaths to the government; an act which was deemed the more necessary, as most of the episcopals in that kingdom were professed Jacobites. A fifth act was passed for effectually disarming the Highlands of Scotland, and preserving the peace of that part of the country; for restraining the use of the Highland dress, which was supposed to keep up party-distinctions; for indemnifying such persons as had acted in defence of his majesty's person and government, during the continuance of the unnatural rebellion; and for obliging the masters and teachers of private schools in Scotland to take the oaths to his majesty, his heirs and successors.

As to the war upon the continent this year, it raged with double violence, notwithstanding the election of an emperor, and the re-establishment of peace among the princes of the empire. The acquisitions made by France in the Netherlands after the battle of Fontenoy, were equally dreadful to the surrounding nations, who expected that the remaining part of those important provinces would be speedily over-run. The Dutch in particular were overwhelmed with consternation, as, after all their temporizing and dastardly submissions to the French court, they saw the uplifted arm of the ambitious Lewis ready to tear from them their whole barrier; for, taking advantage of the rebellion in England, which had occasioned the recall of so many of our troops from the Netherlands, he had made a rapid progress in his conquests. His general, M. Saxe, in the beginning of February this year, laid siege to the town of Brussels; and though the place was defended by a garrison of ten thousand men, yet he compelled it to surrender after fifteen days open trenches, and made the garrison prisoners of war: in fine, the enemy were in possession of all the Austrian Netherlands, a few fortresses excepted. The Dutch looked for nothing less than an immediate invasion of their province of Zealand: the Orange party called aloud for an augmentation of their forces; and that the republic, shaking off the lethargy under which it had so long remained, should pursue every vigorous measure to repel the approaching danger: the common people echoed back the cry; they demanded a chief to lead them to the field, and to fix the divided councils of the state; they insisted that the prince of Orange should be made stadtholder, and even mingled menaces with their demands. In this dilemma the States-general sent count Boetslaer to London, to represent the imminent danger which threatened the republic; and to solicit in the most pressing terms the assistance of his Britannic majesty, that the allies might have a superiority in the Netherlands by the beginning of the campaign. The king was well disposed to comply with their request; but the rebellion in his kingdom, and the dissensions in his cabinet, had retarded the supplies, and embarrassed him so much, that he found it impossible to make those early preparations that were necessary to check the career of the enemy. An answer to this purport was given to the Dutch ambassador. At the same time, the friends of the prince of Orange failed of success in their attempt to get him elected stadtholder; and the command of the few troops that remained for the defence of their country, was conferred on prince Waldeck, a foreigner.

The confederate army was assembled in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, on the twenty-fourth day of March, by marshal Bathiani, who had only four battalions and nine squadrons of the British troops, thirty-five squadrons of the Dutch, ten battalions and sixteen squadrons of Austrians, with sixteen battalions and twenty-six squadrons of Hanoverians; in all, forty-four thousand men, under his command, though a large reinforcement was speedily expected, when prince Charles of Lorraine was to appear at the head of the army; but till then Bathiani was obliged to entrench his little army behind the Demer, about ten miles from Antwerp, and fourteen from Brussels, where marshal Saxe was assembled with the army of France, consisting of one hundred and twenty thousand men. The French, with their monarch at their head, took the field on the 24th of April, and immediately bent their march towards the confederates; and on the first of May obliged them to abandon their advantageous situation, and to retire to Antwerp, from whence they were also obliged to recede on the sixth of May, when they retreated to Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant, after leaving a garrison of two thousand men in Antwerp.

The French king immediately invested this place, which, unable to stop the progress of such a formidable force, surrendered on the ninth of May; but the citadel sustained a siege of seven days, when the garrison submitted on honourable terms. Encouraged by this success, Lewis ordered the prince of Conti to invest Mons with a strong detachment, one hundred and forty pieces of cannon, and eighty mortars. Though the garrison consisted not of more than four thousand men, they continued for some time to make a resolute defence; but on the twenty-seventh day of July were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. The reduction of Mons was followed by that of St. Ghislain and Charleroi. By the taking of these places the French monarch found himself absolute master of Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault; and now he issued an edict, re-annexing to his crown for ever that part which formerly belonged to them by the treaty of Ryswick in 1697, and which the French had been constrained to relinquish by the treaty of Utrecht; and his majesty granted the administration of the re-united country to monsieur Gerardine.

All this time the allies continued impotent spectators of the rapid conquests of the enemy, who had now only one formidable town from the sea to the bishopric of Liege, unreduced by their army: this was Namur, capital of the province of that name, situate at the confluence of the Sambre and the Maese; and this place they were determined to bring to their obedience. The confederate army, however, being at length reinforced by the Hessian troops from Scotland, and a fresh body of Austrians under count Palfi, so as to amount in the whole to about eighty thousand men; they resolved to take the field, and make head against the enemy. Prince Charles of Lorraine, who had now taken the command, foreseeing the storm that was preparing against Namur, came to the resolution of marching to the protection of that important city, and on the eighteenth day of July took post in an advantageous situation in that neighbourhood, and in sight of the French army, which was encamped at Gemblours.

Here he continued till the eighth of August, when a detachment of the enemy, under count Lowendahl, seized upon Huy, where they found a large magazine belonging to the confederates, whose communication with Maestricht was thus cut off: upon which prince Charles found himself under the necessity of quitting his advantageous post, of abandoning Namur to its own strength, and retiring on the north side of the Maese, to draw his supplies of provision and forage from the duchies of Limberg and Luxemburg. Namur was immediately invested by thirty-five thousand French, under the count de Clermont, who caused the trenches to be opened on the second of September; and on the twenty-third the French, after the loss of four thousand men (from the vigorous defence made by the Austrian garrison) took possession of this important city. Mean while, the allied army lay posted at Maestricht, where they were joined by sir John Ligonier, with three British battalions, and by two battalions of Bavarians, being a part of five thousand men which that elector, since his accommodation with the queen of Hungary, had granted to be taken into the pay of the confederates. Prince Charles then resolved to give the enemy battle. With this view he crossed the Maese, and advanced towards them: but marshal Saxe, apprised of his design, had posted himself so advantageously at Tongres, twelve miles from Liege, that the confederates were obliged to return to Maestricht. But marshal Saxe being reinforced by the body of troops under the count de Clermont, after the reduction of Namur, determined to bring the confederates to an engagement, who had repassed the river Jaar in their retreat. He accordingly crossed that river after them on the tenth of October, N. S. encamping within a league of them, who were now convinced of the marshal's intention to attack them; and therefore taking possession of the villages of Liers, Warem, and Roucoux, the confederate generals drew up their forces in order of battle.

The French advanced in three columns, with a large train of artillery in their front; and about noon a terrible cannonading began, which lasted till two, with great execution on both sides. Prince Waldeck, who commanded the left wing, was then attacked with great fury, and after an obstinate resistance, obliged to give way. The villages were assaulted in columns by brigades, who were continually replaced as they were repulsed by those who were posted there; till at length, superiority of numbers prevailing, the allies were constrained to abandon those posts, and retreat towards Maestricht, with the loss of five thousand men, among whom, however, were reckoned very few officers; and

and the French purchased the honour of the day at an expensive rate, having lost upwards of nine thousand men in the action, with a great number of eminent officers, and without obtaining any material advantage, since they could not prevent the confederates from making good their retreat to Maestricht. With this battle the campaign closed in the Netherlands. The allies passed the Maese, and took up their winter-quarters in the duchies of Limberg and Luxemburg, and the country along the Lower Maese, while the French disposed of their troops in their newly-conquered places.

In Italy victory changed sides this campaign; after having favoured the combined army of France and Spain, she now declared herself for the queen of Hungary and the king of Sardinia. By the peace of Dresden, which the court of Vienna had concluded with the king of Prussia, it had been enabled to send, without interruption, several large reinforcements to the troops in Lombardy, which turned the balance on the side of the empress queen: prince Lichtenstein was at the head of 40000 Austrians, his Sardinian Majesty commanded a body of 36000 of his own troops, while the joint armies of France and Spain, including the duke of Modena's troops, did not amount, in the whole, to above 73000 men. The timely arrival of succours from Germany, to make a powerful diversion on the side of the Mantuan, obliged the French and Spanish generals to bend their force to that quarter; and this not only relieved the city of Turin from a bombardment, with which it was threatened, but encouraged his Sardinian majesty to open the campaign with new spirit and resolution. In February, baron Leutrum, the Piedmontese general, invested and took the strong fortress of Asti; he afterwards obliged the Spaniards to retire from before the citadel of Alexandria, which they had kept blockaded all the winter, and made 1000 of them prisoners in this town. Casal fell next into his hands, and he recovered Valenza; whereupon M. Maillebois retired with the remainder of his forces from Tortona, into the neighbourhood of Genoa, by which all the Montferrat was freed from an enemy.

Don Philip met with equal disgraces on his side, being obliged to abandon Milan, the capital of his projected empire, on the 8th of March, and to retire to Pavia, whither he was closely followed by prince Lichtenstein, who had sent a detachment to retake Guastalla, which was immediately recovered; and the marquis of Castellaer having abandoned Parma, that city, with its artillery, and a large magazine, fell into the hands of the Austrians. Don Philip and count Gages, alarmed at the near approach of the enemy, retired under the cannon of Placentia, where they were joined, on the 3d of June, by the French forces under Maillebois, and by the little detached army under Castellaer.

In the mean time, his Sardinian majesty, having recovered all the Piedmontese fortresses, and driven Maillebois into the Milanese, entered that duchy, to invade the territories of Genoa; where, on the 31st of May, he reduced Novi, 25 miles north from Genoa, and then advanced towards the Po, with an intention to join the Austrians, and bring the Spaniards and their auxiliaries to an engagement. Before this junction could be effected, however, the army of the three crowns attacked the Austrians in their camp at St. Lazaro, which brought on a most desperate battle, in which Count de Gages and M. Maillebois acquitted themselves with the greatest intrepidity, and had actually forced the entrance into the Austrian intrenchments, and seized some cannon which defended the lines; yet it all proved ineffectual; the better fortune of the Austrians prevailed, the combined forces were routed, and fled with the utmost precipitation to Placentia, whither the victors did not think proper to pursue them. The combined forces had nine thousand men killed and wounded, and near six thousand taken prisoners, while the Austrians lost only four thousand three hundred men.

A short time after the Austrians were joined by the Piedmontese, the king of Sardinia assumed the chief command, and prince Lichtenstein being obliged to quit the army, to recover his health, was replaced by the marquis de Botta. Gages and Maillebois, leaving the marquis de Castellaer with four hundred men, to defend Placentia, intrenched themselves between the Lambro and the Adda: from this post his Sardinian majesty, who was now at the head of sixty-four thousand men, resolved to dislodge them; which he accordingly effected by the battle of Rotto Freddo, fought on the ninth day of August, when the enemy was obliged to retreat, in great disorder, to Tortona, with the loss of eight thousand men, a considerable number of colours and standards, and eighteen pieces of cannon. The Austrians however suffered considerably, having four thousand men killed outright, among whom was the gallant general Bernklau. Immediately upon this victory Placentia surrendered, and its garrison of nine thousand men were made prisoners of war. Don Philip continued his retreat into the territories of Genoa; but his army was, by this time, reduced to less than thirty thousand men: so that, unable to maintain his ground, he put his troops again into motion, and returned into Provence. The court of Madrid, enraged at the ill success of its arms, and thinking, by changing its general, to change its fortune, recalled count Gages from the command of the Spanish forces, which was again bestowed upon the marquis de las Minas.

In the mean time, the victorious confederates appeared before Genoa, on the fourth day of December: the senate finding itself abandoned by its allies, and unable to make any resistance, were obliged to deliver up the gates of their city to the Austrians, together with all their arms, artillery, and ammunition. The marquis de Botta was left in the subjected city, with sixteen hundred men; but this general, exacting the most severe contributions, and otherwise behaving in a haughty, and even cruel manner to this subjected people, irritated beyond farther sufferance, they flew to arms; and being joined by the peasants of all the neighbouring villages, and privately instigated and encouraged by the senate, they became so formidable, as, in a few days, to drive the Austrians out of the territories of the republic, after having killed and made prisoners great numbers. On the other hand, marshal Brown, with an Austrian army, passed the river Var, and took possession of Venice, the first town on that side in France. The French troops under M. Belleisle, who had been sent to supersede Maillebois, in their retreat, made the whole country a desert.

During these transactions, an event happened, which had some influence on the affairs of Europe; this this was the death of Philip of Spain, in the sixty-third year of his age. He had received, a little before his death, a letter from count Gages, with an account of the battle of San Lazaro; the loss of which, that general attributed to the peremptory orders which had been sent him from the court of Madrid, where the queen of Spain managed every thing as she pleased; and this circumstance, it was supposed, hastened the king's end. He was succeeded by his eldest son Ferdinand, born of Maria Louisa Gabriela, sister to the king of Sardinia. The same month (July) was remarkable for the death of Christian VI. king of Denmark, who was succeeded by his son Frederick V. who had married the princess Louisa, youngest daughter to king George II.

The naval transactions of this year redounded very little to the honour of the British nation. The reader may remember, that commodore Barnet was sent in the year 1744 with a squadron to the East Indies, where he made some considerable captures: upon the intelligence of which, the French monarch granted a commission to monsieur de la Bourdonnais, who had the command of a French squadron in those parts, constituting him commander in chief, as well of the ships of war belonging to France in those seas, as of those belonging to their East India company. Monsieur de la Bourdonnais having received this commission, applied his whole attention how to oppress the British company; and as the most effectual way determined to attempt the reduction of Madras or Fort St. George. Barnet, the English commodore, died in the Indies, and was succeeded in command by captain Peyton, who had under him six ships of war, from sixty to forty guns, which was more than a match for the French commodore. Nevertheless, upon the latter's appearing before Madras, Peyton declined an engagement, and abandoned that important settlement, which was taken without opposition by la Bourdonnais in the beginning of September. The French afterwards made an attempt upon St. David's, another of our settlements in the East Indies; but by the valour of the garrison, and the arrival of commodore Griffin from Europe, with a strong reinforcement of ships of war, the enemy were obliged to abandon their enterprize.

Nothing of importance happened in America this year, though it was a scene that seemed to promise the greatest success to the arms of England. Indeed our ministry, encouraged by the reduction of Cape Breton, had projected the conquest of Quebec, the capital of Canada, situate on the river St. Laurence. With this view a powerful squadron was fitted out at Portsmouth in the beginning of April, and commissions were sent to the governors of the British colonies in North America, empowering them to raise companies to join the armament from England, which was to be commanded by admiral Lestock and general Sinclair; but by some unaccountable delays, the departure of the fleet was postponed till it was no longer the season to risque the great ships on the boisterous coast of North America. On the other hand, the court of Versailles were as little successful in their operations by sea; for having sent a formidable squadron, under the duke d'Anville, with three thousand land-forces on board, to the West Indies, as a convoy to a large fleet of merchant ships bound to that part of the world, and afterwards to undertake somewhat of importance against our settlements in North America, they met with such storms, and were afflicted with such a sickness, upon their voyage to Chebucto harbour in Nova Scotia, where they cast anchor on the sixteenth of September, that they could undertake nothing, and returned in a shattered and miserable condition to Europe, after having lost the duke their chief commander.

The British ministry, not willing that the expensive armament they had fitted out for the reduction of Quebec, should be wholly useless to the nation, resolved it should attempt a descent upon the coast of Brittany; if possible, to make themselves masters of port l'Orient, the repository of all the stores and ships belonging to the French East-India company. The squadrons destined for this expedition, consisted of sixteen great ships, eight frigates, and two bomb-ketches, commanded by Richard Lestock, Esq; who, since his acquittal by his court-martial, had been made admiral of the blue; eight battalions of land troops, with a detachment of matrosses and bombardiers, were embarked in thirty transports, under the conduct of lieutenant general St. Clair; and the whole sailed from Plymouth on the fourteenth day of September, steering directly for the coast of Brittany, which they made on the seventeenth, and at night anchored in the road of Polduc.

The appearance of so numerous a fleet, occasioned unspeakable terror among the inhabitants of the coast, as the best of its militia had been either sent to Flanders and Italy, or to America, with the duke d'Anville; so that if the British forces had immediately landed, nothing could have prevented their surprising the city of Port l'Orient; but as they did not make their descent till the twentieth, in the afternoon, the French took the advantage of this delay, to put themselves in as good a posture of defence as time and circumstances would allow. The ramparts were mounted with cannon from the ships in the harbour; new works were raised with surprising expedition; the garrison was reinforced by several bodies of regular troops; and great numbers were assembled from all parts; so that our forces were in danger of being surrounded in an enemy's country. General St. Clair however caused a small battery to be built, and began to open trenches before the place; but the fire from the town was so greatly superior to that of the English, and still continued to encrease; and admiral Lestock declaring, in repeated messages, that in such an advanced season of the year, he could not, nor would not, continue with the great ships on that dangerous coast; St. Clair found there was nothing left for him but to retreat, which he effected in good order, and reembarked with his troops on the twenty-eighth. Ashamed, however, to quit the enemy's coast without doing something, the fleet sailed to Quiberon Bay, where they destroyed the Ardent, a French ship of the line, and afterwards made a descent on the peninsula, while the little islands of Houat and Heydic were reduced by the sailors. This, however, was an enterprize as ill concerted as that against Port l'Orient had been executed; for these being almost desert islands, the taking of them them could answer no purpose. About the middle of October our fleet sailed from the French coast, and returned to England. Thus this great armament, twice baffled in its enterprizes, produced nothing but blunders and laughter; whereas every other part of the war was too serious and too terrible.

The parliament meeting on the eighteenth of November, the king made a speech to both houses; in which, after taking notice of the signal success which had attended the arms of his good allies the empress-queen and the king of Sardinia in Italy; and that an irruption was now actually making into France, by which that kingdom must be greatly distressed; he acquainted them, that having had some intimations of the enemy being inclined towards a pacification, he, to show his sincere disposition towards the same, had consented to the holding conferences at Breda; but that, in the mean time, he thought it highly necessary to take proper measures for pursuing the war with vigour; and for that purpose, that the confederate army in the Netherlands might be seasonably augmented. He said, he was sorry to be obliged at the same time to acquaint them, that by reason of the unavoidable accidents and consequences of war, the funds appropriated for the support of his civil government had for some years past fallen greatly short of the revenue intended and granted by parliament; and therefore he relied on their known affection to him, to find out some method to make good this deficiency.

The conductors of the former opposition in the house of commons being now almost all of them concerned in, or connected with the administration, that house breathed only the most affectionate and complying addresses, which they enforced with a liberality that almost exceeds the bounds of credibility; for when they came to consider the supply, they voted four hundred and thirty-three thousand pounds to the empress-queen of Hungary, and three hundred thousand to the king of Sardinia: they granted four hundred and ten thousand pounds for eighteen thousand Hanoverians, and one hundred sixty-one thousand six hundred and seven pounds for six thousand Hessians: they continued the subsidies to the electors of Cologne, Mentz, and Bavaria; and gave five hundred thousand pounds to enable his majesty to carry on the war with advantage: in a word, the whole of the supply amounted to no less than nine millions four hundred and twenty-five thousand two hundred and fifty-four pounds. This was raised by a land-tax of four shillings in the pound; by transferable annuities, at an interest of four, and a premium of ten per cent. and by new duties on houses and windows, on coaches and wheel-carriages.

The king, in return for this liberality of his commons, and to convince his people in general that he was desirous, by every possible means, to reduce the public expence, sent a message by Mr. Fox, secretary at war, to the house of commons, signifying his majesty's consent to the reduction of three regiments of horse into dragoons, and proposed the disbanding the third and fourth troops of his own life-guards; by which reduction about seventy thousand pounds a-year would be saved to the public; and, in case of necessity, a more numerous body of troops might be furnished for the same money. This proposition was received by the commons with the warmest sentiments of gratitude and thankfulness, which they expressed by a most loyal and affectionate address. The enemies of England, however, affected to consider this instance of oeconomy in her king as a proof of his inability to prosecute the war: but their rejoicing on this account soon received a deadly damp, on hearing that the commons of Britain, who were chiefly to be affected by the expence, had voluntarily, and almost unanimously, voted a larger sum than had ever been granted in any one year for carrying on the war.

The spirit and zeal in the English parliament were in great measure owing to the pride and arrogance of the court of Versailles. The States-general had received a public memorial in the year 1745 from the French monarch, inviting them to hold a general congress; to which they consented: but the hard and unacceptable conditions proposed by Lewis to their High Mightinesses, rendered the negociation unsuccessful. However, it gave rise to the opening of conferences in this present year, 1746, at Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant, where the earl of Sandwich, the British plenipotentiary, and the marquis de Puisieux, the plenipotentiary of France, met count Wassenaer, the Dutch minister, on the eighteenth of September, each of them being commissioned to enter upon a treaty for preventing the calamities of so ruinous a war: the count de Harrach was also sent as a plenipotentiary from the court of Vienna. The conduct of the French, however, soon evinced their little inclination of coming to an accommodation. The first proposal made by the earl of Sandwich was, that a cessation of hostilities should immediately take place: but the French minister would consent to no armistice, without the allies would accept of such conditions as should be dictated by the court of Versailles. He even declared, that he had no power to admit of the title of Imperial majesty, assumed by the court of Vienna, unless his court was indemnified for the extraordinary expences of the war occasioned, he said, by the obstinacy of the queen of Hungary, and unless that princess would give full satisfaction to all the allies of France. He added, that he had instructions to admit of no mention, in the preliminaries, of the house of Stuart as having no right to the crown of Great Britain; because his most Christian majesty would be entirely free and unrestrained in respect to that house. From these arrogant declarations, which were more suitable to an absolute conqueror than a negociator, it evidently appeared that the French were far from being heartily disposed to a peace: on the contrary, they were resolved to try the event of another campaign, during which they hoped they should be able either to draw off the Dutch from their connections with the allies, or at least to make themselves masters of the whole of their country. The conferences therefore immediately broke up, and the ministers returned to their respective courts.

Ferdinand, the new king of Spain, immediately upon his accession to the throne, took such measures as seemed to indicate a disposition to peace, and to promote the felicity of his subjects, by relieving them from all the perplexities of war. He not only manifested a resentment against the French ministers, whom he charged with having sacrificed the true interests of his father, but actually made several overtures for terminating the differences between his crown and that of England. The British ministry hereupon sent the marquis de Tabernega, a Spanish nobleman, who was, or pretended to have been, formerly a favourite of the new king, when prince of Asturias, and who had long resided in England, to Madrid, and entrusted him with proposals to his Catholic majesty; but from the course of the proceeding, it did not appear that this nobleman retained the least degree of influence with Ferdinand, or was ever permitted to return into his presence. Nevertheless, the negotiation went so far, that the king of Portugal, as being the most proper power in Europe, undertook the office of mediator, and sir Benjamin Keene was sent to Lisbon on the part of Great Britain; but the influence of the queen-mother and the French party, with whom she acted in the strictest concert, predominated in the councils of the court of Madrid: and this pacific scheme, however promising in appearance, proved in the end abortive.

This disappointment, together with the rejection of a pacification at Breda, seem to have inspired the British cabinet with a more than common martial spirit. The earl of Sandwich was sent to the Hague to settle the contingencies of the war in the most effectual manner, and to bring the Dutch, if possible, to act upon the same plan as was pursued in the confederacy between England, Holland, and the house of Austria, against Lewis XIV. The conclusion of the last campaign, and the arrogance of the French in their late negotiation, had by this time convinced their High Mightinesses, that nothing less than the revival of such a confederacy could oppose the irresistible force of France, or preserve their own liberties. Obligated, therefore, to consult their own security in that of their allies, lord Sandwich found them in a disposition to embrace his proposals, and to adopt the most vigorous and resolute measures; and a convention was entered into, by which Great Britain was to furnish forty thousand men, the States-general the like number, and the empress-queen sixty thousand; in all, one hundred and forty thousand; these were to be exclusive of garrisons: and her Imperial majesty also obliged herself to maintain ten thousand men in the duchy of Luxemburg, to effect a junction of sixty thousand Austrians and thirteen thousand Piedmontese, for the purpose of making an irruption into France on the side of Provence: and, lastly, to employ a separate body of fifty thousand men on the Panaro, to keep in awe the king of the Two Sicilies, who, tho' he had re-embraced his neutrality, still kept a considerable body of troops in pay. The Dutch being at length brought to act with resolution, the duke of Cumberland set out for Holland about the beginning of December, to concert with marshal Bathiani the plan of operations for the next campaign, in which he was to act as commander in chief of the confederate forces.

Before I conclude the events of this year, I must take notice of the dismissal of the gallant admiral Vernon from his majesty's service. The great merits of this naval officer were universally acknowledged; but he had a warmth in his disposition which frequently hurried him into excesses of resentment which in his cooler moments he must certainly have condemned. He had thought himself ill used in several instances by the board of admiralty, to whom he had therefore set himself in open opposition, and had even, in defiance of their authority, exerted several privileges which belonged alone to that board. The lords commissioners expostulated with him thereupon. Their mildness had the contrary effect from what was intended by it: it begat in the admiral a contempt of their power, who, he thought, were afraid of displacing one so popular as himself. He answered their remonstrances in the most harsh and indecent terms: he even went so far as to publish several letters that had been sent to him from that board, as well as from the ministry; many of which were such as, in strictness of honour, as well as in point of prudence, ought not to have been exposed to view. Such a procedure was certainly not to be overlooked by any government that was willing to retain the least shadow of authority. Mr. Vernon having openly avowed his being the publisher of those letters, the lords of the admiralty were forced to send for him, and to inform him that his majesty had commanded them to strike his name out of the list of the admirals; and the command of the squadron for Channel service was bestowed upon vice-admiral Martin, who was very active in suppressing the French privateers.

It was in this year that the court-martials on the admirals Matthews and Lestock unanimously acquitted the latter, and declared Mr. Matthews incapable of serving in the royal navy for the future. It deserves to be recorded, to the great honour of our constitution, that this court-martial having come to some insulting resolutions upon a process being served upon one of their members from the court of Common Pleas, tending to defame lord chief-justice Willes, who presided in that court, were compelled to ask pardon in open court of that magistrate, and to publish a recantation in the London Gazette.

The cruizers on all sides, English, French, and Spaniards, were extremely active during the whole course of this year; and though we lost a greater number of ships, this difference was more than compensated, by the superior value of the prizes taken from the enemy. From the French we took three ships of war, thirty-eight privateers, two Guinea ships, and ninety-four vessels from St. Domingo and Martinico: and from the Spaniards, thirteen privateers and forty-seven merchant vessels, including six register ships, and several other vessels, amounting in all (of both nations) to one hundred and forty-three. But war was not the only enemy to the opulence of Spain: its calamities were aggravated by the visiting hand of heaven; and Lima, the capital of Peru, was swallowed up by a most tremendous earthquake, which began on the seventeenth of October, and continued till the tenth of November in very frequent and dreadful shocks, when it ended, after causing the total destruction of a populous city, six miles in circumference, as well as the fine port of Callao, and upwards of eighteen thousand inhabitants, together with the public treasure, to the amount of three millions of piastres, or about seven hundred thousand pounds of our money, which had been accumulated there since the commencement of the war, and was not to be conveyed to Europe till the conclusion of a peace.

France,

France, notwithstanding all her acquisitions in the Netherlands, was so debilitated by her extraordinary efforts, that she had only one violent push to make to ensure her the full completion of her extensive projects. She could no longer depend on the king of Prussia, who had declared for a neutrality, as had also the princes of the empire. She was now destitute of the imperial name, authority, and troops: the forces of the elector-palatine and the landgrave of Hesse no longer acted on her side; and the king of Naples had been obliged to recall his troops into his own dominions; so that she was reduced, only with the assistance of Spain and Genoa, to make head against the forces of the English, Dutch, Austrians, and Piedmontese, which in a short time must inevitably overpower all the resistance she could make. In this situation, it was resolved by the council of Versailles to make greater efforts than ever had been done in any former period. His most Christian majesty proposed to open the campaign in person, at the head of one hundred and fifty thousand men in the Netherlands; and sixty thousand were ordered to take the field in Provence. To give the greater effect to this immense armament, the French king revived in the person of marshal Saxe, the title of marshal de camp general, which empowered him to command not only the marshals of France, but princes of the blood; an honour which had not been possessed by any person since the time of the great Turenne.

The duke of Cumberland had made excellent dispositions for taking the field early in the spring; and accordingly, in the month of February 1747, though the season was then remarkably severe, he began to draw the troops from their cantonments, and towards the latter end of March they took the field in three several bodies. His royal highness fixed his head-quarters at the village of Filberg, eleven miles from Breda, with eight thousand English, eighteen thousand Hanoverians, and six thousand Hessians; the Dutch were assembled at Breda, under prince Waldeck; and the Austrians, with four thousand Bavarians, were collected in the neighbourhood of Venlo, on the eastern side of the Maese, under the command of marshal count Bathiani: but though the whole army should have consisted of one hundred and forty thousand men, they did not amount to more than one hundred and twenty-six thousand. Besides, the confederates, through the inexcusable negligence of the Dutch and Austrians, were ill provided even with the common necessities of life; and were obliged, notwithstanding their early appearance in the field, to continue inactive for six weeks together; while marshal Saxe, in the mean time, kept his troops in their cantonments, between Antwerp, Bruges, and Brussels, where they were furnished with plenty of provisions, and exempt from all kind of labour and fatigue. By keeping his troops in this good condition, he had leisure to form a plan of operations which, if steadily pursued, bid fair to do credit to his new dignity. This was no other than to carry the arms of France into the very heart of the United Provinces, by instantly attacking Dutch Brabant. He transmitted his plan to the ministry at Versailles, where a council was held to take it into consideration; and being strongly supported by cardinal Tencin and his party, and countenanced by the approbation of the monarch, it prevailed against the less sanguine, but more prudent, part of the members; and orders were immediately dispatched to the marshal to begin his operations without delay, who had provided a large train of artillery at Ghent ready for the enterprise.

As a previous step to this invasion, a declaration was drawn up in the name of the French monarch, and communicated to the States-general by the abbé de la Ville, his most Christian majesty's minister at the Hague. In this declaration great complaint was made of the States having afforded an asylum in their dominions to the enemies of France; and thereby given them an opportunity of disturbing the territories which she had conquered from the queen of Hungary. The memorial farther imported, that the French king was obliged to take this step by the necessity of war; but that his most Christian majesty, to shew the tenderness and regard he still retained for the republic, had given the most peremptory orders that his troops should observe the strictest discipline, without interfering with the religion, government, or commerce of the republic. He likewise declared, that the countries and places, of which his army might be obliged to take possession, should be considered as no other than a pledge, which, as soon as the republic should give him a sufficient assurance they would no longer assist the enemies of his crown, he would readily restore.

Their High Mightinesses had scarcely perused this famous memorial, when, to their terror and amazement, they found the French bursting open their barrier. Marshal Saxe had entrusted the execution of his military operations against Dutch Flanders to count Lowendahl, who was his intimate friend and relation: and this general, assisted by the marquis de Contades, marched from Ghent and invested Sluys, at the head of twenty-seven thousand men. This fortress, formerly of considerable consequence, but now in a declining condition, surrendered in a few days. The same was the fate of Sas Van Ghent, and of several other places of less importance, before the end of the month of April. The next place that Lowendahl invested was Hulst; to the assistance of which the confederates sent a detachment of three English battalions, under general Fuller. Part of these battalions being posted in the fort of Sanberg, which covered Hulst, continued to defend the place for some time with great resolution, and even success; but at length, overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to retreat to Welsthoorden, and leave the French to form the siege. The duke of Cumberland did indeed advance at the head of nine battalions, and made a surprising expeditious march, to save this important fortress; but just as he arrived in sight of the town, it was infamously surrendered by the Dutch governor, though, it is said, he had certain intelligence that these succours would be there the very day he gave it up. But he was a mercenary hireling of France, as many more of his countrymen were at that time; and the first intimation the duke received of this event was by a general discharge of the artillery from the fortifications upon his troops; by which a great many lives were lost, and his royal highness's own person in the most imminent danger. Lowendahl continuing his rapid progress, soon after completed the reduction of all Dutch Flanders.

This successful invasion of their dominions by so powerful an enemy, at length roused the Dutch to such a degree as procured a sudden change in their government. The populace rose in all parts of the United Provinces, exclaiming that they were now in a worse condition than when invaded by Lewis XIV. in 1672; that they had been betrayed by their governors; and therefore, that it was high time to take the administration out of their hands, and vest it in those of a stadtholder; and that this stadtholder should be no other than the head of the house of Orange. The name of this prince was William-Henry Friso, prince of Nassau-Diets, who had been left by William III king of England, successor to the hereditary dominions of the house of Orange. The present prince, as hath been already observed, had espoused the princess Anne, eldest daughter to his Britannic majesty. The states of Zealand were the first who, giving way to the national voice, and duly attentive to the interests of their country, appointed him their captain-general and admiral. Their example was followed by Rotterdam, and the whole province of Holland; and on the second day of May his serene highness was invested with the power and dignity of stadtholder, captain-general, and admiral, of the seven United Provinces. This alteration in the Dutch government was productive of the most beneficial consequences to the republic, to her allies, and indeed to all Europe. All commerce and contracts with the French were now prohibited; the peasants were armed and exercised; a resolution was made to augment the army with thirty thousand men; the city of Amsterdam began to raise eighteen companies of militia, of one hundred men each; and several other cities followed their example. A council of war was established for examining into the conduct of those governors who had too hastily given up the frontier towns; and orders were issued for commencing hostilities against the French, both by sea and land.

In order also to counterbalance the great superiority which the French possessed upon the continent, his Britannic majesty formed a resolution of engaging a body of Russians in his service. This measure had been some time in agitation; and the czarina, who had no reason to be satisfied with the court of Versailles, seemed extremely well disposed to agree to such an expedient. The negotiation, however, was attended with considerable difficulties; but at length her czarian majesty signed a treaty with our court, whereby, in consideration of an annual subsidy of three hundred thousand pounds, she engaged to keep on foot during the war, upon the frontiers of Livonia, a body of fifty thousand foot, and forty or fifty galleys upon the coasts of that province, to act in such manner as his Britannic majesty should require in assistance of his allies. The States-general had been called upon early in this year, to take their share both of the engagement and expence: but so dilatory had been their measures, that this provision was not stipulated till the summer; by which the advantages expected from this alliance were rendered ineffectual for this year's campaign.

So close a connection, however, had now been established between Great Britain and the States-general; and so sensible were the latter of the danger to which they were exposed, that they were willing to co-operate heartily with the former in prosecuting the war: but as the Dutch had no good opinion of the sitting parliament of Great Britain, which had worn so many various complexions, and which had concurred in such various measures and oppositions, they insisted upon its being dissolved, previous to their fully exerting themselves. In order to remove all their doubts, his majesty, notwithstanding the seeming harmony subsisting between him and this great assembly of the nation, resolved, with the advice of his council, to dissolve the present parliament, though it had not as yet sat above six years. Accordingly, when the business of the session was dispatched, the king having given the royal assent to the several acts they had prepared, dismissed them on the eighteenth of June, with a speech filled with the most warm, the most tender, and the most grateful acknowledgements of the loyalty, zeal, and tenderness, he had experienced from them in the most critical emergencies of government: a conduct, he said, that must for ever endear the memory of this parliament to posterity. But, he observed, that as this parliament would necessarily determine in a short time; and as nothing would give so much weight and credit to our affairs abroad in the present conjuncture, as to shew the dependence he had on the affections of his people, he had judged it expedient speedily to call a new parliament, not in the least doubting to receive new proofs of the same loyalty and affection of his faithful subjects in the choice of their representatives. In consequence of this declaration, the parliament was dissolved, and writs were issued for summoning a new one. Among the laws passed this session was an act for taking away and abolishing the heritable jurisdictions and tenor of ward-holdings in Scotland, which were reckoned among the principal sources of those rebellions which had broke out since the Revolution.

While count Lowendahl and the marquis de Contades were extending the French conquests in Dutch Flanders, marshal Saxe, with their grand army, remained in their cantonments. The confederates, about the middle of April, began to rouse from that state of inaction, in which they had now continued above fourteen weeks, and formed a design to retake Antwerp: but this city was so effectually covered by the French grand army, and so well fortified and garrisoned, that they soon found the enterprize impracticable: upon which his royal highness the duke thought proper to take post between the Great and Little Nethe, to cover Bergen-op-Zoom and Maestricht. In the month of May the French king arrived at Brussels; and his general, marshal Saxe having called in his detachments, made the whole army quit its cantonments, in order to dislodge the confederates from the siege of Maestricht. With this view, he advanced towards Louvain; and the confederates perceiving his aim, put their army into motion also, to take post between that town and the enemy. On the twentieth day of July they took possession of their ground, when the duke drew the army up in order of battle, placing his right at Beilen, and his left at Wirle; having in the front of the left wing the village of Val, or Laffeldt, in which he posted five battalions of British and Hanoverian infantry. The French had taken possession of the heights heights of Herdeeren, immediately above the allies, and both armies cannonaded each other till the evening.

By day-break, on the twenty-first of June, the French marshal put his troops in motion; and by nine o'clock the confederate generals discerned the enemy's infantry marching down the hill, in a vast column, of ten battalions in front, and as many in depth, and advancing directly towards the village of Val, being a small inclosure with five houses in it, and which the confederates had strongly fortified. It must be acknowledged, that no troops ever made an attack under more disadvantages than those of the French, on this occasion. The situation of the ground was particularly against them; for, from several little eminences which commanded the face of the hill of Herdeeren, the English had placed batteries so as to play full upon their infantry, as well as upon the squadrons of horse, their right and front flanks, during their descent. Add to this, that a cold rain, which had fallen almost incessantly for twelve or fourteen hours, had rendered the ground so slippery that the troops could hardly keep their feet. Notwithstanding these obstacles, and the heavy fire of the confederates, which did terrible execution among the French, they bore still forwards with amazing resolution, and about twelve o'clock began their attack against Val with great vigour and intrepidity; and were received with equal courage, and their first brigades dispersed with prodigious loss, as were their second, third, and fourth divisions; but fresh troops still succeeding these with invincible perseverance, the confederates, overpowered by numbers, were obliged finally to abandon the village, after it had been lost and recovered four several times. The action was chiefly confined to this narrow spot, which was in a manner choaked with the bodies of the dead and wounded.

The duke of Cumberland perceiving how gallantly the British and Hanoverians behaved in the village, ordered the left wing to advance upon the French. The center likewise began to advance under prince Waldeck, who was at the head of the Dutch the whole day; and marshal Bathiani brought up the Austrians towards Herdeeren, to annoy the flanks of the enemy. The French on their side prepared to receive the confederates, whose dispositions, however, had been so well concerted as to ensure them the victory, in all human probability, when their plan was entirely overthrown, and the fortune of the day suddenly changed to their prejudice, by the dastardly behaviour of some Dutch squadrons, who, perceiving the infantry before them pressed hard upon by the French, instead of sustaining them, turned their backs, and went off a full gallop to the right about, and in their flight overthrew five battalions of infantry of the confederate corps de reserve, that were coming from the right towards Val. The French cavalry taking advantage of this confusion, rushed furiously in among these scattered troops, whom they trampled under feet, and penetrated through and divided the lines of the combined army. The duke of Cumberland, who had rode to the head of the Dutch cavalry, and endeavoured, but in vain, to rally them, with difficulty rejoined the left wing; and in all probability the confederates would have sustained a total defeat, had it not been for the exemplary bravery of sir John Ligonier, who, by charging at the head of some British regiments of dragoons and a few squadrons of imperial horse, the whole line of the French cavalry, with such irresistible fury as gave a check to their pursuit, enabled the duke of Cumberland to effect an orderly retreat to Maestricht. Sir John himself was taken prisoner in this gallant attack; but the regiment he commanded retired in excellent order. Besides sir John Ligonier, major-general count d'Yffembourg, major-general Bland, colonel Conway, and lieutenant-colonel lord Robert Sutton, were some of them wounded, and all of them made prisoners: in a word, almost the whole loss of the allies, amounting to six thousand men, fell upon the English, Hessians, and Hanoverians, they having in a manner opposed the whole French army, the share of the Dutch and Austrians in the engagement, as well as their loss, being too inconsiderable to be named. Notwithstanding that the allies were compelled to yield the victory to the French, it was not till they had purchased it by the loss of upwards of ten thousand of their best troops, several standards, and several pair of colours, with seven hundred prisoners taken, including sixty officers, some of them persons of distinction. After the battle, the garrison of Maestricht was reinforced by two English, three Austrian, and five Dutch battalions; and next morning the allied army passed the Maese at Maestricht, and extended themselves towards Vist, in the duchy of Limberg, with their head-quarters at Heer, the French still continuing at Tongres.

His most Christian majesty, in order to make the most of his late success, determined to form the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, the honour of conducting which he was pleased to confer on count Lowendahl, who, at the head of a detachment of thirty-six thousand men, presented himself before the place in the beginning of July. Bergen-op-Zoom is one of the strongest fortresses in Dutch Brabant: it was generally deemed impregnable, and had obtained the name of the Maiden Fortress, from its having never been reduced, though frequently besieged by very considerable armies. It could not be blocked up by sea; so that vessels with provisions and ammunition could sail in and out of the harbour every day unmolested, while an army of twenty battalions and fourteen squadrons, detached by the States-general, under the prince of Saxe Hildburghausen, was so stationed as to be able to relieve the garrison, consisting of three thousand men, with fresh troops at will. All these difficulties appeared so considerable, that it was the opinion of most people, even very good judges of the military art, that the French, by investing it, had committed a very rash action; and the general to whom the operations had been consigned would, in this enterprize, forfeit all the glory he had hitherto acquired. This was more particularly the belief of the people in England and Holland, who exulted before-hand in the mortification and disappointment of the French king, which they looked upon as infallible: but the abilities, experience, and resolution of count Lowendahl, and the ardour of his troops, warmed by his example, and fighting in a manner under the very eye of their sovereign; joined to the negligence, inattention, and numberless faults of a superannuated governor, effected what appeared to be, in the common course of such affairs, impracticable.

Old baron Cronstrom had been by the stadtholder appointed governor of Dutch Brabant, and had assumed the command of the garrison of Bergen-op-Zoom, some little time before the French laid siege to the place. He was grown grey in the field, and his character stood unimpeached as to fidelity and courage. When count Lowendahl, on coming before the town, summoned him to surrender, he replied, that he would suffer himself to be buried under the ruins of the place before he would give up the favourite work of the famous engineer Coehorn. However, though an old commander may, by his advice and experience, prove of infinite service in a council of war; yet the case is quite otherwise, when such an one is to give life and movement to a numerous body of troops, and direct the operations of a garrison, besieged by a powerful and expert commander. Lowendahl was all fire and activity; Cronstrom all phlegm and deliberation.

The eyes of all Europe were turned upon this siege, the most important and the most bloody (for the time it lasted) that had happened during the whole course of the war. From the sixteenth day of July, N. S. to the fifteenth of September, every day, nay, almost each hour, was marked by some dreadful scene of horror and destruction, effected by the springing of mines on each side, by the desperate sallies of the garrison, and by the unremitting attacks of the besiegers: the latter, however, were always the principal sufferers; and we may presume the siege would have been extended to a much greater length of time, had it succeeded only by the common methods practised on such occasions: but M. de Lowendahl having given out that he intended to make himself master of the several forts which defended the town before he should make his grand attack, old Cronstrom gave completely into the snare that was spread for him; and knowing that all those forts were still as tenable as ever; and presuming that the dreadful execution made by his mines would at length damp the courage of the assailants, he gave himself up to an indolent security, which in the end proved fatal; for in the morning of the sixteenth of September, the French general having thrown a prodigious quantity of bombs into the ravelin of Dedim, as soon as those had their effect, the besiegers threw themselves into the fosse, and mounted the breaches, burst open the sally-port of Fallenius, mounted four breaches in the bastions of Pucelle and Coehorn, where they forced the intrenchments, drove all those of the garrison they found in their way from their posts, spread themselves from right to left on the curtains, formed in order of battle, and came down into the town before the body of the garrison could be assembled. Baron Cronstrom had so little apprehended an attempt of this kind, that he had not taken a single precaution against it; and was actually slumbering out the indolence of age quietly in his quarters, where he would have been surprised and made prisoner by the enemy, had it not been for the amazing bravery of a body of Scots Highlanders, commanded by lord John Murray, who fell like lions upon the French who had surrounded his quarters, and fought until two thirds of them were killed upon the spot, and the remainder brought off the old governor, in spite of all the opposition of the enemy, to whom the place was now abandoned; while the troops that were encamped in the lines retreating with the utmost precipitation, all the forts in the neighbourhood immediately surrendered to the victors, who now became masters of the whole navigation of the Schelde. The French king thought the conquest of Bergen-op-Zoom so important, that he made Lowendahl a marshal of France immediately on the news being brought him. He also appointed count Saxe governor of the conquered Netherlands, and then returned to Versailles elated with triumph. In a little time after this transaction, both armies retired into winter-quarters, when his royal highness the duke of Cumberland returned to London, where he arrived on the thirteenth of November. Thus terminated the campaign of 1747, on the side of the Netherlands; a campaign replete with glory to the French; productive of infinite prejudice to the confederates; and particularly inglorious to the Dutch, by the loss of their Maiden Forts, which had never till now been violated by a foreign embrace.

I left the Austrians and Piedmontese, at the close of the last year, pursuing the fugitive French, Spaniards, and Neapolitans, into the territories of Provence, under the conduct of count Brown, who had assumed the chief command on the absence of his Sardinian majesty, seized with the small-pox. M. Belleisle, who had succeeded Maillebois in the command of the French army, being greatly inferior to the Austrian general, was not able to oppose his progress, who sent baron Roth, with twenty-four battalions, to undertake the siege of Antibes by land, while the British squadron under vice-admiral Medley was to assist him by sea.

Antibes is a well-fortified town, situate in the Mediterranean, fifteen miles south of Nice, and sixty north-east of Toulon. It was now defended by the chevalier de Sade, with a garrison of eighteen hundred men; and all the necessary preparations were made for a vigorous defence. The British squadron having bombarded the town severely for some time, baron Roth on the twentieth of January opened his trenches before it, while count Brown lay with the main army at Frejus, to cover the siege. One half of the town was reduced to ashes; but the governor made a gallant defence, till M. Belleisle, who had by this time received such reinforcement as gave him the superiority in the field, effected the passage of the Argens, and was advancing with a full resolution to attack the Austrian general: but count Brown finding it impossible to continue his operations without exposing his whole army to the most imminent danger, immediately raised the siege of Antibes, and repassed the Var in the beginning of February, without suffering any considerable loss from the enemy.

Belleisle having thus compelled the imperial general to abandon Provence; and receiving continual reinforcements till his army amounted to sixty thousand men, made himself master of Nice, Montalban, Villa Franca, and Ventimiglia, while the Austrians were forced to retire towards Final and Savona, in the dominions of Genoa, which were in the possession of his Sardinian majesty. In the meantime, another large body under count Schuylenberg, who had succeeded the marquis de Botta, co-operated with fifteen thousand Piedmontese in an attempt to recover the city of Genoa.

The French ministry were too well acquainted with the importance of this republic to their cause, to neglect any measure that could contribute to its security. Large sums of money were remitted to the senate: engineers and officers were sent to discipline their troops and repair their fortifications. The duke de Boufflers was appointed by his most Christian majesty his ambassador-extraordinary to the republic, the better to animate them to a vigorous resistance; and a large body of troops was detached from Belleisle's army to co-operate with their forces: but these falling in with the British fleet, were either taken or driven back to France.

The operations of general Schuylenberg were retarded for a considerable time, by the severity of the weather and badness of the roads; but these obstacles being removed, the Austrian general presented himself before Genoa on the thirty-first of March, at the head of forty thousand men. Before he commenced hostilities, he used all his endeavours to persuade the Genoese to submit to the clemency of her Imperial majesty; but they rejected his propositions with the utmost indignation, and declared their unanimous resolution to be buried in the ruins of their capital rather than ask for quarter, or submit to the Austrian mercy, whose effects they had already so severely felt. In the beginning of May Genoa was invested on all sides; and Schuylenberg carried on his operations with such skill, vigour, and intrepidity, that he seemed for some time in the fairest way to succeed in the reduction of the place. The duke de Boufflers, besides his character of ambassador to the republic, acted likewise as commandant of the troops that were in Genoa; while M. Belleisle continued at Ventimiglia, with a view to penetrate into Piedmont and Lombardy, and compel the Austrians to abandon the siege. It was chiefly owing to this latter general that the Genoese were delivered from the calamities that threatened them: for though Schuylenberg was successful in all his attacks upon the city, and had even made himself master of the suburbs of Bisagno; yet he was obliged to desist from his enterprize, and raise the siege on the tenth day of June, to return into the Milanese, in order to join his Sardinian majesty and count Brown, to cover Piedmont and Lombardy from the effects of M. Belleisle. The Genoese, immediately on finding themselves at liberty, with the assistance of the French and Spaniards in the city, made irruptions into the Parmesan and Placentia, where, in spite of all the precautions of the duke de Boufflers, they committed the greatest violences and cruelties, in revenge for the mischiefs they had undergone from the enemy. Soon after, they had the misfortune to lose the duke de Boufflers, who died at Genoa in the latter end of July, and was succeeded in his command by the duke de Richelieu.

Mean while, M. Belleisle committed the execution of his project of an irruption into Piedmont to the chevalier de Belleisle his brother, who set out on his expedition at the head of thirty-four thousand French and Spaniards, and arrived on the sixth day of July at the pass of Exilles, a strong fortress on the frontiers of Dauphiné, situate on the north side of the river Doria. His Sardinian majesty, apprized of the enterprize which the chevalier had undertaken, had committed the defence of this important post to the count de Briqueras, with ten battalions of Piedmontese and four of Austrians, who had formed an encampment behind the lines, while divers detachments were posted along all the passages of the Alps.

On the eighth of July the chevalier attacked the Piedmontese intrenchments with incredible bravery, but was constantly repulsed, with extraordinary loss, during an engagement that lasted from ten o'clock in the morning till eight in the evening. This valiant general, however, determined not to survive a miscarriage, made one last effort to animate his dispirited troops by his own glorious example, in which he emulated the bravest of the ancient Romans. Snatching a pair of colours from the hand of an ensign, he called on those nearest him to follow his steps; and advancing with incredible intrepidity, amidst a most furious discharge of musquetry from the enemy, he planted the colours with his own hand on the intrenchments: at that instant he received two musket-shots, one in the head, and the other in the body, which laid him dead on the spot. The French immediately gave way, and fled with precipitation, after having four thousand eight hundred men killed, and six hundred wounded. The consequences of the defeat at Exilles were, the abandoning of Ventimiglia by M. Belleisle, and frustrating all his hopes of penetrating into Piedmont by the way of Ceva. The marshal now retreated towards the Var to join the troops from Exilles, and prevent any invasion on Dauphiné by the king of Sardinia. The excessive rains, however, prevented the execution of any design of importance on either side, and about the middle of October the two armies were put into winter-quarters. Thus ended the campaign of 1747 in Italy; and in this manner had the French king the mortification to find all his projects in that country entirely baffled.

Nor was he more fortunate in his naval operations, our sea commanders having, in the course of this year, given the enemy several remarkable specimens of their skill and bravery. The council of Versailles, sensible how much it behoved them to recover to their crown the important settlement of Cape Breton, as also to put M. de la Bourdonnaye in a condition to improve his successes in the East Indies, dispatched two squadrons of ships of war from Brest harbour, as soon as the season of the year would permit, in order to accomplish this double view. The British ministry did not long remain strangers to the destination of this equipment, and made the necessary dispositions to intercept both squadrons. Vice-admiral Anson and rear-admiral Warren were ordered out with a strong fleet to cruise off Cape Finisterre on the coast of Galicia. On the third of May they fell in with the French squadrons, commanded by M. de la Jonquiere and M. de St. George, consisting of six large ships of war, as many frigates, and four armed vessels, equipped by their East India company, having under their convoy 29 ships laden with merchandize. The British fleet consisted of 12 sail of the line, 3 frigates, and 2 sloops. Notwithstanding this great superiority in their disfavour, the French commanders did not decline the engagement; but having sent away the armed vessels with the merchant ships, maintained the battle with their six ships of war with great spirit and conduct, till, overpowered by numbers, they were compelled compelled to strike their colours. About seven hundred of the French were slain in this action. The English lost no less, and among them captain Grenville, of the Defiance, a young commander of the most promising talents. Several of the enemy's merchant ships were afterwards picked up by our privateers. By this defeat the designs of France against our possessions in North America and the East Indies were totally frustrated. The French lost a million and an half sterling, of which a considerable sum was found in bullion on board the prizes, and four thousand of their prime sailors were locked up in our prisons. Great rejoicings were made for this important success; and soon after Mr. Anson was created a peer, and Mr. Warren was honoured with the ribband of the order of the Bath.

On the twenty-sixth day of June captain Fox, of the Kent, cruising with five other ships of war off Cape Ortugal in Galicia, fell in with a fleet of homeward-bound St. Domingo men, consisting of one hundred and seventy sail, under the convoy of commodore de la Motte, and four large ships of war. On discovering the British squadron, La Motte abandoned his convoy, and sought his safety in a precipitate flight, our ships being too foul to come up with him. However, forty-six of the merchant ships fell into our hands, having one thousand four hundred and twenty-eight sailors on board, with a very valuable cargo of sugar, indigo, cotton, &c. which furnished rich dividends for our valiant British tars.

But the French marine suffered another more important loss in the month of October. Our government had received information towards the close of the summer, that a very large fleet of merchant ships, bound from the ports of France to the West Indies, were collecting together at the Isle of Aix, and that a strong squadron of ships of war was to escort them. Rear-admiral Hawke was therefore dispatched to intercept them; and after cruising some time upon the coast of Brittany, on the fourteenth of October, being in the latitude of Belleisle, about eight in the morning, he saw a great number of ships, but so crowded that he could not count them: this was the French fleet, consisting of nine sail of the line, and several frigates, commanded by M. de l'Estanduaire, a chef d'escadre, with two hundred and fifty-two merchant ships under his convoy. Admiral Hawke had with him twelve sail of the line, and two frigates of fifty guns each. The French commodore, as soon as he could distinctly make the British squadron, threw out the signal for the trade to make the best of their way, with a sixty gun ship and a frigate for their protection; and followed this by another signal for his ships of war to form the line of battle. Admiral Hawke, on his side, finding that he lost time in forming his line, while the French were standing away, at eleven made the signal for a general chase. By twelve both fleets were engaged, and maintained a very bloody fight till night, when all the French ships, except two, struck to the English flag. The enemy behaved with remarkable bravery; nor did they yield till their ships were all disabled. Their loss in killed and wounded amounted to eight hundred, and about three thousand of them were made prisoners. Of the English there fell about one hundred and fifty, among whom was captain Saumarez, of the Nottingham, a gallant and experienced officer, who had served under lord Anson in his expedition to the Pacific Ocean. Rear-admiral Hawke arrived on the thirty-first of October with his six prizes at Portsmouth, into which port the whole flower of the French navy had been triumphantly conducted, within the space of five months. Admiral Hawke was created a knight of the Bath for his gallant behaviour; but captain Fox, of the Kent, had the misfortune to incur the censure of a court-martial, for some instance of neglect during the engagement, and was dismissed from his command: however, as he remained perfectly clear from any imputation of cowardice, his majesty was pleased, in about two years afterwards, to promote him to the rank of a rear-admiral.

I have already taken notice, that admiral Medley in the Mediterranean was particularly active and vigilant in his station: he blocked up a Spanish squadron this summer in Carthage, assisted the Imperialists in the operations in Italy, and intercepted succours that the French were sending to the assistance of the Genoese republic: but death terminating the services of this deserving commander on the fifth of August, the conduct of the squadron devolved on admiral Byng, who had been sent to reinforce him, and who proceeded on the same plan of operations.

The affairs of the English in the East Indies still continued to wear a very indifferent aspect: the enemy had taken and held from us Madras, without Mr. Griffin, who had succeeded Peyton, being able to attempt any thing towards its recovery. Nevertheless, he blocked up Pondicherry for a considerable time, and reduced it to great difficulties, tho' the French squadron was superior to his. Our East India company, sensible of the critical situation to which their affairs were now reduced, bestirred themselves so effectually with the ministry, that rear-admiral Boscawen, an officer of approved capacity and valour, was ordered to the East Indies this year, with a squadron of six ships of the line, besides smaller vessels, having two thousand marines on board, to reinforce Mr. Griffin (now made a rear-admiral) and return the French visit to Madras, by an invasion of Pondicherry: but this squadron did not leave England till the month of November; and after making an unsuccessful attempt against the French at the island of Martinico, four hundred miles to the east of Madagascar, the whole squadron arrived safe at Fort St. David on the twenty-ninth of July, 1748. Their subsequent transactions will fall within the narrative of the naval operations of that year.

In the West Indies rear-admiral Knowles, with a squadron of eight ships and two frigates, attacked Fort Louis, on the south side of Hispaniola, which, after a short but vigorous defence, was surrendered. After this, he made an attempt upon St. Jago de Cuba, in which he was baffled, and obliged to return to Jamaica. The blame of this disappointment he cast upon Mr. Dent, one of his captains; but a court-martial, which was afterwards held upon that gentleman in England, acquitted him with honour.

In September, Mr. Knowles being upon a cruise off the Havannah with seven ships of the line, fell in with a Spanish squadron of nearly the same strength, strength, under the command of the admirals Reggio and Spinola, when an engagement ensued, which was maintained with great warmth on both sides, and ended in the loss of two of the enemy's capital ships, the rest of their fleet getting safe into the Havannah. Here again Mr. Knowles arraigned some of his captains of misbehaviour, whose conduct, on their return to England, was strictly examined by a court-martial. Two of these captains were censured; nor did the admiral himself escape without reprimand for some neglects he had been guilty of in the course of the action. This was made a kind of party quarrel amongst the gentlemen of the admiral's squadron, which ended in the death of captain Clark, who was shot by captain Innes in a duel fought between them in Hyde-Park: but it appearing by unquestionable evidence that captain Clark had given the challenge, his majesty was pleased to extend his royal clemency towards his antagonist. In the course of this year the British cruizers were so alert and successful, that they took six hundred and forty-four prizes from the French and Spaniards; whereas the loss on our side did not exceed five hundred and fifty. In a word, the superiority of the naval arms of Britain was now so conspicuously evident, that she had not an enemy to contest her sovereignty of the ocean.

When states and empires make the most forcible efforts to display their strength, it is then generally found that they are the most in need of, and most inclined to a respite from their operations. Not one of the belligerent powers at this time could dissemble his hearty wish for a speedy peace.

France, notwithstanding the rapid conquests she had lately made in Germany, languished amidst her successes, and beheld with deep concern the ruin of her commerce, the most valuable branch of which had been destroyed by the rupture between her and the Dutch. Lewis XV. had by his ambition brought ruin upon his people, and desolation upon his country. Hemmed in as he was by a train of flatterers and parasites, the voice of public distress found a way to his ear; and not a week passed without the mortification of receiving the most pathetic, and at the same time the most spirited, remonstrances from his parliament and his trading companies, upon the dismal effects of those disputes he had raised and kept alive.

The court of Vienna saw herself disappointed in the flattering hopes she had formed from the success of her arms in Italy: her finances were almost exhausted, her armies ill supplied, and most of her provinces desolated, by a long and bloody war. Cogent motives these, to be desirous to see an end of it, especially as the house of Austria had succeeded in establishing the imperial dignity in the person of the archduke, consort to her Hungarian majesty.

Spain carried on the war with equal inactivity and ill success. The evils it had intended against the British nation were all fallen on its own head; and notwithstanding its rich possessions in each hemisphere, it saw itself still farther than ever from being in a condition to enforce its ambitious and extravagant claims on the Austrian dominions, and had of late adopted the appearance of greater moderation.

England, during this whole war, had sustained by far the greatest expence of any one of the contending powers; not only to maintain invincible navies and formidable armies, but likewise in giving subsidies to almost all the powers of Europe; and the scrupulous fidelity with which her illustrious monarch adhered to his engagements with his allies, and to the desire of maintaining the balance of power in Europe, had occasioned the shedding of torrents of blood both by sea and land, and drained the national treasure to satisfy the incessant cravings of greedy foreign mercenaries: but now she had nothing to hope from the continuance of the war, as the French and Spanish marine were in a manner annihilated; and her ministry were sensible that they could not carry it on another campaign without loading the people with new impositions.

The Dutch, who had been in a manner compelled to engage as principals in this war, much against their inclination, and were much fonder of negotiating than fighting, wished for nothing so much as to see their barrier freed from the French yoke, and themselves delivered from those troublesome friends, who, under the pretence of protecting them, laid waste their most fruitful provinces, and stopped up the sources of their beneficial commerce. The prince of Orange, as stadtholder, warmly attached as he was to the common cause, had many strong and weighty reasons to wish for an end to the present troubles: the unsettled state of his family-affairs; the powerful opposition he encountered from the French party in Holland; and the difficulty he found in raising money, made him naturally wish for an opportunity of establishing his authority upon a solid foundation. In fine, all the contending powers seemed, towards the close of this year, to be inspired with the same pacific views and inclinations; and it required no consummate skill in politics to foresee that the war could not be of much longer duration.

His most Christian majesty had, immediately after the battle of Val, in a personal conference with sir John Ligonier, given broad intimations of his desire of a pacification. He had also, after the reduction of Bergen-op-Zoom, ordered his minister, the abbé de la Ville, to transmit from the camp of Hamel, near Tongres, a declaration to the States-general on the same subject. France also repeated her pacific applications at the court of London: in consequence of which, the contending powers agreed to the holding another congress, which was actually opened in March following (1748) at Aix-la-Chapelle, an imperial city in the duchy of Juliers, formerly the capital of Germany, when Charlemagne swayed the imperial sceptre. The earl of Sandwich and sir Thomas Robinson were nominated plenipotentiaries on the part of his Britannic majesty; as was the count de St. Severin de Arragon, for France; with count Bentinck, the baron de Wassenaer, and M. Hasselaer, on the part of the United Provinces.

With these appearances of a speedy termination of the unspeakable calamities incident to war, his Britannic majesty assembled his new parliament on the tenth of November, when the commons again chose Arthur Onslow, esq. their speaker, who had presided in the chair during the two former sessions. His majesty on the twelfth returned again to the house of peers, where the commons waited on him with the speaker; after which his majesty opened the first session with a speech, congratulating the two houses on the signal successes of the British navy, and the happy alteration of the government of the United Provinces. His majesty gave them to understand, that a congress would speedily be opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, to concert the means for effecting a general pacification; and reminded them that nothing would more conduce to the success of this negotiation than the vigour and unanimity of their proceedings.

The new elections had gone every-where in favour of the court. The duke of Newcastle, and his brother Mr. Pelham, who were absolutely predominant in the cabinet, found but an immaterial opposition in the parliament. Such addresses were therefore presented, in return to his majesty's speech, from both houses, as made the government perfectly secure of having their most sanguine wishes fulfilled, their most extensive demands gratified; and indeed never did parliament make good their professions with greater punctuality than the present. They voted forty thousand seamen, forty-nine thousand land-forces, besides eleven thousand nine hundred marines; the subsidies to the queen of Hungary, the czarina, the king of Sardinia, the electors of Mentz and Bavaria, the prince of Hesse, and the duke of Wolfenbuttle; the sum of two hundred thirty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-nine pounds was granted to the provinces of New England, to reimburse them for the expence of reducing Cape Breton; five hundred thousand pounds were given to his majesty for the vigorous prosecution of the war; and about one hundred and fifty-two thousand pounds to the Scottish claimants in lieu of their jurisdiction. In a word, the supplies for the year 1748 fell very little short of nine millions; six millions and an half of which were raised on a loan by subscription, chargeable on a new subsidy of poundage exacted from all merchandize imported into Great Britain, which was subscribed for immediately on opening the books, and above two millions more offered, and rejected; an extraordinary instance of public spirit and national credit. The rest was raised by continuing the land tax at four shillings in the pound, the malt-duty, and one million to be taken out of the sinking fund.

Some material debates were agitated in parliament this session. A bill was brought into the house of commons "for a general naturalization of foreign protestants." Many shrewd arguments were advanced in favour of this measure, which would tend, it was said, to supply the great waste of people which the war had occasioned, and to introduce new manufactures into the kingdom, as many industrious individuals in foreign parts would be thereby encouraged to settle in England. Nevertheless, the city of London viewed this affair in so very different a light, that on the 4th of February, 1748, the sheriffs of that city presented a petition against it to the lower house, setting forth, "That it would occasion a decrease, if not a total loss, of the duties of package, scavage, portage, and balliage of the goods of foreign merchants: that it was more likely to increase the poverty than to add to the wealth of the nation; for that neither rich nor industrious foreigners needed such inducement, as the latter never wanted encouragement, nor the former the very privilege in question, when they applied for it to parliament: that a like law had been attempted in the reign of king William, but had been rejected on such national considerations as, it was presumed, would never escape the attention, nor lose the regard of the house: that a law having been actually passed for that purpose in the reign of queen Anne, it was found so detrimental to the public interest, that it was soon afterwards repealed, and not without some severe reflections on the conduct of those who had promoted it: that, as a naturalization could not convey to foreigners a true knowledge of our happy constitution in church and state, or give them such a zeal and affection for it as might be requisite for maintaining and defending it; and as those who had grown up under arbitrary government might be fittest to answer arbitrary purposes, too much caution could not be used in a matter of so great importance; and therefore it was hoped that the house would not think proper to pass a bill which was liable to such insuperable objections." This petition was warmly supported; and Mr. Pelham, who was now the acknowledged minister, fearing that the bill, if passed, might hurt his influence in the city of London, which at that time was very high, agreed to drop it for that time.

The pernicious practice of insuring French ships in England, which prevailed to a shameful degree about this period, occasioned bitter complaints on the part of the fair dealers, and was indeed an abuse which called aloud for parliamentary redress. Though the commerce of France was in a very declining condition, it could have been further decreased, even to a state of absolute ruin, had it not been supported by their insurances in England. In this practice France found a perpetual support amidst all her mercantile losses. On this all the remains of the French trade entirely subsisted. Many of the most opulent captures from the French, particularly two exceeding rich prizes from the South Sea, taken by the Royal Family privateer, under the command of captain Talbot, in 1745, were insured in England, which occasioned the national gain to be no more than the price of the premium, which was usually from twenty to twenty-five per cent. and if the insured ships were destroyed, there was a clear national loss to the English of the whole value, after deducting the premium. Besides, this practice was the more pernicious, from the very nature of the end for which it was calculated, because the insurers had strong temptations to contribute to the escape of the ships which they had insured. Therefore, while the British admiralty, and proprietors of private ships of war, were exerting the maritime force of the state, totally to ruin the commerce of France, the British insurers frustrated their endeavours. These, among many other cogent reasons, convinced the legislature of the necessity of prohibiting this practice. Accordingly, a bill was brought into the house of commons, "to prohibit insurance on ships belonging to France, and merchandize and effects laden therein, during the present war with France;" which bill met with universal approbation, passed quickly through both houses, and soon after received the royal assent.

As the parliamentary contentions were very considerable, the business of the senate was dispatched patched with very little interruption, and several acts were passed, extremely salutary to the national interest *. On the thirteenth of May the king put an end to the session, after having acquainted both houses in his speech, that the preliminaries of a general peace were actually signed at Aix-la-Chapelle by the ministers of Great Britain, France, and the United Provinces; and that the basis of this accommodation was a general restitution of the conquests which had been made during the war. Immediately after the prorogation of the parliament, his majesty set out for his German dominions, after having appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his absence; he was convoyed by a squadron commanded by lord Anson, and arrived at Helvoetsluys on the twenty-second of May. He proceeded directly to Maeslandsluys, where he was met by her royal highness the princess of Orange; and after a short conference, his majesty set out for Utrecht, where he had an interview with his serene highness the stadtholder, and prince Frederic of Hesse, and then proceeded to Hanover.

I shall here take notice of some transactions, as well foreign as domestic, particularly relating to Great Britain, which fell out during the sitting of this session of parliament, that I may be more at liberty to pursue uninterrupted the more important events of this year, till the final conclusion of the peace. On the twentieth day of January a pardon passed the great-seal for lord Mac-Cleod, eldest son of the earl of Cromartie, who had been drawn by his father into the rebellion. On the twenty-ninth, the prison of Kinsale in Ireland was consumed by fire, and fifty-four French prisoners confined therein perished in the flames. On February 6, the earl of Chesterfield resigned the seals of his office as one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, and was succeeded by the duke of Bedford. On the thirteenth an order of council was published, directing the condemnation of several ships our Mediterranean cruizers had taken from the Genoese; which prizes amounted to two hundred thousand pounds. On March 25, a most dreadful fire broke out in Exchange-alley, Cornhill, which proved more hurtful in its consequences than any conflagration since the fire of London, 1666. The flames spread three different ways; and, notwithstanding every possible assistance, near one hundred houses in Cornhill, Birchin-lane, Exchange-alley, George-yard, and the courts adjacent, &c. were consumed: and though many goods, &c. were saved by the vigilance of the magistrates, yet the loss was excessive great; and the consternation in the city, during this dreadful calamity, can scarcely be expressed.

Accounts arrived from New England in the month of April this year, of a great tumult which happened at the close of the last year at Boston, the capital of that province, occasioned by admiral Knowles impressing several of the inhabitants and seamen belonging to the outward-bound ships for the service of his fleet; a practice which it should seem our American brethren have no very favourable opinion of. But by the vigorous behaviour of the assembly, after many acts of violence, this dangerous riot was quelled. It was, however, succeeded by a much greater calamity, which befel that capital on the twenty-third of December, when the Court-house was consumed by fire, and the province records, &c. destroyed therein, to the almost irretrievable detriment of the whole colony.

The smugglers in England were become amazingly audacious in their illegal practices at this period, having, amongst other enormities, broke open the king's warehouse at Colchester, and conveyed away a great quantity of tea: upon which a proclamation was issued of pardon, and a reward of a hundred pounds, for the discovery of each of the parties concerned in that outrageous transaction.

About this time several promotions were made both in the army and navy, and the rank between the land and sea officers, whose mutual disgusts arising from their continual disputes about precedence in points of command had done infinite prejudice to the public service, was established by his majesty's order in council in the following manner:

Admirals and commanders in chief to rank with field-m Marshals.

Admirals with their flag on their main-top-mast-head with generals of horse and foot.

Vice-admirals with lieutenant generals.

Rear-admirals with major-generals.

Commodores with broad pendants with brigadier-generals.

Captains of three years standing with colonels.

Younger captains with lieutenant-colonels.

Masters and commanders with majors.

Lieutenants with captains.

* Amongst the most public was an act 'for granting to his majesty a subsidy of one shilling poundage upon all goods and merchandizes to be imported into the kingdom of Great-Britain, and for raising a certain sum of money by annuities and lottery, to be charged on the said subsidy, and for repealing so much of an act made in the twentieth year of his present majesty's reign, as enacted that prize goods and merchandizes might be exported without paying any duty of custom or excise for the same.' And this act, than which none could be of greater importance, was carried without a division. The act of parliament for preventing vexatious suits and arrests for small debts, expired on June 1, 1747, and left all the avenues open to private animosity; but on the eighteenth of February, 1748, an act was passed 'to revive and make perpetual two acts of parliament, one made in the twelfth year of king George I. intitled, An act to prevent frivolous and vexatious arrests; and the other made in the fifth year of his present majesty, to explain, amend, and render more effectual the said act.' The royal assent was also given to 'an act for permitting tea to be exported to Ireland and the British plantations in America, without paying the inland duties charged thereupon by an act of the eighteenth year of his present majesty.' Also to 'an act for encouraging the making of Indigo in the British plantations in America', for which commodity the English paid the French about two hundred thousand pounds a year: and as the preliminaries for a general peace had been adjusted, his majesty passed an act 'for the relief of insolvent debtors;' by which all debtors for five hundred pounds, or under, were discharged; all fugitives who were abroad on the first of January last, were entitled to the benefit of this act, on delivering up all their effects, except wearing apparel and tools, not to exceed ten pounds: but all bankrupts not obtaining their certificates; attornies retaining their clients money; persons indebted to the crown, and former insolvents, were excepted; and creditors of those continuing in gaol, were authorised to compel them to give an account upon oath of their effects.

An order was also issued, requiring all his majesty's sea-officers, from the admiral down to the midshipman, to wear an uniformity of cloathing; for which purpose pattern-coats for dress'd suits, and frocks for each rank of officers, were lodged at the navy-office, and the several yards, for inspection.

The allies had resolved to open the campaign in the Netherlands with an army of a hundred and ninety thousand men, in order to compel the French to abandon the barrier which they had conquered; but the dilatory conduct of the Dutch and Austrians prevented the execution of this measure. The people of Holland were so highly incensed at the behaviour of their rulers, that they rose in tumults in all the capital cities. They plundered the farmers of the revenue, abolished the taxes, and insulted the magistrates: so that the States General, seeing their country at the brink of ruin, committed the government entirely into the hands of the prince of Orange, whom they constituted hereditary stadtholder and captain-general of Dutch Brabant, Flanders, and the Upper Quarter of Guelderland; and the East India company chose him director and governor-general of their commerce and settlements in the Indies. Thus invested with an authority unknown to his ancestors, he exerted himself with equal industry and discretion, in new-modelling, augmenting, and assembling the troops of the Republic. The administration of government was now chiefly invested in the prince, partly as stadtholder, and partly as captain-general and admiral in chief; the states alone had the power of making war or concluding a peace, of entering into foreign alliances, of raising taxes, and coining of money; but the prince had the disposal of all military commands both by sea and land, in time of war by his own commission; in time of peace by that of the states: as stadtholder or governor, he represented the supreme civil magistrate; in which capacity he pardoned offenders and nominated magistrates, the towns presenting him the names of three, out of which he chose one. In him resided the dignity of the state: he had a palace, a court, his guards, and all the other marks of external grandeur incident to princes: to him foreign ministers paid their court, as did every one who was inclined to serve his country in the fleet or army: in the council of state he had a seat and a decisive voice, but not in the assembly of the States General, though nothing could be transacted there without his knowledge or against his consent.

The conferences at Aix la Chapelle were opened on the eleventh of March; but as those kind of negotiations are frequently rendered fruitless by the affected obstacles and difficulties thrown in by artful discontented ministers, and by the unavoidable delays resulting from sending and receiving dispatches from their respective courts, his most christian majesty, in order to accelerate the proceedings, had given positive orders to M. Saxe to form the siege of Maestricht, a strong city and fortress on the river Maese, and the key of Holland on that side. The manœuvres of this great general, to deceive the confederates, as to his real intent, have been justly esteemed a masterpiece of the kind by all judges of the military art: by his various marches and counter marches he so puzzled the allies, that apprehending he designed to make an attempt upon Breda, or Luxembourg, they precipitately abandoned the strong posts they occupied in the neighbourhood of Ruremonde, and marched to cover the places they thought most in danger; when, to their no small confusion, they learned that the French had formed the investiture of Maestricht on the third of April.

The garrison consisted of Imperial and Dutch troops, under the conduct of the baron d'Aylva, who defended the place with great spirit and resolution. He annoyed the besiegers in repeated sallies; but, determined to overcome all opposition, they carried on their approaches with incredible perseverance and bravery: they attacked the covered way, in which they actually made a lodgment; and Maestricht was on the point of falling into their hands, when hostilities were suddenly interrupted by the arrival of a courier from the duke of Cumberland, who commanded the allied army, with the news that the preliminary articles of peace had been signed at Aix-la-Chapelle on the nineteenth of April: upon which marshal Saxe and the governor agreed to a cessation of arms for two days. A messenger was sent to the duke of Cumberland, who sent another to marshal Saxe; and the world was now informed that, for the glory of his most Christian majesty's arms, the pacificators had agreed that the town of Maestricht should be surrendered to his general, on condition that it should be restored, with all the magazines and artillery. Marshal Saxe accordingly entered the place on the third day of May, when the garrison marched out with all the honours of war, and a suspension of arms immediately ensued.

Several difficulties had been raised in the course of the negotiations at Aix-la-Chapelle, in regard to the different pretensions of the contending parties; but these were speedily adjusted, and the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, France, and the United Provinces, convinced that, as soon as they should be agreed, the other parties would find themselves under a necessity of subscribing to their decisions, signed the preliminary articles for a general peace on the evening of the nineteenth of April, at the house of the French plenipotentiary. By these articles, the French and the English conjointly, with their allies, agreed immediately to evacuate the several places they had conquered from each other during the war; and that Don Philip, Infant of Spain, should be invested in the duchies of Parma and Placentia, to enjoy the same in full sovereignty, until the decease of his Catholic majesty the king of Spain, when he would succeed to the throne of the Two Sicilies; in which case the aforesaid duchies were to revert to the house of Austria.

The courts of Vienna and Madrid were very unwilling to accede to the preliminaries, and even entered protestations against them, both of these powers pretending to be greatly injured thereby; the empress queen, in particular, complained heavily, that instead of having an equivalent for Silesia, her dominions had been dismembered; and that what was restored to her was left at the mercy of the first invader, by the demolition of the fortifications that should protect them. She complained also, that after having, out of an excess of complaisance to the British nation, refused some very advantageous terms of peace that had been offered her her by the court of France, she was now left to bear all the calamities that would ensue from so long and bloody a war.

The Spanish government had flattered itself that one of the conditions of these preliminaries would have been, the obliging the court of Great Britain to restore to her Gibraltar; whereas not the least mention was made thereof, either in the preliminaries or the treaty: this therefore was the subject of discontent to that power.

His Sardinian majesty was also unwilling to give his accession, because he found himself disappointed in the hopes of obtaining the possession of Final: but the public benefit getting the better of private interest, all parties at length were prevailed upon to accede. Count Kaunitz, the Austrian plenipotentiary, on the fourteenth of May, signed the act of accession of the empress-queen of Hungary to the preliminary articles. The Sardinian minister, and the plenipotentiary for the duke of Modena, signed their accession on the thirty-first of May; and the Genoese and Spanish plenipotentiaries did the same on the seventeenth of June.

Thirty-seven thousand Russians, under the command of prince Repnin, granted by the czarina to the assistance of the confederates, had been advancing since the beginning of the year from Livonia; and on their entrance into Germany were met by general Mordaunt and colonel Durand, who were appointed by his Britannic majesty to conduct them to the Netherlands. After a march of seven hundred miles, in the month of June they reached the borders of Franconia, where they were ordered to halt, the French king declaring, that, should they advance farther, he would destroy the fortifications of Maëstricht and Bergen-op-Zoom. The matter was referred to the decision of the British, French, and Dutch plenipotentiaries at the congress, who, on the twenty-second of August, concluded a convention, importing, that the Russian troops should march back to their own country, and that the French king should disband an equal number of his forces. The season being far advanced, the Russians were provided with winter-quarters in Bohemia and Moravia, where they remained till the spring, when they returned into Livonia. In the mean time, thirty-seven thousand French troops were recalled from Flanders into Picardy, and the two armies continued inactive till the conclusion of the definitive treaty; but the war was open for a longer continuance in Italy.

The French and Spaniards began early to reinforce their troops in the state of Genoa. Several convoys arrived in that port from Antibes and Monaco, and landed their men with little interruption; so that the French, Spaniards, and Genoese, had an army of thirty thousand men in the heart of the republic, commanded by the duke de Richelieu, exclusive of independent companies, the militia, and armed peasants: but general Brown, at the head of forty-eight thousand Austrians, was preparing to enter the eastern Riviera, and again lay siege to Genoa. M. Belleisle was extending his army, which consisted of fifty thousand French and Spaniards, for the security of the western Riviera, which was also threatened with an invasion by general Leutrum, at the head of forty thousand Austrians and Piedmontese: but before the commencement of hostilities, an insurrection happened in Sardinia, spirited up by the French and Spaniards, which however was happily terminated.

Count Brown, after several skirmishes on the borders of the republic of Genoa, penetrated into the eastern Riviera; and general Nadaſti made an attempt to surprize Voltri, where he was defeated, with the loss of four hundred men. During this time, M. Belleisle and general Leutrum had intelligence of the preliminary treaty; upon which the cessation of hostilities between the French and Piedmontese in the western Riviera was settled, and limits set to both armies. On the thirtieth of May general Brown received a letter from the duke de Richelieu, with a copy of the act of accession of the empress-queen to the preliminaries, which produced some conferences between the generals, who, on the fourth of June, agreed to a suspension of arms, the river Vara, in the eastern Riviera, being the limit between the two armies.

The naval war in the East Indies was suspended by rear-admiral Griffin, till the arrival of rear-admiral Boscawen, with the reinforcement of ships and men for the service of the British company. The French, in the mean time, were permitted to supply their settlement at Pondicherry with every thing necessary for defending the place against the siege, which was expected on the coming of Mr. Boscawen into those seas. This gentleman arrived at Fort St. David's on the twenty-ninth of July this year, and assumed the command, while rear-admiral Griffin was preparing to return to England. Mr. Boscawen's squadron consisted of nine ships of the line, besides two frigates, a sloop and two tenders, having three thousand five hundred and eighty sailors on board; so that it was determined immediately to undertake the siege of Pondicherry. The admiral himself marched over land from Fort St. David, with a small army of four thousand Europeans and about two thousand natives of the country, while the management of the fleet was left to captain Lisle, of the Vigilant, who had orders to anchor with the whole squadron two miles to the southward of Pondicherry, and remain there till farther orders. Thus, by the tenth of August, the place was invested by land, and blocked up by sea.

The garrison of Pondicherry consisted of two thousand Europeans and three thousand Indians. Monsieur Dupleix the French governor, and Mr. Paradis the chief engineer, had taken the most seasonable and best precautions for the defence and security of this settlement. Having had intelligence of the destination of the British squadron, long before the arrival of admiral Boscawen in the Indian sea, they had erected several additional fortifications about the town: they had put the fort of Aria Coupan, situate on the side of a river from whence it takes its name, at about three miles distance from the town, in a defensible condition; and, in fine, seemed to apprehend very little danger from the enterprize carrying on against them.

The British admiral, however, prosecuted his operations with great judgment and spirit: he took the fort of Aria Coupan; after which he made his approaches to the place, while it was bombarded and cannonaded by the shipping: but the fortifications were so strong, the garrison so numerous, and the engineers so much more expert in their profession than ours, that he made very little progress, and sustained considerable damage. At length, length, his army being reduced by sickness, and the rainy season approaching, the admiral ordered the artillery and stores to be re embarked; and raising the siege on the ninth day of October, returned to Fort St. David, without being molested in his march by the enemy. Thus terminated this expedition, with the loss of seven hundred and fifty-seven soldiers, forty-three artillery-men, and two hundred and sixty-five seamen, to the besiegers; and about five hundred Europeans among the French. This was the last action of importance in this part of the world during this war; for all hostilities were soon after discontinued, by the arrival of intelligence of the cessation of arms, and the conclusion of a general peace: but admiral Boscawen had the mortification to see several ships of his squadron, and above twelve hundred of his sailors miserably perish in a dreadful hurricane on the coast of Coromandel.

Nothing happened this year in the Mediterranean more material than the interception of the French and Genoese barks by admiral Byng, who received a letter from the duke of Newcastle, dated the eleventh of July, whereby he was informed of the signing of the preliminaries, and received orders to put a stop to all hostilities on that account, and to return to England, leaving only seven men of war in the Mediterranean. He accordingly arrived at Spithead on the thirteenth of October, and six ships of the line were sent to reinforce the squadron he had left behind him on the coast of Italy, which was commanded by rear-admiral Forbes.

The British cruizers and privateers made some valuable captures this year, both in the European and American seas, having taken in Europe from the French 254 ships, amongst which were three men of war and three East Indiamen. We also took from the French in America two hundred and eighteen ships, the chief part of the number being St. Domingo and Martinico ships, making the whole of the captures taken from the French during this year amount to four hundred and seventy-two.

The prizes taken this year from the Spaniards in the European seas amounted to twenty-five, amongst which were seven regular ships. Their loss in America was seventy-three, of which three were men of war, and forty-three register ships; so that the whole number of Spanish vessels taken this year amounted to ninety-eight; and the whole united loss of the French and Spaniards together for this year amounted to five hundred and seventy ships.

Both those powers, however, made some considerable captures from Great Britain this year, the French having taken in Europe one hundred and thirty-one, and in America two hundred and four ships; in all, three hundred and thirty-five. The Spaniards also took in the European seas fifty-two of our ships, and in America one hundred and six; in all, one hundred and fifty-eight; so that the whole number of the prizes taken from the English this year, by the French and Spaniards together, amounted to four hundred and ninety-three, being seventy-seven less than the prizes taken from them this year by the English.

To conclude, the Spaniards since the commencement of the war had lost one thousand two hundred and forty-nine ships, and the French two thousand one hundred and eighty-five, being three thousand four hundred and thirty-four together: the English lost one thousand three hundred and sixty ships taken by the Spaniards, and one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight taken by the French, making together three thousand two hundred and thirty-eight, which was one hundred and ninety-six less than those taken by the English during the whole course of the war. Several of the Spanish prizes were immensely rich; a great number of the French were of considerable value, and so were many of the English; but the balance was almost two millions in our favour.

The ministers at Aix-la-Chapelle were all this time assiduously employed in adjusting all the articles of the definitive treaty, in which many difficulties occurred, and great debates happened. In the mean time, however, the prohibition of commerce with Spain was taken off at London by proclamation. This occasioned some murmuring, as British vessels were not admitted into the ports of Spain till some months after. In like manner, all other prohibitions in trade were taken off; and at last, all difficulties being surmounted, the definitive treaty was signed on the seventh of October, by the earl of Sandwich and sir Thomas Robinson, on the part of Great Britain; by the count de St. Severin and the marquis de la Porthune Thueil, on the part of France; by the marquis de Soto Major, on the part of Spain; by the count de Kaunitz, on the part of her Imperial majesty; by Don Joseph Offorio and the count de Chavannes, on the part of Sardinia; and by count Bentinck and the other plenipotentiaries, for the Dutch; by the count de Monzone for the duke of Modena; and by the marquis Doria for the Genoese.

As this famous treaty has been the subject of much dissension, I shall here give the substance of its contents. The preamble, which is very extensive, recites the original motives which occasioned the late war, &c.

Article I. consists of solemn promises and assurances to observe religiously the peace concluded, &c.

Art. II. Every thing that has passed during the war on all sides to be buried in a general and eternal oblivion.

Art. III. The treaties of Westphalia, Madrid, Nimeguen, Ryswick, Utrecht, Baden, Hague, the quadruple alliance, and the treaty of Vienna, are all confirmed, that they may not be derogated from by the present treaty.

Art. IV. The prisoners made, and the hostages given, during the war, to be restored on all sides without ransom, and set at liberty in one month after the exchange of the ratification; but to be obliged to pay all debts they have contracted, and all the ships of war and merchantmen which have been taken since the time stipulated by the cessation of arms, to be restored.

Art. V. All the conquests made during the war to be reciprocally restored.

Art. VI. The restitutions and cessions to be made in six weeks after the ratification; the artillery found in the conquered places to be restored in the same condition they were in at the time the towns were taken; nevertheless excepting that at Menin, Aeth, Mons, Charleroi, and Oudenard.

Art. VII. The duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, to be ceded to the Infant Don Philip, under an express clause, that those states shall return turn to the present possessors, in case that prince die without male-issue, or he, or any of his descendants, shall succeed to the throne of Spain or the Two Sicilies.

Art. VIII. Commissaries to be appointed immediately on all sides, to assemble at Nice and Brussels, to effectuate the respective restitutions and cessions.

Art. IX. The king of Great Britain shall send to France two noblemen of the first distinction, by way of hostages, who are to remain there till certain advice is received of the evacuation of Cape Breton, and all the places which may have been taken in the East Indies.

Art. X. Means as commodious as possible for the troops and inhabitants to be taken in the general evacuation.

Art. XI. All the papers and records found in the towns to be restored, expressly naming the archives of Mechlin.

Art. XIV. The republic of Genoa to be re-established in all the possessions she enjoyed before the war; the money they had in the banks of Vienna and Turin, and which was confiscated, to be restored; and the payment of the interests to commence from the day of the exchange of the ratifications.

Art. XV. Things to remain in Italy on the same footing they were before the war, excepting the cessions made to the king of Sardinia and the Infant Don Philip.

Art. XVI. The Affiento treaty is confirmed, and permission granted to send to the Spanish West Indies, for four years, a ship extraordinary for the non-enjoyment of that privilege during the war.

Art. XVII. The fortifications of Dunkirk to remain as they now are on the land side; but former treaties to be observed with regard to the port and the works on the sea-side.

Art. XVIII. The differences on the subject of the sums which the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover, declared to be due to him, to be amicably adjusted, and the affair of the abby of St. Hubert to be regulated at the same time.

Art. XIX. The article of the treaty of quadruple alliance, which secures the succession of the crown of Great Britain to the house of Hanover, is confirmed in all its points.

Art. XX. All his Britannic majesty's German dominions are guarantied by the contracting powers.

Art. XXI. They guaranty likewise, in the most solemn manner, the pragmatic sanction, that it may not be derogated from by the present treaty.

Art. XXII. They guaranty in like manner Silesia, and the county of Glatz, to his Prussian majesty.

Art. XXIII. As also the execution of all the articles of the present treaty.

Art. XXIV. The exchange of ratifications to be made at Aix-la-Chapelle, within one month, by the ministers of the contracting powers, and in six weeks by those of the powers which acceded thereto.

There were two other articles also in this treaty; the first of which imports, That no consequence is to be drawn from the titles and precedency which the contracting parties may have taken in this treaty; and the second, That no advantage is to be taken from the use of the French language.

As the sixteenth article of this treaty, relating to the Affiento contract adjusted with the court of Spain, may not be perfectly intelligible to some part of my readers, it will not, I believe, be unacceptable to give them a just idea of that contract; in order to which, it will be necessary to trace it from its original, and explain the motives which gave rise to it.

The necessity the Spaniards found themselves under of having negroes from Africa, to be employed as slaves in the mines of the Spanish Indies, gave room to the conclusion of a treaty on the twenty-seventh of August, 1701, between the kings of Spain and France, made with the royal company of Guinea, for introducing into the countries, terra firma's, and isles, belonging to his Catholic majesty in America, the number of forty-eight thousand negroes, of both sexes and all ages, during the space of ten years, at the rate of four thousand eight hundred each year; which convention subsisted to the end of the term for which it was concluded, viz. the month of May, 1712, when the French Guinea company, not having found the advantages they expected in that traffic, thought proper to discontinue it. The English South Sea company having offered, in 1713, when the negotiations for peace were set on foot at Utrecht, to undertake the negro contract on the same conditions made with the French company, the Affiento treaty was concluded on the twenty-sixth of March in the same year, between queen Anne and king Philip V. of Spain, for the term of thirty years, viz. from the first of May, 1713, to the same day of the year 1743, the conditions and advantages of the treaty being drawn up in forty-two articles, besides an additional article, by which the king of Spain granted to the English company the permission of sending every year, during the said term of thirty years, a ship of five hundred tons, with merchandize to dispose of at the fairs in New Spain, on condition that his Catholic majesty should enjoy a fourth part of the profit arising from that annual ship, as well as from the negro treaty, and receive five per cent. besides of the other three parts belonging to England. Now the war with Spain, which begun in 1739, having ceased in this year 1748, by the signature of the preliminaries of peace, there appears nine years non-enjoyment of the traffic, though but four of the treaty; and therefore an indemnification to the term of its expiration only was agreed to, till such time as the respective powers should think proper to renew it.

Upon the whole, no peace ever gave less satisfaction than this of Aix-la-Chapelle, the principal parties concerned having gained nothing but the experience of each other's strength and resources. The precipitation with which the preliminary articles had been signed, made the English accuse their plenipotentiaries of having studied rather to gain a reputation for address and dispatch, than to render their work firm and lasting; especially when they found that the right of English subjects to navigate navigate in the American seas, without being subject to search, was not once mentioned in the treaty, though this claim was the original source of the differences between Great Britain and Spain. A few specific explanations, touching the limits of the English and French possessions in Acadia, would have prevented the unhappy disputes which afterwards arose concerning these limits. How our English plenipotentiaries came to pass so important an article over unprovided for, is not easy to ascertain. The French indeed might purposely neglect it, as it furnished their nation with an opportunity to renew the war whenever they should find it for their interest. It is true, the plenipotentiaries on both sides referred this, and all other disputes, to the discussion of commissaries; but we shall soon have occasion to shew that this reference proved the source of continual disputes and evasions, by which, in the sequel, the destructive flame of war was again rekindled in Europe.

His Britannic majesty sent the earl of Suffex and lord Cathcart to France, to remain there as hostages for the restitution of Cape Breton (agreeable to the ninth article of the definitive treaty) who were presented to the French monarch at Versailles on the twenty-eighth of November. This step was highly exclaimed against here at home, as being a national disgrace, though it was certain the thing was not without precedent, even in the reign of the great Elizabeth; and later, in that of Lewis XIV. of France, who agreed to send hostages to the duke of Savoy. The two noblemen above-mentioned were detained in France till the surrender of Louisburg to the French in July 1749, which was returned in a better condition than when it was taken from them: but as for Madras, the seat of the British presidency in the East Indies, as the French had no hostages at the English court, this important settlement was left entirely to their generosity, of which they gave a shining instance, by leaving it to the English in a most desolate and ruinous condition. In short, the national disgust against this peace discovered itself every day more and more; and the popular writings against it were so vehement, that many, even of the warmest friends to the government, seemed to have very little besides necessity to plead in favour of the treaty.

It would lead me into too minute and circumstantial a detail to recount all the particulars relating to the recal of the British forces, and the mutual restitution of places: suffice it to say, that every thing was effected with the utmost regularity, and without the intervention of any remarkable incident.

In pursuance of the nineteenth article of the late treaty, the duke de Gesvres, governor of Paris, did, by the French king's orders, declare in form to the young pretender, That however well intentioned his majesty stood towards him, the present circumstances would not permit him to consent to his longer continuance upon the territories of his kingdom; and that his majesty would be pleased to see him conform to such necessity, by retiring to any place he should think proper, out of the dominions of France. To which the young adventurer answered with great haughtiness, "Sir, if this message from the king is the result of his having contracted with the maritime powers, I must give you to understand, that his majesty has also contracted with me; and, Pardie! I will not stir out of Paris." There appears to have been some truth in the young man's allegations: for Lewis, instead of contradicting it, wrote him a letter with his own hand, in the most soothing and persuasive terms. Charles, however, continued obstinate in his resolution not to depart out of France; and even after the arrival of the earl of Suffex and lord Cathcart, who were sent as the British hostages to Paris, he appeared publicly on all occasions, and affected to be treated in their presence with all the distinctions of a prince. The two noblemen complaining of this conduct, the French king found himself under the necessity of having recourse to more serious measures. Accordingly, in the beginning of December he caused him to be arrested as he was going into the opera-house, by twelve serjeants of the guards in disguise, and without the least bustle. He was immediately conducted, with all his retinue present, in three coaches, to the castle of Vincennes, and from thence to the frontiers of the kingdom. It was said, but upon what authority is uncertain, that as soon as the young adventurer was arrested, one of his servants delivered to him a letter from the old pretender his father (which he should have done several days before) expressing his surprize and great concern at his behaviour towards the court of France; complaining of his reservedness and undutifulness, and of his following the opinions and persuasions of bad counsellors; exposing the folly of his attempt to resist the intentions of his most Catholic majesty; commanding him, upon the duty he owed to his father and to his king, immediately to obey the directions of his best friend the king of France; and urging the disgrace and difficulties a contrary behaviour must bring upon him.

This forcible expulsion of the eldest son of the pretender to the crown of Great Britain from the dominions of France, was considered as a great sacrifice to the glory of England. Reciprocal compliments passed between the two courts; the earl of Albemarle was appointed ambassador-extraordinary to the French king, and the marquis de Mi-repoix arrived at London in the same capacity.

In the mean while, his Britannic majesty was visiting the most remarkable places of his electoral dominions, and was every where received with the greatest demonstrations of joy and affection. He had lately established an university at Gottingen, which he had the satisfaction to see in a flourishing condition. It was the twenty-third of November before he arrived in England, after a tedious and dangerous passage. On his arrival at London, he was complimented by that city on the peace in a very warm and dutiful address.

On the twenty-ninth of November the parliament was opened by a speech from his majesty, in which he acquainted the two houses of the definitive treaty being signed by all parties concerned; and "that he had made the most effectual provision for securing the rights and interests of his subjects, and for procuring to his allies the best terms and conditions that the situation of affairs would admit: that he took much satisfaction in being able to tell them, that he had found a good disposition in all the parties engaged in the war to bring this negociation to a happy conclusion: that from these circumstances they might promise themselves a long enjoyment of the blessings of a peace, provided they made a right use and improvement of it: that as great a progress had been made in reducing the public expences as the nature of the case would allow; and he only desired them to grant him such supplies as might be requisite for the current service of the year, for their own security, and for fulfilling such engagements as had been already contracted and laid before them: that times of tranquillity were the most proper for lessening the national debt, and strengthening themselves against future events; and he must recommend to them, as the most effectual means for these purposes, the improving of the public revenue, and the maintaining the naval force of the kingdom in due strength and vigour: that those brave men who had distinguished themselves in the service of their country, were certainly proper objects of parliamentary favour and protection; and he hoped they would deem it their duty, as well as interest, to convert their most serious attention towards the advancing of commerce and the cultivating the arts of peace."

This speech was answered by loyal and affectionate addresses from both houses, though that of the lower was not carried without a violent opposition; the members of which bitterly arraigned the conduct of the ministry for concluding the peace before the arrival of the Russians: and they even threw out intimations that they should set on foot a strict enquiry into the causes which had rendered the events of the war so little answerable to the prodigious expence the nation had been at, and the known bravery of the troops she had employed. The motion for the address, however, was at length carried without a division.

Notwithstanding the re-establishment of peace, and the reduction that had been made, as well in the land as in the sea forces, it was found impossible, at least for some time, to diminish proportionably the public expences. When the commons proceeded to consider the supply, they examined the sums that would be absolutely necessary for making good the engagement of the parliament to his majesty, and the services performed in the prosecution of the war, discharging debts, supplying deficiencies, and providing for the current service of the year; and found that the whole supply of this year would amount to near eight millions sterling: an immense sum! which gave occasion to the opposition to treat Mr. Pelham with great severity, as the author of all the debts and incumbrances with which the nation was loaded. He was, however, powerfully supported by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Murray, his majesty's solicitor-general, now lord Mansfield, and chief-justice of the King's Bench, and the supply was granted without a division. This point being settled, the commons turned their attention to matters of another nature.

A bill was prepared for amending, explaining, and reducing into one act, the laws relating to his majesty's navy. One intention of the bill was, to render half-pay officers subject to martial law, in the same manner as if they were upon full pay. The gentlemen of the navy immediately took the alarm. Sir Peter Warren, who was at this time member of parliament for the city and liberty of Westminster, and in great reputation for his integrity as well as courage, presented a petition to the house against the bill on the twenty-fourth of February, 1749, which was signed by no less than three admirals and sixty-four captains, who were not members of the house. Many of these repaired to the admiralty, and threatened to throw up their commissions, should the clause pass into a law. It was therefore thought advisable by the ministry to drop it. There was another clause in this bill which also met with vehement opposition: this was to oblige the members of a court-martial to take an oath not to disclose at any time, or upon any account, the opinions or transactions of such court. Many and plausible were the objections raised to this clause. It was in particular observed, that it was possible for the members of a court-martial, from private or particular considerations, to commit the most flagrant injustice; and that it was impossible for parliaments (by this clause) to apply redress, because it was impossible to discover the facts, which this oath absolutely and eternally sealed up. For these and other reasons, an amendment was proposed, empowering a member of a court-martial to reveal, if required by either house of parliament, the opinion of such court in all cases, in which the courts of justice, as the laws then stood, had a right to interfere. This amendment, however, was rejected; and the question being at last put, was carried in the affirmative by a considerable majority.

But the most obstinate and longest debate this session was induced by the mutiny-bill, and particularly by the last clause of it, which was entirely new, importing, "That as it might be otherwise doubted, whether the officers and persons employed in the trains of artillery, or the reduced officers of his majesty's land forces or marines on the British or Irish establishment on half-pay, were within the intent and meaning of this act, for punishing officers and soldiers who should mutiny or desert his majesty's service, and for punishing false musters, and for payment of quarters; it was hereby enacted, that the officers or persons employed, or that should be employed in the several trains of artillery, or the reduced officers of his majesty's land forces or marines on the British and Irish establishment of half-pay, should be at all times subject to all the penalties and punishments mentioned in this act, and should, in all respects whatsoever, be held to be within the intent and meaning of it during the time of its continuance." Such a clause, it was said, was replete with the most alarming danger to the very constitution of this land, inasmuch as it would increase the number of officers depending upon the crown, and subject to military law, who consequently would always be the ready and compliant instruments of carrying into execution all schemes adopted by the ministry, however repugnant to the laws, or to the liberties and privileges of the people." The clause, however, was strongly supported by Mr. Pitt; and the question being put, was carried in the affirmative by a great majority. A bill was afterwards brought in for limiting the time of service in the army; but upon a division, it was put off for two months, which was equal to being rejected; because it was understood that the parliament before that time would be prorogued, it being then the latter end of April.

The abuse of paper-money all over the British plantations and colonies in America was by this time grown to so great an height, that at the motion of Mr. Walpole, auditor of America, a bill was brought in "to regulate and restrain paper bills of credit in the British colonies and plantations in America, to prevent the same being legal tenders in payment for money:" but this bill was so strongly opposed by several eminent merchants, as well of North America as of London, that it was dropt for this session.

The next object that engaged the attention of the commons was a bill for extending and improving the trade to the coast of Africa; the preamble of which remarks, "That the trade to and from Africa being very advantageous to Great Britain, and necessary for the supplying her plantations and colonies with a sufficient number of negroes at reasonable rates, ought for that reason to be free and open to all his majesty's subjects. It was therefore enacted, that it shall be free and lawful for all the king's subjects to and from any place in Africa, between the port of Sallee in South Barbary, and the Cape of Good Hope, without any restraint whatsoever, except as herein expressed; and that all his majesty's subjects so trading, &c. should be united under certain regulations into an open company, by the name of "the company of merchants trading to Africa," without any joint stock or power to trade as a corporation; and that the forts and settlements should be put under proper management and direction," &c. &c.

Thus this very considerable branch of the British commerce again assumed a new appearance, after having passed through several other different constitutions and various conditions; this bill passed the lower house, but was stopped in the upper till the end of the session. Nevertheless, it was carried in the course of the succeeding, and finally confirmed by the royal sanction. What was by this act established still remains in being, and with general approbation, though there are not wanting some who still think, that so important a trade ought to be under a stricter government, and even in a joint stock corporation, as in former times; of which opinion, time and experience of the traders to that extended coast must determine the validity.

Several other bills were introduced in the course of this session; but as none of them were attended with any remarkable debate, nor brought to maturity till the succeeding year, they will come to be more properly explained among the transactions of that period. On the thirteenth day of June his majesty closed the session with a speech, in which he said, That the terms and conditions of the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle had been carried into execution by the several contracting parties with great punctuality and good faith, so far as the time and distance of the places would admit. He hoped, he said, that at the next meeting they would be able to perfect what they had now begun, for advancing the trade and navigation of his kingdoms; particularly, by rendering our naval force the most serviceable and useful. He then expressed his satisfaction at seeing the public credit in so flourishing a condition, at the end of an expensive, though necessary war. And, lastly, after returning them thanks for their supplies, and recommending unanimity to them, he dismissed them.

As the French were put into the repossession of Cape Breton, it was natural for the British ministry to fix their attention on the cultivation and improvement of their long neglected settlement of Nova Scotia, where, by a proper colonization of protestants in so valuable a tract of territory, more than an equal participation of the profits of the French fishery would fall to the English; a potent barrier would be erected for the security of the British provinces in North America; and a perpetual seminary of sailors would be established.

The earl of Halifax, then first lord of trade and plantations, was the principal promoter of a scheme so highly advantageous to the national interest, in which he was assisted by many considerable persons; and a plan was proposed for establishing a civil government in Nova Scotia, by granting lands within the same, and giving other encouragements to such of the officers and private men lately dismissed from the land and sea-service as should be willing to settle in that part of the world. The king having considered the said proposal with his usual coolness and discernment, was pleased to honour it with his royal approbation; and the lords of trade and plantations, by the command of his majesty, gave notice in the Gazette, and other public papers, on the seventh of March, 1749, that proper encouragement would be given to such of the officers and private men lately dismissed his majesty's land and sea-service, as were willing to accept of grants of land, and to settle with or without families in the province of Nova Scotia. A grant of fifty acres of land in fee-simple was promised to every private soldier or seaman, free from the payment of quit-rents or taxes for the term of ten years; at the expiration whereof, no person was to pay more than one shilling a year for every fifty acres so granted; and an additional grant of ten acres was promised to each private soldier or seaman having a family, for every person, including women and children, of which his family should consist. A grant of eighty acres, upon the like conditions, was offered to every officer under the rank of ensign in the land-service, and that of lieutenant in the sea-service; and to such as had families, fifteen acres more for every person of which their family consisted. A grant of two hundred acres, on the like conditions, was offered to every ensign, three hundred to every lieutenant, four hundred to every captain, and six hundred to every officer above the rank of captain in the land service; as also the like quantity of four hundred acres, and on the same conditions, to every lieutenant in the sea-service, and six hundred acres to every captain; and to such of the above-mentioned officers as had families, a further grant of thirty acres was offered, over and above their respective quotas, for every person of which their families consisted: it was also promised, that the land should be parcelled out to the settlers as soon as possible after their arrival, and a civil government established; and that proper measures should also be taken for their security and protection: that the colonists should be subsisted during their passage; as also for the space of 12 months after their arrival; and that they should be furnished with arms and ammunition, as far as would be judged necessary for their defence, and a proper quantity of materials and utensils for husbandry, clearing and cultivating their lands, erecting habitations, carrying on the fishery, and such other purposes as should be necessary for their support: carpenters, shipwrights, and such other artificers as were necessary for husbandry and building, were to be gratified with the same quantity of land as private soldiers: a civil government was to be established among them as soon as possible, by which they were to enjoy all the privileges, liberties, and immunities of his majesty's other subjects in America; and care was to be taken for their security and protection.

This excellent and patriotic scheme met with the success it so well deserved. By the beginning of May no less than three thousand seven hundred and fifty persons and families had engaged themselves to go as settlers to this new colony, and were embarked on board transports for that purpose. The government of this infant colony was bestowed on the honourable Edward Cornwallis, esq. who accompanied the colonists in their voyage. The whole fleet arrived safely at Nova Scotia; and on the twenty-first of June anchored in the bay of Chebucto, in the very center of the southern part of the province, having Annapolis on the left, and Canso on the right. A town was now planned out at the head of Chebucto harbour, which was soon built, fortified, and divided into lots, and called HALIFAX, in honour of the noble lord who principally assisted in promoting the establishment of this colony, which soon wore an auspicious aspect, promising not only greatly to over-balance the expence of the government, but to exceed all the real and imaginary advantages that might have resulted from the possession of Cape Breton; and it is at this day become a flourishing and important settlement.

Few affairs of any importance occurred on the continent of Europe this year. Don Philip took possession of Parma and Placentia, pursuant to the late treaty. The court of Russia having entertained some suspicions that the Swedes intended to change the form of their government after the death of their king, which her interest obliged her to preserve inviolate, marched a body of her troops towards Finland, in order to be ready to act on the first warning, in case of such an event, which was every day expected. Various declarations were now made on both sides; and his Prussian majesty, alarmed at the conduct of the czarina, wrote a letter to the king of Great Britain, earnestly intreating him to co-operate with him and the king of France in preserving the peace of the North. With this request his Britannic majesty, little reason as he had to be satisfied with the court of Stockholm, most generously complied. It appeared in the sequel, that her czarish majesty's apprehensions were altogether without foundation, and that the senate of Sweden had no intention to alter the form of government.

The French, according to all accounts, were prosecuting with the greatest vigour a plan for restoring and encreasing their marine, which had been so roughly handled in the late war; and, according to a scheme of monsieur de Rouillé, they were in the space of eight years to have one hundred and eleven ships of the line, twenty-two bomb-ketches, and twenty-five fire-ships, ready to put to sea at the first notice. In the mean time, encouraged, as it should appear, by the submission of the British ministry in sending hostages to Paris, they thought they might practise their old intrigues in America; and though by the late treaty, and those upon which it was founded, the islands in the West Indies, commonly called the Neutral Islands, were to remain unsettled and unfortified till the right of sovereignty was determined; yet scarce had the definitive treaty of peace been ratified, when the French ministry sent orders to the marquis de Caylus, their governor of Martinico, to take possession of Tobago, one of the neutral islands, in the French king's name, though Mr. Grenville, governor of Barbadoes, had given the French inhabitants upon that island a regular notice to quit the same in thirty days, under pain of military execution. In contradiction to this, the marquis de Caylus, on the twenty-sixth of November, 1748, published a proclamation, asserting the sovereignty of France to Tobago and the other neutral islands, declaring that he would protect the inhabitants of Tobago, and prohibiting their having any correspondence with the British, Dutch, or Danish colonies. This proclamation was followed by the sending two French ships of war, with one hundred and fifty soldiers, besides settlers, to fortify Tobago, where they arrived and erected some batteries. Upon this, governor Grenville dispatched captain Tyrrel, who commanded a British squadron on the Barbadoes station, with a forty and a twenty gun ship, and a sloop, to observe the motions of these encroachers: but this commander had only the mortification of perceiving the French fortifying the island, and preventing the English from cutting wood there, while he was unable to impede their operations, being unprovided with proper powers. Intelligence of these proceedings of the French being transmitted to our ministry, a courier was dispatched to Versailles to colonel York, the British resident there, to make remonstrances on this subject; and soon after our ambassador at the court of France acquainted our court, that the French king disclaimed all knowledge of such proceedings, and had sent orders to evacuate that island: but this appears to have been a shameful evasion, the marquis de Caylus afterwards declaring, that he had positive directions from the French ministry concerning his conduct at Tobago.

As to the other powers of Europe, very little interesting happened among them that could injure Great Britain. The empress-queen and the czarina made a farther alliance with each other, in order to be the better able to oppose the king of Prussia, who still kept a numerous army on foot, and of whose designs those two sovereigns were become very jealous. In the South, the king of Sardinia, who still continued dissatisfied with the empress-queen, entered into a defensive treaty with France and Spain, the king of the Two Sicilies, the duke of Modena, the republic of Genoa, and the duke of Parma; by which he was secured in the quiet enjoyment of all the estates which he at present possessed, or should afterwards acquire; and by which their Catholic and most Christian majesties engaged to furnish thirty thousand men to such of the contracting powers as should want their assistance. But lest the concluding this treaty should give umbrage to England, his Sardinian majesty declared, by his minister at London, that he was determined punctually to observe all his engagements with the king of Great Britain and the empress-queen.

In the course of this summer an accident happened which gave the court of Great Britain some uneasiness. A corsair of Algiers, one of the piratical states of Barbary, made prize of the Prince Frederic Frederic packet-boat from Lisbon, detained her near a month at Algiers, and confiscated all the money and jewels found on board her, to the amount of upwards of ninety thousand pounds, under the pretence of its being the property of the Jews and Portuguese. Hereupon commodore Keppel was sent with seven ships of war before Algiers, to reclaim the ship and treasure; but he was obliged to return without success. Soon after an Algerine ambassador was sent with some presents to England, and the affair was compromised.

Of the domestic transactions in Great Britain during the course of the year 1749, the following are the most deserving of notice. In the month of January, a special commission was opened at Chichester in Suffex, for the trial of a number of smugglers for the barbarous murder of one Galley, a custom-house officer, and another person, his friend, when seven of the villains were convicted, and received sentence of death; and one dying in gaol, the other six were soon after executed. In February the declaration of a general peace was proclaimed at the usual places in London and Westminster; and in April a most magnificent firework was played off in the Green-Park, in commemoration of that event. It was honoured by the presence of his majesty and the royal family, both houses of parliament, and all the principal persons of London and Westminster; but it miscarried in the execution by the sudden blowing up of a part of the structure; and so the great pains, time, and expence bestowed upon it, were rendered fruitless.

Murders and robberies still continuing to be very frequent in and about the cities of London and Westminster, a proclamation was published, offering a reward of one hundred pounds, over and above all other rewards, to be paid by the lords of the Treasury, upon the conviction of any murderer or robber in those cities, or within five miles thereof. Violent riots and tumults also prevailed throughout the kingdom at this period, evidently owing to the numbers of unprovided persons discharged from the army and navy. The most dangerous of these happened at Bristol, where great numbers of people from Gloucestershire and Somersetshire assembled, cut down the turnpikes, and committed various other outrages. Many of them were well armed, and bid defiance for some time to the magisterial power. At length, six troops of dragoons being sent down against them, soon obliged them to disperse, and restored quiet to the country.

The attention of the public was likewise engaged much about the same time, by another disturbance of a very singular nature. Some young Oxonians, of an irregular and dissolute turn, had for some time taken it into their heads, in all companies, and on all occasions, to be guilty of many idle and insolent reflections upon the present government, and even publicly to toast the young pretender's health. The vice-chancellor of the university, and the heads of houses, had done their utmost to check the licentiousness of these sparks, but in vain; therefore, in order to disculpate themselves, they published a declaration, expressing their utmost abhorrence of such factious and seditious practices, and likewise their firm resolution to punish, according to the utmost severity and rigour of the statutes, all persons, of what state or quality soever, who should be convicted of such offences. Nevertheless, as no punishment was inflicted on the delinquents by the university, the government ordered three of the most audacious of them to be taken into custody; two of whom, Dawes and Whitmore, were tried in the court of King's Bench; and being found guilty, on the clearest evidence, were sentenced to walk through the courts of Westminster, with a paper affixed on their foreheads denoting their crimes, to pay a fine of five nobles each, to be imprisoned for two years, and to find security for their good behaviour during seven years more. Some severe censures were passed upon the university itself on this occasion; the principals of which were strongly suspected of being tinctured with Jacobitism.

The university of Cambridge, on the other hand, had recommended herself greatly to the government, by the many signal instances it had given of her attachment to revolution principles and the protestant succession. The duke of Somerset, who had been many years chancellor of that university, being lately deceased, the heads made choice of the duke of Newcastle to succeed him, whose acceptance thereof is said to have given great umbrage to the prince of Wales, who himself had some desire to be made chancellor. The duke, however, at his majesty's command, was installed, and this was made a handle of to create a breach in the royal family.

On the twenty-second of June prince George (his present majesty) the margrave of Anspach, the dukes of Bedford and Leeds, and the earls of Granville and Albemarle, were elected knights of the garter; and on the twenty-sixth, sir Peter Warren, sir Edward Hawke, sir Charles Howard, sir Charles Amand Poulet, sir John Mordaunt, and sir John Sackville, were installed knights of the Bath, in Henry VII's chapel in Westminster-abbey.

This year was distinguished by the death of several very eminent personages, viz. Charles Seymour, the great and magnificent duke of Somerset; that humane and generous nobleman, John duke of Montagu; field-marshal Richard Temple, viscount Cobham; John Lindsay, the brave earl of Crawford; admiral sir John Norris; and sir Watkyn-Williams Wynn, so famous for his opposition to the Walpolean administration.

On the sixteenth day of November the parliament met, when his majesty opened the session with a speech, in which he said, That it was with particular pleasure that he now met them, at a time when the re-establishment of a general peace had restored to his people the blessings of quiet and tranquillity: that the good effects resulting from hence were already apparent in the flourishing condition of commerce, and the rise of public credit, which naturally laid the surest foundation for an increase of strength, and of lasting prosperity to his kingdoms: that he had not failed, during the course of this summer, to avail himself of every opportunity to cement and preserve the peace; and it was his firm resolution to do every thing in his power to preserve it inviolable, and religiously to adhere to the engagements he had contracted. Very dutiful addresses were presented in answer to this speech by both houses; and these addresses received as cordial a return.

The

The resolutions of the committee of supply were in the main the same as passed last session, though the total of the sum granted was not so great. They voted one hundred and eighty-three thousand two hundred and thirty-two pounds for making good the engagements into which his majesty had entered; one million forty-five thousand five hundred and ninety pounds towards discharging the national debt; four hundred and sixty-three thousand fifty-two pounds for supplying deficiencies; two hundred forty-nine thousand nine hundred and thirty pounds for defraying extraordinary expences; one hundred twenty-two thousand two hundred and forty-six pounds for reimbursing the inhabitants of North America the money they had expended in making preparations for an expedition against Canada, and for supporting the colony of Nova Scotia; thirty-six thousand four hundred and seventy-six pounds towards maintaining those colonists for the space of a twelvemonth; and two millions one hundred ninety-nine thousand eight hundred fifty-five pounds for the ensuing year. The whole supply amounted to upwards of four millions. The land-forces were fixed at eighteen thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven men, and the number of marines at fifteen thousand.

As the proceedings of this session were many of them of a nature that does not admit being particularized here, and others of them of the same nature with those that the reader has already seen, I shall avoid a minute detail of all that passed, confining myself only to the most important.

In the rank of which we may place the act for the reduction of the interest upon the national debt, from four per cent. to three and a half, and afterwards to three per cent. by which an addition of near six hundred thousand pounds per annum was begun to be gradually made to the sinking fund. The public debts, which bore four per cent. stood as follows:

1. The principal sum payable	l.	s.	d.
at the Exchequer, of -	312000	0	0
2. Capital Bank-stock -	8486800	0	0
3. Certain annuities transferable at the Bank -	18402472	0	10
4. Capital stock of the East India company -	3200000	0	0
5. Capital South Sea stock, and old and new South Sea annuity-stock -	27302203	5	6½
Total	57703475	6	4½

Mr. Pelham, who took upon himself the whole stress of the debate on this important subject, so clearly demonstrated the expediency and utility of this scheme, and that nothing can so effectually contribute to make trade flourish, as the lessening the public debts and incumbrances with justice and public faith, that the house came to the following resolutions, which they caused to be printed by way of advertisement, in the London Gazette of November 29, 1749, for public information, and imported, "That all the proprietors of the said public debts incurred before Michaelmas 1749, who shall, on or before the twenty-eighth of February, 1750, subscribe their names, or signify their consent to accept of an interest of three per cent. per annum, to commence from the 25th of December, 1757, shall be entitled to four per cent. till the 25th of December, 1750, and from thence to 3 l. 10 s. per cent. until the 25th of December, 1757; and no part of the same (except what is due to the East India company) shall be liable to be redeemed, until the said 25th of December, 1757."

This is what was called the first subscription, because all the proprietors of the above-named debts did not come into this proposed subscription within the time limited by this act, although the major part of them did; and although the second subscription to that reduction was enacted till the spring of the year 1750; yet, for connection's sake, I shall here give the substance of an act of this same session, "for giving further time to such of the proprietors of the before-named annuities to subscribe the same upon the terms therein mentioned, and for redeeming (i. e. paying off the principal sums) of such of the said annuities as shall not be subscribed; and for empowering the East India company to raise certain sums by transferable annuities." It recites, "That great part of those before-named annuities had been subscribed on the terms of the first named statute: it was therefore hereby enacted, that such proprietors as have not so subscribed, and who shall, on or before the thirtieth day of May, 1750, accept of an interest of three per cent. to commence from the twenty-fifth of December, 1755 (in the meantime to have the same terms in other respects as the former subscribers have) shall not be redeemable till the said twenty-fifth of December, 1755, may subscribe on or before the said thirtieth of May, 1750; and such as shall not subscribe on or before that day shall be redeemed and paid off." Thus the said second subscribers had a reduction of their interest from three and a half per cent. to three per cent. two years sooner than those of the first subscription; and such as remained determined not to subscribe at all, who however were not very many, were paid off their principal sums out of the sinking fund. Lastly, the East India company were empowered, by consent of the commissioners of the Treasury (if they subscribed their three millions two hundred thousand pounds stock, and their one million annuities, by the thirtieth of May, 1750) to borrow any sums not exceeding four millions two hundred thousand pounds, by sale of annuities, viz. three millions two hundred thousand pounds, after the several rates of interest in the terms of this second subscription, and one million more at the rate of three per cent. per annum; with which that company accordingly complied.

In the course of this session the mutiny act received some considerable alterations. The members of a court-martial were freed from the oath of secrecy, upon their being required by a court of justice to give evidence as witnesses in the due course of law, and the sentence of a court-martial was declared to be revisable no more than once.

A spirit of resentment had for some time been growing up among the people of England against the Dutch, who had first disgusted them by their lukewarmness and double-dealing in the common cause, during the whole of the late war; and the great cry was, to wrest out of the hands of the Dutch the fishery for herring on the British coast, which that people had for many years usurped, and by which they had acquired immense riches. As our ministry were desirous of indulging the public in whatever should be thought for its advantage, a committee had been appointed last session to consider the state of the British fishery, when, after some time taken up in making the proper enquiries, general Oglethorpe, chairman of the committee, reported, as their resolution, "That the carrying on the British herring and cod-fisheries will be of eminent advantage to the trade and navigation of these kingdoms, and is highly worthy the consideration of parliament, and deserves proper encouragement." A bill was ordered to be brought in on these resolutions; but on account of the lateness of the season, it was put off for that time.

Soon after the opening of this session, the affair was again revived; and the spirit of the nation, as well as the attention of the legislature, still farther stimulated by a petition to parliament from the inhabitants of Southwold and Leostoff, who declared that the Dutch had for about eight years fished so near the shore, that their nets swept the ground, and by that means prevented the inhabitants from fishing, as an hundred Dutch fishing vessels had frequently been anchoring at once in their harbour in two or three fathom water; and that when the inhabitants complained of this unwarrantable encroachment, the Dutch had threatened to sink their boats, or tear their nets in pieces.

The commons having referred this matter to a committee, they came to the following resolutions, which were reported by general Oglethorpe on the fifteenth of February, 1750, and agreed to by the house, viz. "That the carrying on the British white herring and cod-fisheries would be of great advantage to the trade and navigation of these kingdoms; and that every impediment to such trade ought to be removed with all convenient dispatch: that, as a further encouragement to all persons to engage in these fisheries, a bounty of thirty shillings per ton should be granted and paid out of the customs to all new vessels from twenty to twenty-eight tons burthen, which should be built for that purpose, and actually employed in the fisheries: that in order to induce adventurers to employ their money in these fisheries, a society should be incorporated, under the name of the Free British Fishery, by a charter, though not exclusive, with power to raise a capital not exceeding five hundred thousand pounds; and that three and a half per cent. should be granted and paid out of the customs to the proprietors for fourteen years, for so much of the capital as should be actually employed in such fisheries."

Upon these resolutions a bill was presented by general Oglethorpe, by order of the house, for the encouragement of the White Herring fishery, which passed through both houses, and afterwards received the royal assent. The bill was no sooner passed than there was a general meeting of the persons named in the act, when the prince of Wales was chosen governor; Slingsby Bethell, esq. president; and Stephen-Theodore Janssen, esq. vice-president, both of them aldermen of London. A council, consisting of thirty persons, was also appointed for managing the affairs of the company, to whom his majesty's charter of incorporation was granted, bearing date the eleventh of October, 1750.

The success of this public-spirited undertaking has not hitherto indeed fully answered the expectations of the worthy promoters of it, whose generous zeal deserves the highest commendations: but it is to be considered, that it is extremely difficult to beat another nation out of a trade they have so long possessed, even with the above great encouragement from the public; and more especially so frugal a people as the Dutch, who can content themselves with smaller gains than other nations, and carry on the fishery every one on his own private bottom.

Amongst other public-spirited acts of this session, one passed for the encouragement of the manufacture of British sail-cloth, which, by the Irish underselling us, was fallen into great decay. In order to retrieve it, this act imposed a duty of four-pence per yard upon all Irish sail-cloth brought into Great Britain. Another act also passed to encourage the importation of pig and bar iron from his majesty's colonies in North America; and to prevent the erection of any mill or other engine for slitting or rolling of iron, or any plating forge to work with a tilt hammer, or any furnace for making of steel, in any of the said colonies. The title of this statute, which is sufficient for our purpose, plainly shews how jealous our legislature was of our greatly increasing northern colony people going far into manufactures interfering with those of their mother-country. Nevertheless, as our continent colonies are increasing fast in people, perhaps it would not be altogether impolitic to allow some latitude in that respect, as the proportionable increase of our people there will undoubtedly occasion a like or greater increase of our general commerce.

The last acts of this session, of which I shall take notice here, are two relating to the silk-trade; for promoting the manufacture of which in Great Britain, an act passed, whereby the duties payable on raw silk imported from China by the East India company were now reduced to the same duty as is payable on raw silk from Italy: and upon a petition from the dealers and manufacturers of raw and thrown silks, representing the vast benefit that would accrue to the kingdom by the growth of that commodity (which of late was become excessively dear) in the British southern colonies of America, an act passed to repeal the duties upon American silk imported into England. Since this act the culture of silk has visibly, though gradually, increased there, and more particularly in Carolina and Georgia; and it seems not improbable that, in a reasonable space of time, those two provinces, provided they will steadily pursue the said culture, may hereafter have the new honour of being denominated the Silk Colonies.

On the twelfth of April his majesty repaired to the house of peers; and after thanking the members of the house of commons for the supplies they had granted, and the attention they had shewn to the good of the public in reducing the national interest, he ordered the parliament to be prorogued. Soon after this his majesty set out for his German dominions, having first appointed a council to govern the kingdom in his absence.

During these transactions, the people of England were thrown into the utmost consternation by two shocks of an earthquake; the first on the eighth of February, between twelve and one at noon, was felt all over the cities of London and Westminster, and and parts adjacent; some chimnies were thrown down, and in many places the waters were agitated in a very extraordinary manner.

On the eighth of March, at half an hour after five o'clock in the morning, the town was alarmed a second time, by a more severe shock than the former, attended with a hollow, rustling noise, as of wind, and numbers of people were awakened out of their sleep by its violence: however, providentially no mischief happened, except the throwing down several chimnies, and the damaging some houses. In some places the shock was so violent, that the people ran from their beds and houses almost naked, in the greatest consternation at this very unusual visitation. Preceding the shock there was observed a continual, tho' confused lightning, till within a minute or two of its being felt, which darted very low, and the flashes were very strong. It was felt in Essex, Surrey, and Kent, as well as in most parts of Middlesex; and in all the four counties the panic was universal, and was still further encreased by the ridiculous prediction of a wild enthusiast, who pretended to foretel a third shock to happen in a short time, which would lay all London and Westminster in ruins: the fanatic happened luckily to be mistaken; but the two shocks which had already been felt, had brought a serious air upon every face. The pulpits and the press were employed in calling a degenerate people to repentance, and in deprecating the wrath of heaven; and vice was for a little time out of countenance. But soon this was all forgot; the wicked returned to their vices, and the weak forgot their real as well as their imaginary terrors. On the eighteenth of March, between five and six in the evening, a shock was also felt at Gosport, Portsmouth, and the Isle of Wight, which greatly surprised and terrified the inhabitants. Several other places in Europe were visited with this dreadful calamity, as France, Germany, &c. The island of Cerigo, in the Archipelago, was almost destroyed, and above two thousand of the inhabitants perished.

On the twentieth of April, died sir Samuel Pennant, lord-mayor of London, whose death I mention because it was occasioned by an infectious distemper, supposed to be the goal fever, which prevailed in Newgate, and was from thence carried to the Sessions-house in the Old-bailey, where it proved fatal to the gentleman above-mentioned; to sir Daniel Lambert, knight and alderman; to Mr. Clark, a baron of the Exchequer; to sir Thomas Abney, a judge of the Common-pleas; to many of the lawyers who attended the sessions; to the greatest part of the jury, and to a vast number of the spectators.

In the month of July the prince and princess of Wales, with the lady Augusta (now hereditary princess of Brunswic) their eldest daughter, made a tour to the west of England, and were received every where with the greatest honour and respect; and soon after their royal highnesses visited Southampton and the isle of Wight, where their reception was equally respectful and affectionate. A little after Midsummer this year, arrived the first parcel of herrings caught by the buffes of the newly incorporated society of the free British fishery off Shetland.

Little happened in the other nations of Europe, of importance to the interests of Great-Britain. The king of Portugal dying in the summer of this year, was succeeded by his eldest son Joseph, who renewed all the amicable connexions of his predecessor with our court. About the same time, a new treaty of subsidy between the king of Great-Britain, the empress-queen, the States-general, and the elector of Bavaria, was signed at Herenhausen near Hanover, where his majesty then was, on a visit to his German dominions: his majesty afterwards concluded a new treaty with the emperor of Morocco, and an agreement was made for the redemption of sixty British captives.

The many difficulties started by the court of Spain, against the carrying on the South Sea company's Asiento trade; the oppressions of the Spanish officers and governors in the West Indies; the frauds too obviously committed, on the other hand, by the company's agents in those parts, in spite of the regulations and restrictions enjoined them by their principals; and the complaint of the British merchants trading to Cadiz, seemed now all to concur, at both courts, for putting a final period to a trade which, without any substantial benefit to Great-Britain, had given insuperable umbrage to the court of Madrid: so that both crowns were easily brought to conclude a treaty at Madrid, on the fifth of October, N. S. 1750, to the following purport: "That the ambassadors of both kings, at the treaty of Aix-la-chapelle, anno 1748, having then agreed to regulate, at a proper time and place, the equivalent which Spain should give, in consideration of the non enjoyment of the remaining years of the Asiento of negroes, and of the annual ship granted to Great-Britain; their said Britannic and Catholic majesties now agree, that the king of Spain should pay to the South Sea company, within the space of three months, the sum of one hundred thousand pounds sterling, by way of indemnification, as well for non-execution of the Asiento contract as to make amends for the four years in which they did not send out their annual ships: that with regard to the trade and navigation of the English in the ports of the king of Spain's dominions, all the treaties concluded between the two nations for the last eighty three years should be punctually observed and fulfilled: that of consequence, the British ships that traded in the ports of his most Catholic majesty should pay no other duties for the goods than what they paid in the reign of Charles II. of Spain: that the subjects of Great-Britain should, in the places where they come to traffick, pay only the same duties as the subjects of his Catholic majesty, who promised that the English should be treated, in his dominions, on the same footing as the most favoured nations: and finally, that they should continue to enjoy the privilege of taking in salt at the island of Tortula, which was possessed by the Spaniards."

This is truly a "definitive treaty" in the strictest sense of the term, as it relates solely to differences between the court of Spain and Great-Britain, without any relation to, or connection with, any other nation. Hereby a period was absolutely put to all foreign commerce whatever, of the South Sea company. To conclude this subject, I shall here observe, that this company, having proposed to the government to accept of an interest of four per cent. on their capital stock of three millions millions six hundred and sixty-two thousand seven hundred and eighty-four pounds, until Christmas, 1757; and then to stand reduced to three per cent. per annum; provided that the manner of the receipt from the Exchequer, and the charges of management upon the present old and new South Sea annuities, and on their said capital stock, be continued as they now are. An act of parliament, in consequence thereof, passed the following year, for reducing the same accordingly, on these terms.

The favourite measure which his Britannic majesty had in view while he was abroad, was the election of the archduke Joseph, eldest son of the emperor and the empress queen, to be king of the Romans. But tho' his majesty had the election greatly at heart, yet it met with much opposition; the king of Prussia, and the French party in the empire, having a majority in the diet, thro' which they insisted the proposal must pass before it came to the electors. The king of Spain having some interest in the German body, was applied to for his good offices in behalf of the archduke, by the British minister at Madrid; but his Catholic majesty seemed not in the least inclined to concern himself therein, so that the affair at present was entirely laid aside.

His majesty returned to England from his German dominions on the fourth of November; but it was the seventeenth of January, 1751, before the parliament was opened, when his majesty, in a most gracious speech, acquainted both houses of his having concluded a treaty with the king of Spain, whereby such particular differences as could not be settled by a general treaty, had been amicably adjusted. He also took notice of his having, in conjunction with the empress-queen and the States-general, concluded a treaty with the elector of Bavaria; both which treaties, he said, should be laid before them. He represented all the contracting powers in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle as determined to preserve the general peace; and then concluded with an exhortation to unanimity, the improving the trade and commerce of the nation, and the putting in force the laws against the disturbers of the domestic peace of the kingdom.

Both houses returned addresses upon this speech, full of the most loyal professions, which met with the most gracious reception and the warmest return from the throne.

The attention of the commons was entirely engrossed at the beginning of this session, in considering a case of a very delicate and interesting nature. Lord Trentham, eldest son to earl Gower, and one of the representatives for Westminster, having in the course of the former session accepted of the place of a lord of the admiralty, his seat in parliament became of consequence vacated; and having again declared himself a candidate, he met with a powerful opponent in the person of sir George Vandeput, a private gentleman, who was powerfully supported by the anti-ministerial party, and by all those who assumed the name of independent electors.

During the recess of parliament, matters had been carried on with great acrimony between the two parties. Upon the closing of the poll, lord Trentham appeared to have the majority of votes; upon which the other candidate demanded a scrutiny, which was immediately granted; and this likewise turned out in favour of his lordship, who was thereupon returned by the high bailiff of Westminster as duly elected, and took his seat accordingly in the house at the opening of the session. Enraged at their defeat, the other party immediately presented two petitions to the house against this return; one from sir George's friends, the other from himself, both complaining of the injustice and partiality shewn by the high-bailiff in the course of the scrutiny. In opposition to these, lord Trentham made complaint of unconstitutional practices in his opponents, and in particular of their having insulted and intimidated the high-bailiff in the execution of his office.

The matter was now brought before the house, where the high-bailiff made his appearance, and accused counsellor Crowle, the honourable Alexander Murray, brother to the lord Elibank, and one Gibson, an upholder, of having been most forward in obstructing him in the discharge of his duty. These three persons were summoned to the bar, when Mr. Crowle was ordered to receive a reprimand from the speaker on his knees, and Gibson was committed prisoner to Newgate. The charge against Mr. Murray was more heavy than against the other two, the high bailiff accusing him of having behaved in the most riotous and scandalous manner, as well during the time of the scrutiny as when it was over, and with threatening him, the high-bailiff, and committing other acts of violence after the return was made; in particular, the having put himself at the head of a mob who seemed to be for sir George Vandeput, and exciting and inflaming the said mob to insult and murder the high-bailiff, by repeatedly crying out, "Will no body knock the dog on the head? Will no body kill the dog?" or words to that effect. Full proof of this charge being made to the house, they resolved that Mr. Murray should be committed close prisoner to Newgate, and that he should be brought to the bar of the house to receive sentence on his knees. To the bar he was accordingly brought; but when he came there he peremptorily refused to kneel; a circumstance that greatly aggravated his former crime, by thus daring to set the whole house of commons at defiance. It was therefore resolved, that the honourable Alexander Murray, esq. having in a most insolent and audacious manner, at the bar of the house, refused to be upon his knees, in compliance with their former resolution, had been guilty of a high and most dangerous contempt of the authority and privilege of the house: that for this offence he should be committed close prisoner to Newgate; and that while he was there, he should not be allowed the use of pen, ink, or paper, nor be indulged in the privilege of having any person admitted to him, without the leave of the house.

These resolutions were immediately put in execution, and that night (or rather morning, for this affair kept the house sitting till one o'clock) Mr. Murray was conveyed to Newgate, where he continued till the end of the session, and the legality of lord Trentham's election was now fully confirmed.

On the fifth of February a proclamation was issued, promising a reward of one thousand pounds for apprehending the author, for each of the printers five hundred pounds, and for each of the publishers fifty pounds, of a treasonable piece, entitled,

Con-

Constitutional Queries: which piece was also burnt by the common hangman.

The two grand committees appointed to discuss the supplies for the year, and the funds upon which they are to be raised, proceeded as usual, under the direction of the ministry. Very warm debates however ensued, in consequence of a motion for reducing the number of seamen to 8000, which was opposed by Mr. W. Pitt, Mr. Lyttleton, and Mr. G. Grenville, with surprising force of argument and elocution; but numbers decided for the question. The same fate attended the like opposition to the number of troops constituting the standing army: but the other resolutions of the grand committee met with little or no opposition. On the whole, the provisions for the service of this year amounted very little short of five millions. The annual measure, called the Mutiny-bill, was not passed without dispute and altercation. Some alterations were proposed, but rejected, and the sentences of court-martials still subjected to one revision.

In the midst of these deliberations, this kingdom sustained a terrible blow in the death of Frederic-Lewis, prince of Wales, who expired on the twentieth day of March, about ten in the evening, at Leicester-house, to the unspeakable grief of the whole nation. This excellent and amiable prince was born January 20, 1707, and on the twenty-seventh of April 1736, married the princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha, who, by her close and constant attendance on her princely consort, to the last moment of his fatal illness, kept up the great pattern she had all along exhibited of conjugal affection. By this lady, who was at this time advanced in her pregnancy, his royal highness left issue five sons and three daughters, viz. princess Augusta (now married to the hereditary prince of Brünswic) born July 31, 1737; prince George, now our most gracious sovereign king George III. born May 24, 1738; prince Edward-Augustus (now duke of York) born March 14, 1739; princess Elizabeth-Caroline (since deceased) born December 30, 1740; prince William-Henry (now duke of Gloucester) born November 14, 1743; prince Henry-Frederic (now duke of Cumberland) born October 27, 1745; princess Louisa-Anne, born March 8, 1749; prince Frederic-William, born May 13, 1750 (deceased December 31, 1765); besides the princess Caroline-Matilda lately espoused to the king of Denmark, who was born after her father's death, viz. July 11, 1751.

His royal highness may justly be said to have been the joy and hope of Britain, the merchants friend, the protector of arts and sciences, the patron of merit, the reliever of distress, the accomplished prince, and the fine gentleman: in all the parts of private life an affectionate husband, an indulgent, tender parent, a kind master, and an affable, good-natured man. He seemed in all respects formed to rule over a free people; he had made the knowledge of the English constitution his study and delight, and was a great master of geography and the theory of commerce; understood its natural operations and effects, and how to apply them for the benefit of the nation, better than was generally imagined.

The public was informed that his royal highness's illness was first occasioned by catching cold in Kew-gardens, which was increased by coming from the house of peers, when extremely warm, with the windows of his chair down, and turned to a pleurisy. No danger, however, was apprehended; and upon the application of proper remedies, he was even thought to be in a fair way of recovery, till the very hour of his death, when he was seized with a pain in his breast; upon which he expressed he had never felt any thing like it before, and complained that he smelled an unusual smell, like that of a dead corpse; and presently throwing himself back in his chair, expired. His body was opened the next day, and there was found a large abscess upon his lungs, the bursting of which was supposed to have been the immediate cause of his death. The remains of his royal highness were deposited with great pomp and ceremony in a vault in Henry VII's chapel, the duke of Somerset being chief mourner.

His royal highness was the eighteenth prince of Wales of the English blood-royal, and the only one, except Edward the Black Prince, who died (at about the same age as his royal highness) in his father's lifetime, and left a son to succeed him. It was therefore presumed that prince George, eldest son of his late highness, succeeded to all his father's titles and dignities without any new creation, Edward III. having only declared his grandson Richard prince of Wales, in the similar case above-mentioned, not created him by a new patent. The eldest son of a king of England, if born while his father is on the throne, is by birth duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester and Flint, but prince of Wales by creation. However, that creation being once made, and the possessor dying and leaving male-issue before he succeeds to the throne, it should seem probable that the common course of succession to these honours should here take place. In these conjectures, however, the public found itself mistaken; for on the twentieth of April letters-patent passed the great-seal of Great Britain, creating George-William prince of Great Britain, prince of Wales, and earl of Chester.

On the twenty-sixth of the same month his majesty sent a message to both houses, signifying his royal inclination, that in case the imperial crown of these realms should descend to any of the issue of his son the late prince of Wales, being under the age of eighteen years, the princess-dowager of Wales, their mother, should be guardian to the person of such successor, and regent of these kingdoms, until they should attain that age, with such power and limitation as should appear necessary and expedient for these purposes. This message was answered by affectionate addresses from both houses, promising their compliance with his majesty's inclination; and a bill was accordingly prepared by the lords, declaring the princess of Wales regent of the realm, on the event of the king's death, during the minority of her eldest son; and she was to be assisted in the administration of the government by a council of regency. This was composed of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, who was then at the head of the army, the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, the lord high-treasurer of Great Britain, or first commissioner of the Treasury, the president of the council, the lord privy-seal, the lord high-admiral of Great Britain, or first commissioner of the admiralty, the two secretaries of state, and the lord chief-justice of the King's Bench, all of them for the time being, except his royal highness the duke. This bill quickly quickly passed through the upper house; but it did not make its way through the commons without a violent debate; the council of regency in particular met with fierce opposition. The majority, however, passed the bill, which in a little time received the royal sanction.

On Wednesday the twenty-second of May the royal assent was given to the ever-famous act of the British legislature, "for regulating the commencement of the year, and for correcting the calendar now in use;" that is, for abolishing the old, and establishing the NEW STYLE, already in use in most other parts of Christendom. This act was modelled with great skill and learning by the earl of Macclesfield, and has been productive of many excellent consequences; in particular, the correspondence between the English merchants and those of foreign countries will be greatly facilitated, with respect to the dates of letters and accounts. The following concise, but clear account of the grounds on which this new regulation proceeds, cannot be unacceptable to our readers:

By the Julian account (so called as being framed by Julius Cæsar) the year is supposed to consist of three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours. The odd hours added together amounting every fourth year to a day, three years successively consist each of three hundred and sixty-five days, and the fourth year of three hundred and sixty-six, which is called Leap Year.

But the true solar year consisting of only three hundred and sixty-five days five hours forty-nine minutes and sixteen seconds, there is an over-reckoning of ten minutes and forty-four seconds every year, which of consequence has made a variation of one day in every one hundred and thirty-four years that have passed since the first settling this account: by which means the vernal equinox, or sun's entrance into Aries, is now on the tenth of March, which in Julius Cæsar's time was on the twenty-fourth.

Pope Gregory III. finding the Julian account to be erroneous, resolved upon a reformation of it, which he finished in the year 1582, and which from him is called the Gregorian account, or New Style.

The pope in his reformation looked no farther back than the council of Nice, which was held in the year 325; and finding the vernal equinox was then on the twenty-first of March, he ordered ten days in the year 1582 to be omitted, which was done by calling the fifth of October (his birth-day) the fifteenth; so that the vernal equinox, which otherwise would have been on the eleventh, fell on the twenty-first of March.

And to prevent errors of the like nature for the future, he ordered the subtracting three days from every revolution of four hundred years, which was to be done by omitting the twenty-ninth day of February at the end of the three centuries, and at the end of the fourth century to retain it.

This is the reason that, before the twenty-ninth of February 1700, the difference between the old and new stile was only ten, whereas since that time it has been eleven days.

I shall now give a short abstract of this memorable act, as being of sufficient importance to claim a place in every history of this country.

In the first place, it is enacted, that the old computation of the year, by which it begins on March 25, is not to be made use of, throughout all the British dominions, after December 31, 1751, but the first of January next following is to be reckoned the first day of the year 1752, and every year for the future to begin on the first of January instead of the twenty-fifth of March. In the second place, the several days of each month, after the first of January 1752, are to go on in the same order as usual, till the second of September in the said year, inclusive; but the natural day next immediately following the said second of September 1752, instead of the third, is to be called the fourteenth of September, omitting only for that time the eleven intermediate nominal days of the present calendar. And the several natural days that shall follow the said fourteenth of September are to be reckoned forward in numerical order as usual, and so on continually.

All acts, deeds, notes, &c. after the first of January 1752, to be dated according to the new supputation. And the fixed terms, Hilary and Michaelmas, and all courts, &c. that are to be held on any certain day of a month, to be kept on the same nominal day, after the second of September, 1752, when the eleven days are dropt that they were kept on, according to the old method, i. e. eleven days sooner than the same are now kept.

For keeping the days of the year in the same regular course as near as may be (to the true motion of the sun) the years of our Lord 1800, 1900, 2100, 2200, 2300, or any hundredth years in time to come (which, according to the present method, would be Leap year, as every fourth year is) except only every fourth hundredth, whereof the year 2000 to be the first, are not to be deemed Leap years, but common years, of three hundred and sixty-five days. And the years 2000, 2400, 2800, and every other fourth hundredth year, to be Leap years, of three hundred and sixty-six days.

New rules are fixed, and a calendar annexed, for keeping Easter according to the full moons by which it is regulated, and the other moveable feasts depending on Easter; and the fixed feasts and fasts to be kept on the same nominal days as now. All the moveable feasts, the moveable terms of Easter and Trinity, and moveable fairs, marts, &c. to be governed by Easter and the other moveable feasts, as usual, but according to the new calendar, and to be held on their respective days accordingly.

Fixed fairs or marts, after the said second of September, not to be held on the same nominal day, but the said natural day as before, that is, eleven days later than the nominal day by the new computation.

Opening and inclosing of commons of pasture not to be accelerated by the act, but to commence on the same natural day they would have happened if the act had not been made, viz. eleven days later than it would have happened by the new computation, to begin on the new 14th of September above-mentioned.

The payment of rents, annuities, or money payable by virtue of any contract already made, or which shall be made before the said fourteenth of September 1752, or otherwise; the time of the delivery of goods or merchandize, &c. the commencement or expiration of leases; the attaining the age of twenty-one years, &c. by any person now born, or who shall be born before the said fourteenth fourteenth of September; or the expiration of any apprenticeship or other service; none of these, &c. to be accelerated or anticipated by the act, but to be on the same natural days as they should have been if this act had not been made; and the sum to be paid for the interest of money shall be according to the true number of natural days, and shall not at all be affected by this act.

The mention of the other acts of parliament passed this session does not fall within the design of this history. I shall therefore only observe, that the public business being completed, his majesty repaired to the house of peers on the twenty-fifth of June; and after giving the royal assent to several bills that were prepared for that purpose, he concluded the session by a most gracious speech to both houses, in which he returned them thanks for the proofs they had given of their zeal and affection for him and his government, and their care and attention for the interests of his people: then addressing himself to the commons, he told them, that the prudence and firmness they had shewn in completing the reduction of the national debt, was as agreeable to him as that measure was essential to the strength and welfare of the kingdom; and concluded with recommending to both houses to encourage and promote a just reverence for government and law, and not to suffer those good laws which were enacted there to lose their effect for want of due execution.

Never indeed was admonition of this kind more necessary from the throne than at this period; for a greater spirit of profligacy and dissoluteness now prevailed than had been known for many years past. Numbers of persons were executed for the most shocking and atrocious crimes. In the course of this year only, one Miss Blandy was executed for poisoning her father, an eminent attorney at Henley upon Thames in Oxfordshire; and Miss Jefferies, another young gentlewoman, was executed, with Swan her lover, for murdering her uncle, a wealthy tradesman who had retired from business, and with whom she had lived for a considerable time. A large mob assembled at Tring in Hertfordshire, and seizing an old woman and her husband (each of them upwards of seventy years of age) under the notion of their having bewitched some of the neighbours, they treated them with such inhumanity, by ducking and beating them, that the woman died on the spot, and the man in a very few days after. For this murder one Colley was hanged. Two fellows, Welsh and Jones, were discovered this year also to have been the authors of a rape and murder, for which one Coleman, a brewer's clerk, had unjustly suffered upon their false evidence. Those wretches were so hardened as to be present at Coleman's execution, heard his declaration of his innocence, and afterwards assisted in drawing the cart from under him. Both of them were hanged, confessing the crime.

The loss of the prince of Wales was succeeded by two other heavy strokes to the royal family of Great-Britain this year; for on the eleventh of October, the prince of Orange, his majesty's son-in-law, paid the debt of nature, in the forty-first year of his age; as did likewise Louisa, queen of Denmark, the King's youngest daughter, who expired on the nineteenth of December, in the twenty-seventh year of her age. The prince's of Orange was invested with the government of the United Provinces, as governante, till her son should arrive at the years of majority, and exercised the same power as her husband had enjoyed.

Affairs on the continent continued much in the former situation: a strong jealousy however still prevailed between the king of Prussia and the czarina, who ordered her minister at the court of Berlin, to make an abrupt departure; and his example was followed by the Prussian ambassador at Petersburg.

The French king still continued bent upon the prosecution of the schemes which he had formed in America; and though his subjects did not openly attack or molest any of our settlements, yet it was not long before they shewed the little regard they had to the articles of the late peace. They had been exceeding busy ever since its conclusion, in seducing the Indians, our allies, into their interest; and the clandestine success their perfidious dealings met with, was soon apparent, for in August, this year, advice came, that the French were gone from Canada, with an army of six hundred men, viz. four hundred French and two hundred Indians, to be augmented to one thousand on their march, and were proceeding to the south-western parts of North-America, in order to strengthen their own interest and ruin ours in those parts; particularly, to destroy the nation of the Twightwees, who are friends to the English, and to kill a certain Virginian trader, who, by honest dealings with the Indians, had lately gained the affections of many, and drawn their trade that way: but having intelligence of their design, he sent a belt of wampum to all the Six Nations, to excite them to oppose their attempts; while the French, on the other hand, were no less assiduous to draw over those nations, and engage them in their interest. Great sums of money, and large quantities of spirituous liquors were sent to them as bribes. We also learnt, that the French were building forts in all parts of America to the westward, in the carrying-places between the lakes and rivers, and in all the most important places where they had the best prospect to bring the Indians into dependance, and to drive us out of the fur trade: in the mean while, the better to cover their designs, they affected to load the British ambassador at Paris with more than ordinary caresses.

The court of Spain was also remarkably attentive to the improvement of their marine, their commerce, and manufactures. Several English shipwrights who, by a most gross error in political œconomy, had, at the conclusion of the late war, been discharged from our dock-yards, and left to shift for themselves, had been allured, by the pretences of great advantages, to transport themselves and families into Spain, where they built several large ships of war upon the British model. The Spanish woollen and other manufactures were also, by the skill and industry of some of our countrymen, who had settled there, carried to such a degree of perfection, that the exportation of those commodities from Britain was very considerably diminished. Mr. Keene, the British ambassador at the court of Madrid, was therefore ordered by our ministry, to make a representation, requiring, that no more British subjects should be permitted to settle in Spain; and that even those who had already ready settled there, should be obliged to quit his Catholic Majesty's dominions: very little notice however was taken of this remonstrance.

In the spring of this year, his Swedish majesty departed this life, in a good old age, and was succeeded by Adolphus Frederic, duke of Holstein Eutin, bishop of Lubeck. As the succession to this kingdom may be an affair of some intricacy to many of our readers, the following account of it, and of the family of the deceased king, will not possibly be disagreeable.

Frederick, the deceased king of Sweden, and landgrave of Hesse Cassel, eldest son of Charles landgrave of Hesse Cassel, was born in 1676; he was first married to a daughter of Frederick II. king of Prussia: but she dying without issue, he espoused the princess Eleonora, youngest daughter of Charles XI. king of Sweden, who, on her brother Charles XII. being killed before Frederickshall in Norway in 1718, was elected by the states queen of Sweden, on condition of restoring them their ancient rights and liberties; and she resigning the crown in favour of her consort, he was elected king of Sweden, and crowned in May 1721, on the like conditions agreed to by the queen, of lodging both the legislative and executive power in the states, and leaving the prince little more than the name of a king.

The princess Hedwig Sophia, eldest sister of Charles XII. married Frederick, duke of Holstein Gottorp, by whom she had issue Charles Frederick, who married Anna Petrowna, eldest daughter of czar Peter the Great by his second wife Catherine. By her he had issue Charles Peter Ulrick, who consequently was heir to the crown of Sweden, and so declared by the states on his father's death: but the czarina Elizabeth, the late empress of Russia, having declared him her successor to that crown, he renounced his claim to Sweden, and the states declared his uncle Adolphus Frederick, duke of Holstein Eutin and bishop of Lubeck, successor to the Swedish throne. He was born in 1710, and married to the princess Ulrica of Prussia.

The day after the deceased king's death, viz. March 26, O. S. the prince successor, Adolphus Frederick, was proclaimed king; and immediately, of his own accord, took an oath in full senate, that he would never attempt to introduce a despotic authority; but maintain their liberties with his blood, and govern his subjects in all respects according to the laws, and the form of government established in Sweden. A short time after his accession, he sent an envoy to the court of Petersburg, to intimate his intentions to live upon amicable terms with that crown, with which notice the czarina was so well pleased, that she expressed her satisfaction in a public declaration, and the good understanding between the two courts was perfectly restored.

The parliament of England was opened on the fourteenth day of November, when the king, in his speech from the throne, gave the two houses to understand, "That for the same purposes which suggested the treaty with the elector of Bavaria, he had now, in conjunction with the States General, concluded another with the king of Poland, elector of Saxony: he told them, that the unfortunate death of the prince of Orange had made no alteration in the state of affairs in Holland; and that he had received the strongest assurances from the States of their firm resolution to maintain the intimate union and friendship happily subsisting between his majesty and those ancient and natural allies of his crown. Finally, he exhorted both houses to consider seriously of some effectual provisions to suppress those audacious crimes of robbery and violence, grown so frequent about the capital, proceeding, in a great measure, from that profligate spirit of irreligion, idleness, gaming, and extravagance, which had of late extended itself in an uncommon degree, to the dishonour of the nation, and the great offence and prejudice of the sober and industrious part of the people."

Addresses replete with expressions of loyalty, affection, and approbation, were returned by both houses; and such an unanimity now appeared in their proceedings, as afforded the most comfortable prospect to every true lover of his country. The first thing the commons went upon was the case of Mr. Murray, who, at the close of the last session, had been discharged of course from his confinement in Newgate; on which occasion, a great number of his friends, and amongst others the two sheriffs of London, accompanied him in a triumphal manner to his own house. This behaviour of the sheriffs was highly resented by the house, and some talked of summoning them to the bar; but by the prudence and moderation of Mr. Pelham, these hasty measures were quashed. It was, however, resolved to order Mr. Murray again into custody; but he had wisely escaped the storm, by retiring out of the kingdom; of which, when the house was informed, they addressed his majesty to offer a reward for apprehending him, with which his majesty was most graciously pleased to comply. A prosecution was also commenced against the author, printer, and publisher of a pamphlet, entitled, "The case of the honourable Alexander Murray, esq. in an appeal to the people of Great Britain:" and the same person happening to be both printer and publisher, he was brought to his trial, but after a long hearing was acquitted by the jury.

The commons then proceeded to settle the supply. They granted two millions ninety thousand three hundred and nine pounds for the service of the current year; one million three hundred thousand pounds towards discharging the national debt; three hundred one thousand and twelve pounds for supplying the deficiencies of old funds; fifty-four thousand seven hundred and fifty-one pounds for making good the deficiencies of last year's grants; forty-nine thousand two hundred and nineteen pounds for defraying extraordinary expences; and one hundred and twelve thousand one hundred and forty-two pounds for purchasing the charter of the African company; the whole amounting nearly to four millions sterling.

The business of this session was not very important. However, some very salutary laws were enacted for the encouragement of traffic, and the better regulation of the civil polity. These consisted in an act for licensing pawn-brokers, and for the more effectual preventing the receiving of stolen goods. Another for preventing thefts and robberies, and the punishment of such persons who kept disorderly houses. The operation of this bill extended to London, and twenty miles round it; and all persons living within that circuit were required to take out licences from the justices of the peace, before they they should presume to open any room or place for public dancing, music, or such other entertainment.

For the better cultivating and civilizing the Highlands of Scotland, and preventing of disorders there for the future, an act of parliament passed this same session, "for annexing certain forfeited estates in Scotland (by the rebellions in the years 1715 and 1745) to the crown unalienably, and for making satisfaction to the lawful creditors thereupon, and to establish a method for managing the same." By this bill, his majesty was empowered to commit the management of these estates to the care of commissioners, who were to have no salaries, but were to appoint stewards under them, with an allowance not exceeding five per cent. of the rental, and grant leases for any term not exceeding 21 years, upon a reserved rent of three-fourths of the neat annual value, and not to amount above 20 l. a-year to any one person. All the cessees were to take the oaths to the government, and to reside upon and cultivate the lands, and not to resign or let them to any other person, nor to pay any gratuity whatsoever to any other person for holding them. The king may erect schools on the said estates, or in the other parts of the Highlands or islands of Scotland, for instructing young persons in reading and writing the English language, and in the several branches of agriculture and manufactures; and may erect houses for their reception, and for carrying on such manufactures by them, and for accommodating their masters; and may apply such parts of the produce of the said estates as shall be necessary for erecting such schools, for providing salaries for the teachers, for clothing and maintaining such young persons, and for supplying the schools with utensils and materials for agriculture and manufactures, and for the raising flax, &c. as his majesty shall direct. And the king may empower the commissioners to allot portions of land for the use of such schools, or to apply such part of the clear rent of the lands as he shall direct, in the purchase of portions of land to be allotted for such schools.

Of this excellent law posterity will reap the principal benefit, a beginning being already made in several parts of the Highlands for working schools; to which the most laudable society in Scotland "for propagating Christian knowledge in the Highlands, &c." have lent an helping hand, by erecting several schools, out of their own income, for the instruction of the children. New villages are also begun; manufactures, as well as agriculture, are set on foot, where none were known before: so that it is highly probable, in half a century more, the most uncultivated parts of that country will wear a very different aspect. Another excellent bill was that "for the better preventing the horrid crime of murder;" by which it is enacted, "That all persons convicted of wilful murder shall be executed on the next day but one following that on which the sentence is pronounced, which it shall be immediately on conviction, except it fall on a Sunday, when they shall be executed on the Monday following: afterwards their body shall be delivered to the company of surgeons to be dissected; or in the country, to such surgeon or surgeons as the judges of assize shall direct. After the sentence shall be passed, the murderer shall be fed on bread and water only, &c. &c." This new provision, or some other against this abominable crime, seemed to be greatly wanted, as murders had been shockingly frequent of late; and this expedient, how ineffectual soever it may appear in theory, hath been found in practice of very salutary consequence.

The multiplicity of public funds had long been considered as a national grievance. The different stocks of annuities at three per cent. were no fewer than eight, amounting in the whole to upwards of nine millions. Those at three and a half per cent. were six, composing a sum of near eighteen millions. In order to remove the perplexity and confusion which must necessarily attend such a number of public funds, Mr. Pelham projected a bill, which was easily carried through both houses, for converting the several annuities into so many joint stocks, transferable on the Bank of England, and to be charged on the sinking fund.

On the twentieth day of March 1752, a petition was presented to the commons by the merchants of London, setting forth, That several foreigners had of late years come over to England, in order to obtain private acts of parliament for their naturalization, with a view to gain some advantages to themselves in point of trade; particularly to avoid the payment of the duties of aliens, on the goods and merchandizes which they imported from foreign parts into this kingdom; and that having obtained such acts, they returned back to their own country, where they constantly resided, and consequently bore no part of the public taxes, nor in any manner contributed towards the support of the state, or at all answered the intention of the legislature. They therefore prayed that this abuse of the favour of parliament might be prevented, by restraining for the future the benefit of naturalization to the time during which foreigners should reside within this realm, in such manner, and under such limitations, as to the house should appear fit. This petition appeared so reasonable, that the house thought proper immediately to grant it; and a clause accordingly to that purpose was inserted in a naturalization bill which was then depending, and has continued since to be added to every bill of that nature.

I must not omit taking notice here, that the members of the house of commons came to a resolution this session to have their Journals printed. This was a work of great utility and necessity, as the knowledge of parliamentary transactions is so necessary to every member of either house, and as the charge of transcribing them could be defrayed by so few. The care of this publication was committed to Mr. Hardinge, late clerk of the house; and five thousand pounds were at different times allotted him for the execution of the work, which came out tolerably accurate and correct. It were to be wished, that while the legislature were upon this subject, they had turned their thoughts to the present method of dating acts of parliament from the years of the reigning king, without mentioning the year of our Lord, as in the laws of other nations, whereby much uncertainty and frequent mistakes, in computing a number of years between a certain year of one king's reign to a certain year of another king's reign, or to the present time, are avoided. This is frequently complained of, tho' not yet remedied; and it might easily be done in future, by superadding the year of our Lord to the year of the reigning prince.

On the twenty-sixth of March, his majesty having given his assent to ninety-five public and private bills, harangued the two houses in the usual strain; after which the parliament was prorogued. As soon as the session expired, the king appointed a regency, and set out for Hanover, in order to concert the proper measures for effecting the great scheme he had projected for getting the archduke Joseph chosen king of the Romans. No one event of importance sufficient to claim a place in history, happened in Great Britain during his absence, nor indeed in the whole course of this year, except the ratification of two treaties of peace and commerce between his majesty and the states of Tripoli and Tunis, on the coast of Barbary, concluded by the ministration of commodore Kappel, brother to the earl of Albemarle; and that the trustees of Georgia, finding they could not support that colony under its then constitution, surrendered their charter to his majesty.

The several powers of Europe were at this time so intent upon their own interests, that very few foreign incidents of this year relate to Great Britain. The king of Portugal indeed attempted to check the vast exportation of gold coin out of his kingdom by the British merchants, and insisted upon inspecting the books of the factory at Lisbon; but upon proper remonstrances being made that such a step would be a direct contravention of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns, he declined any farther proceedings of that kind.

A misunderstanding arose this summer between his Britannic majesty and the king of Prussia, concerning their respective pretensions to the province of East Friesland, which was at present in the possession of the latter of these monarchs. It was proposed by his Britannic majesty to refer this dispute to the decision of the Aulic Council; but this was rejected by Prussia, who at the same time stopped payment of the Silesia loan*, which he had hitherto continued punctually to pay, and caused a paper to be published in justification of his conduct, in which he declared his motives to be, the unjustly stopping and seizing, by the English, of eighteen Prussian ships, and thirty-three neutral vessels in which the Prussians were concerned. At the same time, he ordered his minister at London to present a memorial, with an account of the damages, amounting to a very considerable sum, and demanding, in the most peremptory manner, a final discussion of the affair in three months from the date of his remonstrance. This memorial was referred by the ministers to the examination of his majesty's advocate, attorney, and solicitor-general, who, after the strictest enquiry into, and maturest reflection on, this matter, refuted every article of the charge in the most clear and perspicuous manner; and moreover shewed, beyond contradiction, that after all, there was not the most distant connection between the capture of those ships and the affair of the Silesia loan, which was altogether a private transaction between the emperor and the creditors: and, finally, that by the contract with the late emperor, the whole of the loan ought to have been repaid in the year 1745; but that all the complaints brought by the Prussians were founded upon facts that did not happen till 1746. This report was transmitted to his Prussian majesty, who was so sensible of the truths contained therein, that he gave up the point without farther hesitation.

The troubles in Corsica rose to a very great height this year, there being no less than three parties on foot in that island; one for the Genoese, one for the French, and the third for the independency of the island against both. France was distracted with violent disputes between the king and the clergy, in relation to the taxation of their revenues; and between the latter and the parliament, about matters of religious faith and practice.

The tranquillity of the North appeared to be now perfectly re-established. The States-general of the United Provinces applied their whole attention to the interior polity of their dominions; and Spain was earnestly bent upon the improvement of her commerce and manufactures: and in the autumn of this year a treaty was concluded at Madrid, between the empress queen and the kings of France and Spain: to which other powers, particularly the king of Sardinia, afterwards acceded, for preserving the peace of Italy.

The courts of Vienna and Hanover still continued to prosecute, in the most vigorous manner, their scheme of electing a king of the Romans: and the elector of Mentz, influenced by the majority of the college, had convoked an electoral diet for that purpose: but strong protests against this convocation were entered by the electors of Cologne and Palatine; the latter of whom was brought over, by granting him the satisfaction he demanded of the empress-queen and his Britannic majesty, amounting to one hundred thousand pounds sterling, by way of indemnification for the losses he had sustained during the war; and by procuring for him some other privileges which he insisted upon, well understanding his own importance on this occasion. Yet, even after the concurrence of this prince was secured, the purposed election proved abortive, by the resistance of the other princes of the empire, who thought the liberties of the Germanic body might be endangered, by the election of the son in the life-time of the emperor his father, since, as they observed (and certainly with great reason) the reigning emperor might have so much influence as to prevent the necessary capitulations to be signed by the king of the Romans as emperor "in futuro," being insisted upon: and thus their liberties by degrees be rendered precarious, and at last entirely subverted. The king of Prussia particularly distinguished himself in this opposition, perhaps from a secret view of obtaining the imperial dignity for himself, though a protestant, there being no law to confine it to a Roman catholic.

* The affair of the Silesia loan was as follows: In the year 1735 the emperor Charles VI. straitened for money, had by the permission of the king of England, with whom he was then upon very good terms, borrowed from the subjects of Great Britain two hundred and fifty thousand pounds at six per cent.

for which he mortgaged the silver mines in Silesia. By the seventh article of the treaty of Breslau, which ceded Silesia to the king of Prussia, that prince charged himself wholly with the repayment of what had been lent by the English merchants on the security of the revenues of Silesia.

By this time the French in North America had infused such a spirit of malice, cruelty, and revenge, into their Indians, that the most horrid barbarities were committed on the outsettlers on the frontiers of our colonies, which were all alarmed at the news they received of the proceedings of their treacherous neighbours. The French, tho' determined to carry their ambitious projects into execution, yet perceiving that, by all the assistance their Indians could afford them, they were not a match for the English in America, thought it necessary to send for recruits from France. Accordingly, nine thousand troops, with their wives and children, were sent from thence to Canada in the course of this year.

In September advice arrived in England from the East Indies, where war was carried on by the French and English companies, that colonel Clive, an officer in our company's service, had obliged the French to retire from before Arcot, and had gained many other signal advantages over them. These disturbances in India had been occasioned by the intrigues of the French company's officers, and by those of both companies engaging too much in the quarrels of the natives.

By other advices which came some time after from our West India settlements, the government had the mortification to learn, that on the fifteenth of September this year a violent hurricane, at Charles-Town in South Carolina, had driven all the vessels in the harbour on shore, ruined the wharfs and bridges, and blown down a great number of houses, &c. The damage done by this fatal storm was immense, and plantations thirty miles round Charles-Town were swept clear, and had all their buildings utterly demolished. Numbers of lives and much cattle were lost: in short, the devastation was to the last degree deplorable. On the thirtieth of the same month another violent hurricane added greatly to the distress of this suffering colony, though it did more damage in the country than in Charles-Town.

His majesty being returned from his German dominions, opened the session of parliament on the eleventh of January, 1753, with a most gracious speech from the throne, which was answered by loyal addresses from both houses. Then the commons proceeded to consider the supplies, which, such was the oeconomy of the ministry, amounted to very little more than two millions. As for the national debt, it now stood at the enormous sum of seventy-four millions three hundred and sixty-eight thousand four hundred and fifty-one pounds fifteen shillings; and to discharge this, the sinking fund produced one million seven hundred and thirty-five thousand five hundred twenty-nine pounds six shillings.

Several bills of excellent tendency were passed in the beginning of this session, viz. A bill for the better preservation of the game, which by the infamous practices of poachers, was threatened with a total extirpation. A bill for the better regulating the performance of quarantine, in order to prevent the plague from being imported from foreign countries into Great Britain. A bill for the more effectual preventing the inhuman practice of plundering ships which have the misfortune to suffer shipwreck; a practice which prevailed upon many different parts of the British coast, to the disgrace of the nation, and the scandal of human nature. A bill allowing the exportation of wool and woollen yarn from Ireland, to any port in Great Britain; and another, prescribing the breadth of wheels belonging to heavy carriages, that the high roads of the kingdom might be the better preserved. This is commonly known by the name of the Broad Wheel Act.

But this session was chiefly distinguished by an act for the naturalization of the Jews, and a bill for the preventing of clandestine marriages. The first of these, which made its way pretty easily through the house of lords, who sent it down to the commons, was entitled, An act to permit persons professing the Jewish religion to be naturalized by parliament. It was countenanced by the ministry, and supported by petitions from some woollen manufacturers, and others concerned in shipping, who affirmed, that such an act might tend greatly to encourage many persons of wealth and substance to remove with their effects from foreign parts into this kingdom; the greatest part of which, agreeable to the experience of former times, would be employed by them in foreign trade and commerce, in increasing the shipping, and encouraging the exportation of the woollen and other manufactures of England, of which the persons who professed the Jewish religion had for many years last past exported great quantities.

The sentiments of the generality of the people, however, were widely different from these, and never was more universal or violent clamour raised against ministerial measures than was against this: the press teemed with the most abusive and scurrilous publications against the whole Jewish tribe, and those who were the advocates for, and supporters of this bill, which was represented as an axe laid to the root of Christianity; and the whole a private and corrupt business, managed between the great people in power, and the leading men among the Jews. The lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council assembled, presented a petition to parliament, in which they expressed their apprehension that the bill, if passed into a law, would tend greatly to the dishonour of the Christian religion, endanger the excellent constitution, and be highly prejudicial to the trade of the kingdom in general, and of the city of London in particular. To the same purpose another petition was also presented by the merchants and traders of the city of London. Counsel was heard, evidence examined, and the bill produced violent debates, in which party prejudice and narrowness of opinion seemed to take place of real concern for the true interest of the nation. The bill however passed by a considerable majority in both houses, and at length received the royal assent: but the minds of the people had been so heated with prejudices, from the misrepresentation of the nature and end of this act, that the government thought proper to repeal it to all intents and purposes, and this was the very first act of the following session of parliament; although, as no ill use could well be made of this new privilege to the Jews, and as it might gradually have drawn hither many persons of great substance to settle with their wealth amongst us, and might consequently farther promote the national commerce, it is not easy to see how it should reasonably have given any just offence.

offence to moderate and reasonable Christians. But in the act abrogating this statute, the grounds for the repeal were truly assigned, viz. "That occasion had been taken from the first law to "raise discontents," and to disquiet the minds of many of his majesty's subjects."

The fatal effects of clandestine marriages had long been a subject of complaint in England. Every day produced hearings in the court of chancery, and left appeals to the house of peers, concerning the validity of those marriages, by the irregularity of which the innocent offspring were sometimes cut off from succession to estates, though their parents had been married by mutual consent. Designing people of both sexes, though of the most infamous character, had it in their power to ruin the sons and daughters of the greatest families in England, by the hourly opportunities of being married at the Fleet, where a band of the most profligate wretches, wearing the habit of clergymen, and, to the disgrace of that order, too many of them being really so, plied about the verge of the Fleet-market, like porters to intercept customers, and performed the ceremony of marriage without a licence, or asking any questions of the two parties. Some shocking instances of young persons ruined by these infamous practices, having lately been discovered, gave rise to the present bill to prevent abuses, which was framed under the direction of lord Hardwick, at that time lord high chancellor of England, and introduced into the upper house; from whence, after undergoing some slight alterations, it descended to the commons. There it occasioned a most vehement contest, in which, however, all political motives and party prejudices appeared to be entirely laid aside, and the speakers for and against, to be actuated merely by their own private sentiments: for many of the principal servants of the government differed in opinion from those of the ministry who countenanced the bill; while, on the other hand, he was strongly supported therein by some of the chiefs of the opposition: in fine, the disputes were maintained with great warmth and eagerness, and in point of eloquence and argument the two parties were pretty equally matched; but at length, after a long and obstinate contest, it was passed by a considerable majority, and in the end received the royal assent.

As this bill is still in force; has been the subject of much popular clamour; and may be of use, especially to my young readers, I have thought proper to give the substance of it here.

It ordains, "That the banns shall be published in the church or chapel where the parties dwell, three Sundays, in the morning, except where morning service is not performed, immediately after the second lesson: if the parties live in different places, the banns must be published in each: and if in an extraparochial place, or where no divine-service is usually celebrated, then in the parish church or chapel adjoining; and the marriage must be solemnized where the banns were published.

"The minister is not obliged to publish the banns, unless the parties give in their christian and surnames, the place of their abode, and the time they have dwelt in them, a week before the first publication; and when the banns have been thus published, the minister shall not incur ecclesiastical censure for solemnizing the marriage, although the parties shall appear to have been under age, and not to have obtained the consent of their parents or guardians, unless they had previous notice of such dissent, and then he is to declare the banns void. No licence shall be granted where one of the parties shall not have dwelt at least a month, a special licence by the archbishop excepted. If marriages shall be solemnized in any other place than a church or chapel, without a special licence; or in a public chapel without first having published the banns, or a licence obtained of some persons properly authorized, the marriage shall be void, and the person who solemnized it transported for seven years, if prosecuted in three.

"Marriage by licence, when either of the said parties are under age, and consent of parents or guardians has not been obtained, shall be void, provided the party under age be not a widow, and the parent refusing consent be not a widow married again. When the consent of a mother or guardian shall be capriciously refused, or the party non compos mentis, or beyond the sea, the court of chancery may relieve in a summary way. No suit shall be had to compel a celebration, under pretence of any contract, whether the words of such contract were in the present or future tense.

"All marriages to be before two witnesses besides the minister, and an entry shall be made in a book kept for that purpose, expressing whether it was by banns or licence, and either of the parties under age; the consent of parent or guardian shall also be entered, to be signed by the minister, the parties, and the witnesses. False entry, licence, or certificates, or destroying register-books, are felony in principal or accessory, and to be punished with death. This act is not to extend to the royal family, quakers or Jews, or to affect any marriage in Scotland or beyond sea: nor is it necessary, in order to support a marriage by banns, to prove the residence of the parties, and the place where they were published; nor when by licence, to prove they had resided where the marriage was celebrated on oath; nor shall any evidence be received to prove the contrary."

I cannot but think, however, that the framers of this bill might have fallen upon means to prevent the great evils and inconveniences arising from clandestine marriages, less harsh and severe to the subject than those adopted by this act, which, after all, has been rendered in a manner ineffectual; for by a trip over to France, or a jaunt to Scotland, a wishing couple may, without the least hesitation or interruption, be as indissolubly tied together as if they had been married here in England, in direct conformity to the regulations prescribed by this act.

This session furnished little more of importance, either of civil or commercial concern; but the attention of the parliament, which had seldom, if ever turned upon literary matters, was now directed to an extraordinary subject of that nature. Sir Hans Sloane, the celebrated physician and naturalist, who died in the beginning of this year, having through the course of many years, with great labour and expence, gathered together whatever could be procured either in our own or foreign countries, that was rare and curious in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, as well as of antiquities and master-pieces of art, had directed in his last will, that this valuable museum, together with his numerous library, should be offered to the parliament, for the use of the public, on their paying ing the sum of twenty thousand pounds (supposed not to be one fourth of the real value) in compensation to his heirs : but if the parliament should not chuse to purchase them, then, on the same conditions, they were to be offered to the academy of sciences at Petersburg, and to those of Paris, Berlin, and Madrid successively ; and if all those should refuse them upon the above terms, the executors were directed to sell them in such manner as they should think expedient. The British house of commons however was too jealous of the national honour to suffer so noble a collection to become the property of any other people ; accordingly they readily embraced the terms of Sir Hans Sloane's will, and a bill was proposed for purchasing this museum, as also that valuable collection of manuscripts, denominated from its founder Robert Harley earl of Oxford, the Harleian Miscellany, and now offered to the public by his daughter, the dutchess of Portland, for ten thousand pounds ; and these two being joined to the famous Cottonian Library, and the king's or royal library, which had long lain neglected and exposed to the injuries of the weather in the old dormitory at Westminster, the whole was deposited in Montague house, now better known by the name of the Museum, under the direction of trustees and governors appointed by the parliament, from amongst the most eminent persons in the kingdom,* where this monument of national taste and liberality is open to the inspection of the public, under certain necessary restrictions ; but without the least fee or gratuity whatever being demanded or accepted.

On the seventeenth day of June, his majesty put an end to the session with a speech to both houses, which contained nothing that requires recapitulation, farther than that the state of foreign affairs had undergone no alteration since their meeting.

The domestic transactions of this year in England consisted chiefly of the great and melancholy effects of storms, tempests, and inundations, that happened in different parts ; and in the continuance of that immorality and licentiousness among the commonalty, which produced riots, tumults, and disorders of various kinds, under as various pretences. In the city of Bristol, in particular, most violent outrages were committed by the colliers, who raised an insurrection on account of the exportation of corn, in which several lives were lost before the public peace could be restored. The like tumults were raised in Yorkshire, on account of the turnpikes, many of which were demolished by the rabble. At Leeds the civil power having called in the assistance of the military, to support the collectors of these tolls, the mob were so enraged at this circumstance, that they broke into the town, and attacked the troops, who being at length obliged to fire in their own defence, killed nine of the rioters outright, and wounded about twenty-four ; upon which the rest fled in the greatest terror, and the disturbance was effectually quieted.

In the beginning of this year there happened an incident, which, though in its own nature little worthy of historical notice, deserves to be recorded, as it serves strongly to mark the genius of the English people. A young woman, whose name was Elizabeth Canning, pretended, that as she was coming home at night, on new-years-day, she was met under Bedlam wall by two fellows, who pulled off her gown, cap, and apron, and having gagged her, threatened her life if she made the least resistance, and afterwards dragged her along between them to the house of one Mrs. Wells near Enfield Wash, where menaces and confinement were made use of to induce her to turn prostitute, which however she had the courage to resist. She said, that an old gipsy, one Mary Squires, stripped her of her stays in Mrs. Wells's house ; and she declared, that during her confinement of near a month in that place, she had no other subsistence but a quartern loaf and a gallon of water : after so long durance, she took the opportunity to pull down some boards which were nailed before the window of the room she was confined in, made her escape, and came, on the twenty-ninth of January, in a very miserable naked condition, and almost deprived of her senses, to her mother, a poor widow woman, who lived in Aldermanbury-postern.

Though nothing could be more improbable, and indeed more incredible than this story, yet it operated so powerfully on the passions of the common people, especially the enthusiasts of all denominations, that large subscriptions were raised for prosecuting the supposed delinquents. Warrants accordingly were issued for apprehending Mrs. Wells, mistress of the house at Enfield Wash ; the maid servant, whose name was Virtue Hall, and Squires, the old gipsy-woman, whom Canning charged with having robbed her of her stays. Virtue Hall, on her examination before Mr. justice Fielding, confessed her being witness to the above ill usage and confinement : the gipsy and Mrs. Wells were hereupon sent to prison, and afterwards tried at the Old Bailey, where the former received sentence of death, and the latter to be branded as a bawd, and imprisoned six months as an accessory to the fact.

Some time after, positive and reputable evidence being produced, that Mary Squires was at Abbotbury in Dorsetshire, at the very time when it was deposed she had stript Canning of her stays at Wells's house ; and Virtue Hall having retracted her evidence before the lord mayor, then Sir Crispe Gascoigne, that magistrate, surprized at the many impossibilities and absurdities in Canning's story, undertook to discuss it to the bottom, for the sake of truth and justice ; in which he discharged himself with that noble resolution and impartiality

* The trustees are the archbishop of Canterbury ; the lord high chancellor, or lord keeper ; the lord high treasurer, or first lord commissioner of the treasury ; the lord president of the council ; the lord privy-seal ; the lord high admiral, or first lord commissioner of the admiralty ; the lord steward of his majesty's household ; the lord chamberlain ; the bishop of London ; the two secretaries of state ; the speaker of the house of commons ; the chancellor of the exchequer ; the lord chief justice of the king's bench ; the master of the rolls ; the lord chief justice of the common pleas ; the attorney general ; the solicitor general ; the president of the Royal-Society, and the president of the college of physicians ; all of them for the time being. To these were added, Charles lord Cardigan ; Hans Stanley, esq. Samuel Burrows, esq. Thomas Hart, esq. William duke of Portland, and Edward earl of Oxford and Mortimer. The archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, and the speaker of the house of commons, have the nomination of all the officers, assistants, and servants.

which ought ever to animate the chief magistrate of this metropolis. Application was made to the throne for mercy, in behalf of the gipsy Squires, whose execution was respited; and his majesty having ordered the whole affair to be laid before his attorney and solicitor-general, on their report, after having strictly examined the witnesses on both sides, this poor old creature was indulged with a full pardon.

By this time the matter was swelled up to such a pitch, as to divide the whole kingdom into two parties, who were inflamed against each other with the most outrageous spirit of animosity, which was continued for almost a year. Pamphlets and papers innumerable were published on each side, in which the most scandalous liberties were taken with the characters of those who were principally concerned for either party. Bills of perjury were mutually preferred; the evidences for Squires were tried and acquitted; Canning absconded for some time, but afterwards surrendered to take her trial for wilful and corrupt perjury, at the Old Bailey; and during her trial, which lasted many days, the court adjourning from time to time, there were great mobs and riots about the sessions-house, and the lord-mayor was often insulted and abused in his passage to and from the court. The jury however brought Canning in guilty, and she was committed to Newgate; but two of the jurymen having made oath, that the verdict they had given was not agreeable to their consciences (for though they believed her guilty of perjury, they did not believe her guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury) the friends of the prisoner moved for a new trial, which point being argued next session, before five of the judges, they gave their opinion, that the verdict was a good one, and perfectly agreeable to the evidence; and therefore in conclusion, Canning was sentenced to be transported to the British colonies for seven years. Her departure however was, through the indiscreet and bigotted zeal of her protectors, made rather a matter of parade and triumph, than the submission to a legal sentence denounced against her as a culprit and impostor: large sums were collected for her private use; a ship was hired purposely to carry her to the place of her destination, in which she was supplied with every convenience that a person of the most comfortable circumstances could require for a voyage of amusement; and letters of recommendation accompanied her from persons of distinction here at home, to others resident in that part of the world she was going to: and it has been since reported, that the artful jade has been married abroad, and settled in a manner infinitely above the most sanguine expectations her general state of life could ever have warranted.

The next incident that principally distinguished this year in England, was the execution of Dr. Archibald Cameron, a native of Scotland, and brother to the famous Lochiel, a staunch friend of the young pretender, and remarkably active in the late rebellion. The doctor had accompanied his brother in all his expeditions, though not in a military capacity, and had been involved in the same attainder with him: flattering himself, however, that after so long time elapsed, he had no danger to apprehend from detection, he ventured over this year to North Britain, in order to reclaim some debts due to him in that country: he was, however, discovered, apprehended, conducted to London, and confined in the Tower; and being afterwards brought before the court of King's-bench, the identity of his person was there sworn to, in consequence whereof he received sentence of death, and suffered at Tyburn on the seventh of June with great fortitude and decorum; and it was thought by most cool and considerate people, that the government might have spared this unfortunate victim, without impairing its dignity, or derogating from its justice.

The British whale-fishery, which had for some years been revived and carried on with great national spirit, was remarkably successful this year, not one ship being lost; and the forty-eight sail employed, brought home one hundred and forty-four fish and a half.

The peace of the continent continued uninterrupted by any new contest or disturbance; yet the breach between the parliament and clergy of France was every day more and more widened, and had arrived to great inveteracy on both sides; and his Most Catholic Majesty declaring in favour of the prelacy, the members of all the chambers, except the great chamber, were banished, and the usual administration of justice ceased in Paris and its environs, and at length the members of the great chamber were likewise sent into exile.

The internal dissensions, however, which prevailed among the French, did not prevent them from continuing their encroachments in America, where matters were fast ripening to a fresh rupture between them and the English in that part of the world. Commissaries had indeed been appointed here at home, to settle with others from the French court, the different limits between the possessions of the two crowns in Acadia or Nova-Scotia, agreeable to the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht; but the French raised so many difficulties, in the course of the conference, and had recourse to so many quirks and quibbles, to support the unjust and unwarrantable claims they had thought proper of late to adopt, that our commissaries, seeing no hopes of bringing the affair to any equitable conclusion, immediately put a stop to the negotiation, and returned to their own country.

In the mean time, the French in North-America, who had, towards the close of the preceding year, been strongly reinforced from Europe, disposed themselves for action early in the beginning of the spring. They had intelligence, that the English were building forts and raising plantations along the Ohio, which they apprehended to be too near their own settlements to be disregarded. Some merchants in London, with others in Virginia, had obtained a grant of his majesty of that river, to make such settlements in the meadows and places adjacent, as they should judge convenient for a plantation, and carrying on their intended trade. But the French were determined, at all events, to frustrate their design; and in order thereto, set up a prior claim, and insisted, that all that coast belonged to the crown of France. Accordingly they took all possible measures to disturb the new settlers, and to erect forts of their own on the bank of the said river: upon which, Robert Dinwiddie, esq. governor of Virginia, wrote a letter to Mr. Contrecoeur, the commandant of the French forces on the Ohio, to demand the reason of such proceedings, and sent it by major Washington: he likewise dispatched messengers to the governors of the several British colonies colonies, representing the dangerous state of affairs, and requesting them to raise forces, and form an expedition against the common enemy; and at the same time summoned the assembly of the province of Virginia, to have their advice and assistance upon this emergency. Major Washington having carried the governor's letter to the French commandant, and received his answer, returned with it; but it was so far from being satisfactory, that it convinced the governor, that the French were determined to carry their projected scheme into execution.

Convinced therefore that the most vigorous measures were necessary, in order to put a stop the farther progress of the French, his excellency began to levy troops, and wrote to the neighbouring governments to send their respective quotas of men or money, with all possible expedition, to his assistance. These preparations took up best part of the present year; the result of them will be related in order of time.

The ambition and intrigues of the French court were not confined to the continent of America only; they had also extended themselves to the East Indies, where they had endeavoured to embroil the English company with the Nabobs or viceroys of the Great Mogul in different parts of the peninsula intra Gangem. In order to understand the military transactions of the English company in India, the reader must be informed, that a Nabob is the governor of a province, or of a single town and its territory, of whom there are a great number in that part of the world. These Nabobs are all tributary to the Mogul emperor; but in every thing else they seem to be independent, and act as absolute and arbitrary sovereigns within their respective territories, often carrying on wars against one another, and sometimes attacking the European settlements upon their coast, without any authority from the Mogul; therefore it is absolutely necessary for the Europeans settled upon that coast, to court or command a regard from the Nabobs in their neighbourhood.

In these circumstances, immediately after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, monsieur Dupleix, the French governor of Pondicherry, observing that Annaverda Khan, nabob of Arcot, had a greater regard for the English than the French, he resolved to have him deposed. For this purpose he entered into a plot with Muzephur Jing and Chuenda Saib, two popular men in the neighbourhood, who raised an army of their friends; and being joined by a detachment of French from Pondicherry, they marched in July 1749 towards Arcot, on the plains of which city they were met by Annaverda at the head of his army; but as he had trusted entirely to his own strength, without soliciting any assistance from the English, his army was totally routed, and himself slain. However, his son Mahommed Ally Khan made his escape, and took shelter in Trichenopoly, a place of great strength to the southward, where, at his application, the English quickly supplied him with men and ammunition.

Strengthened by this reinforcement, Mahommed gained some advantages over the enemy, who were obliged to retreat, but no decisive blow was given. Mahommed being afterwards joined by Nazer Jing, nabob of Golconda, the two armies met, and on the twenty-fourth of March, 1750, engaged in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, when the French and their allies were defeated; and Mahommed by this victory saw himself restored to the nabobship of Arcot: but some misunderstandings having happened between Nazer Jing and the English, and also between Mahommed and them, they returned to Fort St. David's in August; and Mahommed being thus left alone, was attacked by the enemy, and compelled to fly for relief to Nazer Jing, who was then with his army at Arcot, and who upon this determined once more to march against the French, and drove them back to Gingey, a strong fortress in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, where they were immediately surrounded and blockaded. During this blockade, the French found means to stir up a conspiracy against Nazer Jing, who was suddenly cut off, and Muzephur his nephew was by Dupleix made nabob of Golconda in his stead.

As Mahommed Ally was unable to face the French and their new allies, he was obliged once more to take shelter in Trichenopoly, and solicit the assistance of the English, which was at last promised, upon his agreeing to yield them some commercial points which had long been in dispute. In the mean time, Muzephur Jing having taken possession of the nabobship of Golconda, and appointed Chuenda Saib to be nabob of Arcot, he collected a considerable force, and marched to lay siege to Trichenopoly, after reducing some little forts in his way: but by this time all matters being adjusted between Mahommed Ally and our company, a body of four hundred men was sent under the command of captain Gingen, a Swiss officer, to his assistance, which were joined by all the forces the young nabob could raise at Valconda, about seventy miles distant from Fort St. David's. Both armies being now partly equal in point of strength, lay encamped in sight of each other a whole month, during which no action of importance happened.

In order to make a diversion, and divide the enemy's forces, the company resolved to invade the province of Arcot with a separate body of troops. On this occasion it was that Mr. (now lord) Clive discovered those talents which have since acquired him so great a reputation, and such immense riches. This gentleman was the son of an attorney, and had entered into the service of the East India company as a writer; but the plodding track of business being ill suited to his active genius, he made but an indifferent figure in his profession; and despairing of succeeding by the pen, he now offered his service as a volunteer in this expedition, which was accepted; and in the month of August, 1751, he marched from Fort St. George at the head of two hundred and ten Europeans, crossed the country, and took possession of Arcot without opposition, where he behaved with so much moderation and generosity, that he gained the good-will of the natives to a high degree.

The French and their allies had by this time passed the river Caldaron, and encamped at Syringham, near Trichenopoly, but had not yet forces sufficient to besiege it in form. The diversion made by the party under captain Clive had the desired effect; for Chuenda Saib's son was detached with a great part of their army from Trichenopoly; upon whose approach Mr. Clive shut himself up in Arcot, to which the enemy laid siege; and having made two breaches, they at last, on the thirteenth of October, made a general assault: but our vigilant and gallant countryman having procured intelligence of their design, gave them so warm a reception, that they were repulsed in every quarter with great loss, and obliged to abandon the siege with the utmost precipitation. Whereupon Mr. Clive, leaving captain Kilpatrick (who had lately joined him with two thousand Marattos from Trichenopoly) in the castle of Arcot, set out with the rest of the troops in pursuit of the enemy; and coming up with them on the plains of Arani, gave them a total defeat on the third of December; after which he reduced several other forts, and then returned to Fort St. David's in triumph.

Here he had scarcely rested a month, when advice came that the enemy had collected a new army, and were approached within nine miles of Madras. Upon this captain Clive was again sent out with a body of English forces, and on the first day of March, 1752, came up with the enemy at Coverupante, about fifteen miles from Arcot, where he gave them another total defeat, and besides the killed, took a French lieutenant and forty-eight men prisoners, with all the enemy's cannon, and a great quantity of warlike stores. The whole province of Arcot being thus cleared of enemies, except those at Syrringham, captain Clive returned with his forces to St. David's, having in his way demolished the new town of Dupleix, which the French governor of Pondicherry had lately caused to be built.

By this time major Laurence, a gallant and experienced officer, was arrived from England, to take upon him the command of the troops in the company's service; and having collected all the forces that could be raised, he took the field, accompanied by captain Clive, and was joined by captain Gingen at Trichenopoly. The army afterwards marched towards Syrringham; and major Laurence took his measures so well, that notwithstanding the infinite disproportion between his troops and those of the enemy under Chuenda Saib, he entirely intercepted the passage of all provisions to their camp. Thus reduced to the greatest distress, and being deserted by most of the Indians, who had gone over to Mahommed Ally, Chuenda Saib in despair endeavoured to make his escape, but was taken prisoner by the nabob of Tanjore, an ally of the English company, who, in order to prevent the disputes about who should have the keeping of him, ordered his head to be struck off. This event was immediately followed by the submission of the pent-up army, who laid down their arms, and surrendered prisoners of war. M. Dupleix finding all his schemes baffled in every quarter, recalled his regulars from the Indian army, determined for the future to act only on the defensive.

The French East India company, discouraged by these repeated disasters, in order to compromise matters, sent over in the beginning of this year (1753) a commissary, who concluded a convention with the English company; by which it was agreed that the two companies should reciprocally restore the territories taken by the troops of either since the year 1748, except certain districts which the English retained for the conveniency of their trade; that the nabobs advanced through influence of either party, should be acknowledged by both; and that for the future neither should interfere in the differences between the princes of the country.

Towards the close of this year debates ran very high in Ireland, where a dispute had occurred between the ministry and the parliament of that kingdom, in a case where the prerogative was on one side concerned, and the liberty of the people and the independency of parliament on the other. This affair was quickly swelled into a violent national contest, in which Mr. Boyle, the speaker of the house of commons, particularly distinguished himself by his opposition to the court, which, as usual, acquired him the denomination of a glorious patriot, &c. &c. The duke of Dorset, who was at this time lord-lieutenant of Ireland, had indeed an arduous task to manage the helm of government during this political hurricane. By his prudence, however, matters were at last accommodated: the patriotic speaker of the house of commons was gratified with an earldom; and the public tranquillity, which seemed for some time to have been banished, was again restored.

The British parliament meeting on the fifteenth day of November, his majesty, in his speech to both houses, observed, that the events of this year had not made it necessary for him to offer any thing in particular to their consideration relating to foreign transactions: that the public tranquillity and the state of Europe remained on the same footing in which they were at the close of the last session; and they might be assured of his steadiness in pursuing the most effectual measures to preserve to his people the blessings of peace. The address did not pass in the house of commons without some severe animadversions on the inconsistency of this speech with the real state of affairs in Europe, nor without many spirited declarations against French perfidy and continental connections.

As no one transaction of sufficient importance for historical notice occurred during this session, I shall only observe, that after giving the royal assent to the land-tax bill of two shillings in the pound, to the malt-tax, mutiny, and several other bills; in particular, that repealing the act of naturalization passed in favour of the Jews last session, his majesty put an end to the session on the sixth of April 1754; and soon after the parliament was dissolved by proclamation, and writs issued for a new election.

In the beginning of March this year died the right honourable Henry Pelham, chancellor of the Exchequer, and prime minister since the resignation of the earl of Orford, not only sincerely lamented by his sovereign, but also regretted by the nation in general, to whose good-will and affection he had recommended himself by his open and ingenuous behaviour, even while he was pursuing measures which some of them did not entirely approve. He had, a little before his death, concerted the plan of the new parliament, and imparted it to his majesty, who had thought proper to honour it with his approbation: a resolution was therefore taken to make as few deviations as possible from the scheme he had formed. His brother the duke of Newcastle was appointed first lord-commissioner of the Treasury, and was succeeded as secretary of state by sir Thomas Robinson, who had long resided as ambassador at the court of Vienna. The other department of this office was retained by the earl of Holderness; and the function of chancellor of the Exchequer was performed, as usual, by the lord chief justice of the King's Bench, until a proper person could be found to supply that important post; but in the course of the summer it was conferred on Mr. Legge, who acquitted himself therein with equal honour and ability. Several other alterations were made of importance to the public: lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, was raised to the dignity of an earl; the place of lord chief justice of the King's Bench, becoming vacant by the death of sir William Lee, was bestowed upon sir Dudley Rider, who was succeeded in his office of attorney-general by Mr. Murray.

The elections for the new parliament went every where in favour of the ministry; and the writs being returned, the parliament was opened on the tenth day of May by the duke of Cumberland, and some other noblemen, who acted by virtue of a commission from his majesty. Mr. Onslow being re-chosen speaker of the house of commons, and approved of by the crown, the lord-chancellor made a speech to the parliament, importing, "That his majesty had given them this early opportunity of coming together, in order to complete, without loss of time, certain parliamentary proceedings, which he judged would be for the good of his subjects; but he did not think proper to lay before them any matters of general business, reserving every thing of that nature to the usual time of assembling in the winter." On the fifth of June this short session was closed, and the parliament prorogued to the eighth day of August, and from thence by successive prorogations to the month of November.

The English ministry having received nothing but evasive answers from the court of France, with regard to the complaints that were made of the encroachments in America, had sent peremptory orders to their governors in that country to repel force by force, and drive the French from their settlements on the river Ohio.

Thus authorised, governor Dinwiddie endeavoured, with a true British spirit, to prevail with the Virginians in his neighbouring government to arm in their own defence, and to erect a fort on the forks of the river Monongahela, to curb the French encroachments, and to defend the British traders and property. About the same time the assembly of South Carolina gave three thousand pounds sterling to be applied to the defence of his majesty's limits; and North Carolina passed an act for raising seven hundred men, who were to join the troops of Virginia immediately on their being ready for action: but though the two Carolinas and New York had sent out their forces, they did not however make a junction soon enough to perform any thing of consequence; and instead of deterring the French from their designs, it served only as a means to provide them with arguments to make the native Indians jealous of and oppose the English.

Mr. Dinwiddie prevailed at last with his province to raise ten thousand pounds and three hundred men to protect their frontiers; and the command of this small regiment was given to colonel Washington, a young gentleman of great valour and abilities, who began his march on the first day of May, and went and encamped at one of our forts on the Ohio, expecting there to be joined by the troops that were coming from the other colonies. The sieur de Centrocœur, commander in chief on the Ohio, had soon an eye upon him; and having intelligence that some waggons were on the road with provisions for his camp, sent out a party of forty-five men to intercept them; of which captain Washington being apprised, drew forth a detachment of his men and went in quest of the enemy, and on the twenty-eighth of May met with and engaged them. Twelve of the French were killed, and M. Jumonville their commander, and twenty-one taken prisoners; among whom were M. de la Force and M. Druellon, together with two cadets; with the loss of only two men killed and one wounded. As this was the first skirmish we had with the French, it was looked upon as a lucky stroke that would encourage the Indians to be faithful to us. The French, however, not long after, had their revenge in the engagement we had with them in the meadows of the Ohio, on the third of July this year, when a body of one thousand French and two hundred Indians advanced, under the command of M. du Villars, to attack and dislodge him from a little fort he had run up, called Fort Necessity, as a temporary defence and cover for his handful of men. The English were by this time reduced to two hundred; but they sustained the efforts of the enemy's whole force for upwards of three hours, and laid one hundred and fifty of them dead on the field. At length, however, he was obliged to surrender the fort upon capitulation; the terms of which were very honourable to him, it being stipulated that each side should retire without molestation, and that the English should march away with all the honours of war, and with their stores, effects, and baggage. In their retreat, however, they were terribly harassed by the Indians, who plundered his baggage, and massacred his people.

An account of this action being transmitted to London, our ministry's orders were dispatched to the earl of Albemarle, the British ambassador at Paris, to complain of it as an open violation of the peace, which did not however meet with the same degree of respect as on former occasions of complaint, the time nearly approaching for the French to pull off the mask of moderation and peace: for, instead of disavowing the conduct of their American commanders, orders were expedited for fresh reinforcements of men and ammunition to perfect their pernicious designs in that part of the world; and the ministry of England on their part sent the necessary cautions to the governors and provinces in North America, exhorting them to use their utmost endeavours in resisting the encroachments of the enemy, by uniting in a political league or confederacy; and the governor of New York was appointed to confer with the chiefs of the Indians, and by presents and other means to keep them steady to the British interest. This desirable union, however, was frustrated, by a spirit of contention which prevailed amongst the colonists and their respective governors, the particulars of which would take up too much room to insert.

In the mean while, the French were no less active in New England than in the other colonies, in extending their invasions and encroachments: their jesuitical missionaries spread themselves among the Indians, with the sole view of embittering their spirits against the English, and encouraged them to commit the most horrible cruelties upon the unhappy persons who fell into their hands, at a time when the people thought they were in perfect amity with them. Upon these advices received from several parts of the province, governor Shirley summoned the general-assembly of Massachusetts Bay, and delivered himself in a very pathetic speech upon the present critical situation of affairs; in consequence of which, the assembly came to vigorous resolutions to defend their country to the utmost of their power.

In Pennsylvania the enemy, in the month of May this year, seized upon Log's Town on the river Ohio, surprised the Block-house and Truck-house, cut off all our traders but two, and carried off in goods, furs, and skins, to the amount of twenty thousand pounds.

In pursuance of the resolution of the assembly of Massachusetts Bay, Mr. Shirley, in the summer of this year, 1754, marched with his troops to the eastern frontier, and with the consent of the Indians built Fort Western and Fort Halifax, on the river Kennebec. He also sent expresses to the ministry at home, representing the unhappy situation of the colonies, and the imminent danger to which Nova Scotia was exposed, from the encroachments and fortifications of the French, which had been extended to the very neighbourhood of the English settlements, and from any sudden attack, which might easily be formed against that province from St. John's island, Cape Breton, and Canada. This remonstrance carried great weight with it; for governor Shirley received not only the approbation of his majesty and council for the service he had performed on the river Kennebeck; but the government, in order to prevent the fatal catastrophe he had set before them, now adopted the most vigorous resolutions. Officers were appointed for two regiments, consisting each of two thousand men, to be raised in America; the command of which was given to governor Shirley and sir William Pepperel, who had orders to concert measures with Mr. Lawrence, lieutenant-governor and commander in chief of Nova Scotia, for attacking the French forts in that province: but nothing could be done in this service till the next summer, only the raising the two thousand men, and receiving two thousand stands of arms from London. It was also resolved in his majesty's council, to appoint a generalissimo for the service of North America; which command was conferred on major-general Braddock, whose courage and military discipline seemed to point him out as the most proper person for such service. Orders were also issued for the embarkation of Halket's and Dunbar's regiments of foot to sail with all expedition with general Braddock; but they did not get from Ireland till the fourteenth of January of the ensuing year.

The court of Spain changed its ministry this year, when the marquis de la Ensenada, a tool of France and of the Spanish queen-mother, was forced to resign his place to Mr. Wall; and his Catholic majesty seemed so much inclined to keep up peace and good harmony with England, that the disputes about our cutting logwood in the Bay of Honduras were amicably adjusted between the said Mr. Wall, now the Spanish prime minister, and sir Benjamin Keene, the British ambassador at Madrid.

No remarkable alteration occurred in the course of this year, in the affairs of the northern powers, to affect the interest of Great Britain, though the French were indefatigable in their endeavours to set the conduct of our court, in relation to the American dispute, in the most disadvantageous light, and to gain over the powers on the continent to her interest, by the means of promises, threats, or subsidies.

Our interest at the court of Lisbon seemed rather upon the decline. His Portuguese majesty had formed very extensive projects of trade and commerce, and had even erected an East India company. In the mean time, he expressed a great disgust at the great quantities of gold which were annually exported from his dominions, as the balance due from his subjects for English commodities. He even went still farther: for he imposed several severe restrictions upon the British merchants residing at Lisbon, some of whom were imprisoned, and others had their property taken from them, under pretence of their being concerned in sending away Portuguese gold, for the exportation of which his most Faithful majesty insisted on an imposition of three per cent. an exaction so exorbitant, that the profits of the trade could by no means sustain. It happening, however, that there was a scarcity of coin in Portugal, which was supplied from England; and the people having nothing but gold to give for this necessary article, the king was obliged to connive at the exportation of his coin, and the trade reverted to its usual channel.

On the fourteenth day of November the parliament of Great Britain assembled, agreeable to its last prorogation, when his majesty opened the session with a speech, informing the two houses, "That the general state of Europe had undergone very little alteration since their last meeting: that he had lately received the strongest assurances from his good brother the king of Spain, of friendship and confidence: that his principal view should be to strengthen the foundation, and secure the duration of a general peace; to improve the present advantages of it, for promoting the trade of his good subjects, and protecting those possessions [meaning North America] which constituted one great source of their wealth and commerce." The reader will readily remark of himself, that no mention is made in this speech of the particular encroachments. This was a political omission, in order to deprive the minority of all pretext for opposing the addresses of thanks, which were carried in both houses without a debate; and the parliament seem to have thought that his majesty had said enough to evince his resolution of humbling the insolence of our perfidious neighbour; a disposition which was so generally agreeable, that no expence was thought too great to second so laudable a design. The commons accordingly unanimously granted, for the service of the ensuing year, four millions seventy-three thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine pounds, of which one million was expressly given for augmenting the forces by sea and land. They also voted thirty-two thousand pounds as a subsidy to the king of Poland, and twenty thousand pounds to the elector of Bavaria, on a supposition that France would endeavour to avail herself of her superiority of land forces to attack Hanover; and that therefore it might be necessary to secure the assistance of such subsidiary allies on the continent.

The court of France, alarmed at these unanimous and vigorous resolutions of the great assembly of the nation; and apprehending the English were in good earnest resolved to exert themselves against their encroachments in America, were at great pains once more to amuse the British court with general declarations, that no hostility was intended on their part, nor the least infringement of the treaty: which declarations were communicated to our ministry by the marquis de Mirepoix, their own ambassador at the court of London. The earl of Albemarle being lately dead at Paris, the French court hoped by these cajoling messages to lull us into perfect security, and if possible to engage us to delay, or at least slacken, our armaments for America, till they had sufficiently strengthened their usurpations from Europe. With this view, at the very time they were declaring their pacific intentions, and their desire to preserve the public tranquillity, they were busily employed in fitting out a powerful armament at Brest for North America, and in taking such other measures as must convince every one, who would not shut his eyes against the plainest evidence, that they were on the eve of striking some important blow that might serve as a declaration of war.

The danger that threatened on all sides at last alarmed our ministry, and opened their eyes to the artifice of Mirepoix, and the fallacious promises of his most Christian majesty, and determined them to enter upon such measures as should be most effectual to prevent the fatal effects of the French armament.

Accordingly, on the twenty-third of January, 1755, a proclamation was issued to encourage seamen to enter themselves on board his majesty's ships of war; offering a bounty of thirty shillings for every able-bodied seaman between twenty and fifty years of age, and twenty shillings for every ordinary seaman. The same night there was a warm press below bridge; warrants for the same purpose were dispatched to the out-ports; and public notice was given at Greenwich-hospital, for all the seamen who were willing to go to sea to give in their names, and that they should not fail of the usual encouragements. Another proclamation was published on the eighth of February, for recalling all masters of ships, pilots, mariners, seamen, shipwrights, and other sea-faring men, his majesty's natural-born subjects, from the service of all foreign princes and states, and prohibiting such persons from entering their service: and this proclamation increased the bounty for seamen from thirty shillings to three pounds, and from twenty shillings to two pounds, who should voluntarily enter before the tenth day of March next following: and further, promised two pounds reward to any person discovering any able seaman, and thirty shillings for every ordinary seaman, who should secrete themselves.

On the twenty-seventh of March his majesty sent a message by sir Thomas Robinson, then secretary of state to the parliament, importing,

"That his majesty finding it requisite, from the present situation of affairs, to augment his forces by sea and land, and to take such other measures as might best tend to preserve the general peace of Europe, and to secure the just rights and possessions of his crown in America, as well as to repel any attempts whatever which may be formed against his majesty and his kingdoms, doubts not but that his faithful parliament will enable him to make such augmentations as the emergency of affairs in this critical conjuncture may require."

Upon this message, both houses presented very loyal addresses, expressing the utmost zeal and affection to his majesty's person and government, assuring their sovereign of their effectual support, and declaring their resolution to repel every attempt that might be made to deprive him of the just rights and possessions of his crown, or disturb the tranquillity of his kingdom. It was on this occasion that the sum of one million, already mentioned, was appropriated to the purpose of augmenting the forces by sea and land; and indeed it appears that it was high time for the nation to take alarm, if we may judge by the authentic accounts transmitted by M. de Cosne, our secretary of embassy at the court of France, of the formidable state of the French navy at this juncture: for about the latter end of March there were at Brest one man of war of eighty guns, four of seventy-four, six of sixty-four, one of sixty, one of fifty, one of forty-six, four of thirty, and one of twenty-four: at Toulon, one of eighty, five of seventy-four, three of sixty-four, two of thirty-two, and one of twenty-four: at Rochefort, one of eighty, one of seventy-four, three of sixty-four, one of fifty, and one of thirty-two guns; with a large number of land forces, ready to embark on the first notice: to which may be added several that had already sailed at different times to America.

But however terrible this naval armament might appear in the eyes of the French, it gave but little uneasiness to the English, who with pleasure saw, ready to enter upon action, riding at Portsmouth, Plymouth, Chatham, and Woolwich, one ship of one hundred guns, five of ninety, four of seventy-four, fifteen of seventy, one of sixty-six, nine of sixty, three of fifty, one of forty, and four of twenty guns, besides sloops, &c. Also ships under orders for fitting, one of one hundred guns, one of seventy-two, five of seventy, one of sixty, and three of fifty guns. To which may be added, those already stationed in the East and West Indies, in Africa, and in America. Provision was likewise made for an augmentation of our forces both by sea and land, to the amount of thirty-five thousand men, viz. twenty thousand sailors, ten thousand marines, and five thousand for land service. The ministry also, in order to prevent the Brest fleet from being victualled with beef and pork from Ireland, where six thousand barrels had been contracted for by their agents, and were ready to be shipped off, gave orders for seizing those stores; and an embargo was laid to prevent any from being exported, which was certainly a very prudent measure, as it retarded the expedition from Brest, and obliged their victuallers to take their provisions out of their merchantmen for the use of their men of war.

Mean while, such was the dispatch made in every part of the marine, that by the middle of April

April we had a noble fleet at Spithead, well manned, and ready to put to sea: nor did they stay there long; for on the twenty-third Edward Boscawen, esq. vice-admiral of the blue, with ten ships of the line and six frigates, having on board six thousand land forces, set sail to attend the motions of the French. But more certain and particular information being brought with regard to the strength of the French fleet, now ready to depart from Brest, which consisted of twenty-one ships of the line, besides frigates and transports, with a great quantity of warlike stores, and four thousand regular troops, under the command of baron Diefkau, admiral Holborne was soon after detached with six ships of the line and one frigate, to reinforce Mr. Boscawen.

On the sixth day of May the French fleet, commanded by Mr. Macnamara, an officer of Irish extraction, sailed from Brest, directing its course for North America; but after having proceeded to a certain latitude, Macnamara returned with nine of the capital ships, while the rest of the squadron continued their course under the direction of M. Bois de la Mothe and M. de Salvert. Macnamara's ships were afterwards victualled for six months, and sailed again in the beginning of June, under the command of M. du Quay, on a cruise near the Straights of Gibraltar, and in such parts of the Atlantic Ocean as might favour the return of La Mothe and Salvert, in case of bad news from America.

The civil transactions of the British session of parliament were limited to very few objects. Several new regulations were made for encouraging and improving the whale and white herring fisheries; and an act passed at the motion of Mr. Pitt, paymaster-general of the forces for the relief of the disabled veterans of Chelsea-hospital, who had long been a prey to the extortion of usurers, from which they were now freed by this act, which ordained, that half a year's pension should be advanced the pensioners half a year before it was due, which effectually crushed the pernicious practice of usury in that department. On the twenty-fifth day of April his majesty put an end to the session with a speech, in which, among other things, he informed them, "That he had religiously adhered to the stipulations of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and made it his care not to injure or offend any power whatsoever; but that he could never entertain the thought of purchasing the name of peace at the expence of suffering encroachments upon, or of yielding up, what justly belonged to Great Britain, either by ancient possession or by solemn treaties: that the vigour and firmness of his parliament, on this important occasion, had enabled him to be prepared for such events as might happen: that if reasonable and honourable terms of accommodation could be procured, he would be satisfied, and in all events rely on the justice of his cause, the effectual support of his people, and the protection of the Divine Providence." The parliament being prorogued, his majesty appointed a regency, and set out for his German dominions, in order to try every prudent measure to obviate the difficulties that might arise in the course of the war from the French against his electoral territories. To cover these from any attacks or insults, and to guard against the effects of a secret treaty which was carrying on between the courts of Vienna and Verfailles, and of which he thought he had some reason to be jealous, his majesty concluded a subsidiary treaty on the eighteenth of June with the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; by which his serene highness engaged to hold in readiness, during four years, a body of eight thousand men for his majesty's service, to be employed, if required, upon the continent, or in Great Britain or Ireland, but not on board the fleets, or beyond the seas. At the same time, his majesty proposed to renew the treaties with Bavaria and Saxony, which those two houses refused, on account of their connections with France. Another treaty was concluded with the empress of Russia, who was, on certain conditions, to furnish fifty-five thousand horse and foot, and fifty galleys.

The French had continued their operations on the banks of the Ohio all the winter with great diligence and activity; and had made such rapid progress in their encroachments, that in the beginning of this year they had advanced with their camps and forts within two hundred and twenty-five miles of Philadelphia. This account filled every lover of his country with the most melancholy forebodings for the safety of America, especially as the colonies still continued quarrelling with their governors, and shewed very little alacrity to join against the common enemy. The nation, however, was somewhat relieved of its anxiety, from the dispatches of admiral Boscawen, who, by letters dated off Louisburg on the twenty-second of June 1755, wherein he informed the ministry, That on the tenth of that month the Alcide, a French man of war of sixty-four guns and four hundred and eighty men, commanded by M. Hiquart; and the Lys, commanded by M. Lageril, pierced for sixty-four guns, but mounted only twenty-two, and having eight companies of land forces on board, being separated from the French squadron, fell in with the English fleet off the Banks of Newfoundland; and that a skirmish happened between the said French men of war and his majesty's ships the Dunkirk and Defiance, in which the Alcide and Lys were taken. The French ship the Dauphin Royal, which had been in company with the two above-mentioned, disappeared in a fog. Mr. Boscawen also informed, that rear-admiral Holborne, with his squadron, joined him on the twenty-first off Louisburg.

By private letters we were further informed, that the two French men of war, taken as above, were sent to Halifax in Nova Scotia; and that, had it not been for the fog, they had been in with the whole French fleet: that captain Howe, in the Dunkirk, coming close with the Alcide, ordered her to strike, and come into the admiral's fleet. The captain of her asked, if it was peace or war? but not receiving a satisfactory answer, he repeated the question, adding, that he should obey no orders but those of his own admiral. Upon which captain Howe, observing a great number of land officers, generously bid them withdraw, as it was not their duty to defend the ship; which he had no sooner done, but he poured in a broadside; and being yard-arm and yard-arm, and his guns double shotted, did terrible execution: and so hot was the fire, that the French officers found it impossible to keep their men to their quarters; so that in about three quarters of an hour she struck. There were about fifty men killed in the Alcide, and about double double the number wounded. In the Dunkirk seven were killed, and about fifteen or sixteen wounded. The Lys was taken by the Defiance and Fougeux, and in both ships six hundred soldiers, with their officers, and fifty thousand crowns.

Although this action was in itself of no great importance, yet it was productive of infinite joy to the English at home, who now saw that the government was determined to keep no farther measures with the French. These latter would gladly have chosen to avoid a war, till they had accomplished their grand scheme of establishing a communication from the Mississippi to Canada by a line of forts; many of which they had already erected, and had destroyed one of ours on the Ohio: but when they received advice of this engagement, they immediately recalled the marquis (now duke) de Mirepoix from London, and monsieur de Buffly from Hanover, where he had but a little time before arrived to attend his Britannic majesty in a public character.

The advice of the success of our fleet in the American seas was followed by a farther agreeable account of the desired effect of an expedition against the French in Nova Scotia, which by his majesty's command had been concerted between general Lawrence and governor Shirley, and was carried into execution with the aid of two thousand New England men. Governor Lawrence, in a letter to sir Thomas Robinson, secretary of state, dated the twenty-eighth of June, at Halifax in Nova Scotia, gave the following account of this expedition, which was published by authority.

"On the sixteenth instant (June) the important fort of Beausejour surrendered to lieutenant-colonel Monckton by capitulation, after four days bombardment, before his majesty's forces had mounted a single cannon upon their batteries, though that fort had twenty-six cannon well mounted; and the next day a small fort on the river Gaspereau, running into the bay Verte, surrendered also. In this latter fort the enemy had their principal magazine for supplying the French inhabitants and the Indians. In these forts were found a great quantity of provisions, with arms and stores of all kinds." The governor then proceeds and says, "At colonel Monckton's first arrival, the French had a large number of inhabitants and Indians, four hundred and fifty of which were posted at a blockhouse which they had on their side of the river Massagash, to defend the pass of that river. Here they had thrown up a strong breast-work of timber for covering their men, and had cannon mounted on the blockhouse. At this place they made a stand for about an hour, but were forced by our troops with some loss, leaving their blockhouse and the pass of the river clear for our people, who marched without further interruption to the ground intended for their encampment. As we had not men enough to invest the fort entirely, several got away; and when the fort surrendered, there remained one hundred and fifty regulars, and about three hundred inhabitants, several of whom, with their officers, were wounded. We do not yet exactly know the numbers that were killed in the fort, but we believe their loss has not been trifling, as several lay half buried upon the parade. Colonel Monckton has new-named the fort, and called it Fort Cumberland. He gives the troops under his command great praise for their good behaviour, and the spirit and resolution with which they acted upon this occasion."

By this means colonel Monckton disarmed fifteen thousand rebel neutrals, or Acadians and Indians; and in the mean time captain Rous, of the Seahorse, being ordered with two frigates more to attack the fort the French had lately erected at the mouth of St. John's river, the enemy abandoned it at his appearance, having bursted their cannon, blown up their magazines, and all the works they had raised, as much as time would permit them to do.

We had not, however, long rejoiced in the success of the foregoing expedition, before a sad disaster happened to our troops in that part of the world, which more than balanced the advantages gained by colonel Monckton and his brave New England men, and threw our American affairs into the utmost confusion.

The men of war and transports under the command of commodore Keppel, destined to carry over general Braddock with his troops to America, that had sailed from Ireland in the beginning of January this year, arrived safe at Virginia in April; when the general, having landed his men, immediately held a consultation with the governors of that and the neighbouring colonies, in order to demand of them all the assistance they could give in furtherance of his projected operations. In this convention, after much debating, it was agreed, that for the preservation of Oswego, and reduction of Niagara, Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments should march to the lake Ontario, and Mr. Shirley was charged with the execution of that part of the service. General Braddock, for his part, undertook the reduction of Fort du Quesne, a French fortress on the river Monongahela, which runs into the Ohio; and general Johnson was ordered to invest Crown Point with the provincial troops. These resolutions and plans were certainly very judiciously concerted; but how far they answered in the execution of each will be seen by the following account.

On the twelfth of June, 1755, general Braddock set out with two thousand regular troops, passed the Allegany mountains, and was within five days march of Du Quesne, when sir John Sinclair, having advanced to take a view of that fort, and to consider the adjacent ground, remarked a small eminence that was within cannon-shot; and the fort being built of wood, and garrisoned with one thousand men, it was proposed to erect a battery on the eminence, and set fire to the place, by throwing into it a great number of red-hot balls.

The general, however, met with a great many difficulties and obstacles in his way: he was detained at Willis' Creek, and greatly distressed by the want of forage and provisions. Landing the troops in Virginia was said to be an unfortunate error, as neither forage, provisions, nor any carriages, were to be had there; whereas, had they landed in Pennsylvania, it would have saved forty thousand pounds sterling, and shortened their march six weeks. He was, however, promised one hundred and fifty waggons and three hundred horses, with a large supply of forage and provisions, to be furnished from the back settlements of Pennsylvania: but after a tedious and anxious expectancy pectancy of these succours, he received, instead of one hundred and fifty waggons, only fifteen; and instead of three hundred horses, only one hundred. This disappointment, however great, was much aggravated when the waggons were unloaded; for the provisions stunk so intolerably as to prevent any possible use being made of them.

While the general was in this distress, he received an unexpected supply of five hundred pounds in provisions and wine from Philadelphia, sent him by the hands of Mr. Franklin. The Pennsylvanians also advanced him a farther sum, and sent one hundred and ninety waggons, loaded each with a ton of corn and oats, four waggons with provisions and wine for the officers, and sixty head of fine cattle for the army. Having received these supplies, the general advanced with his army, and all the stores and provisions, to the Little Meadows, about twenty miles beyond Fort Cumberland, where colonel Washington had been defeated the preceding year. Here he found it necessary to leave the greatest part of his waggons, &c. under the care of colonel Dunbar, with a detachment of eight hundred men, ordering him to follow as fast as the nature of the service would admit. The general having by this means lessened the line of march, proceeded with great expedition, his corps then consisting of about twelve hundred men, together with the necessary ammunition, stores, and provisions. On July 8, he encamped within ten miles of Fort du Quesne.

In the mean time, the French who were posted at this fort, and consisted of one thousand regulars and six hundred irregulars, and a considerable number of Indians in their interest, having gained very particular intelligence of general Braddock's designs, the number and condition of his forces, and the route they were to take, no sooner found that he was advancing, after having received his last supply of provisions, than they also advanced to meet him: and having made choice of a very advantageous piece of ground, about six miles south of the fort, they formed a camp, and entrenched themselves in a very masterly manner, having a thick wood on each side of them, which extended along the route which they knew the English general must take.

Major-general Braddock was undoubtedly a man of courage and resolution; but he was haughty, positive, and difficult of access; qualities ill suited to the tempers of the people among whom he was to command. He was now near sixty miles a-head of colonel Dunbar; and his officers, particularly sir Peter Halket, earnestly besought him to proceed with circumspection, and to employ the friendly Indians in his army by way of advanced guard, in case of an ambuscade, for which that country was so well adapted. But, as if courage alone was sufficient to ensure success in all military enterprises, the general paid no regard to this seasonable advice: he resumed his march the next day (July 9) without so much as endeavouring to procure the least intelligence of the situation and disposition of the enemy, or even taking the necessary precautions to send out scouts to visit the roads and thickets, which lay on both sides of him as well as in his front.

With this supine negligence did he advance within about three miles of the enemy's intrenchments, when they drew out of their lines; placing their irregulars in front as a forlorn hope, and fifteen hundred regulars behind to support them: they also stationed a great number of their Indians in the wood, who effectually concealed themselves behind the bushes and thickets. About noon general Braddock appeared with his troops, when he was saluted with a general discharge upon his front, and all along his left flank: upon which he gave orders to push forwards, as the enemy were in sight, though not within musket-shot; and as soon as they came near enough, the attack was begun by colonels Gage and Burton.

The Indians immediately gave the war whoop; and rising from their ambush in the thickets, discovered themselves on both sides, flanking our men in volleys, among whom they did incredible execution. The advanced guard being now between three fires, immediately gave way; but being rallied with much difficulty by the officers, they gave one fire, and then retreated in the utmost confusion, and threw Dunbar's regiment, which was behind them, into great disorder; they were with unspeakable difficulty once more rallied by the officers, many of whom were killed as they were using their endeavours to inspirit their men, who did indeed stand one more fire from the enemy, but without returning it. The general, who exerted himself as much as man could do, after having five horses killed under him, was shot through the arms and lungs, of which he died the fourth day. As soon as he dropped, both regiments fled with the utmost terror and precipitation, deserting their officers, who, though alone, kept their ground till, of sixty, five only remained who were not either killed or wounded. The provincials, who composed the rear, still stood unbroken, and continued the engagement on very unequal terms for near three hours, but were then compelled to retire. To their noble stand, however, was principally owing the safety of the regulars, who would otherwise have been all cut off in their flight.

The loss of the English in this unfortunate action amounted to seven hundred men, besides the baggage, artillery, &c. The officers suffered most in proportion, the Indians having constantly marked them out to fire at. Sir Peter Halket fell at the first fire at the head of his regiment, and the general's secretary and two of his aids de camp soon after shared the same fate. Colonel Dunbar having collected the shattered remains of his army at Fort Cumberland, continued there till the beginning of August, and then departed with his forces, except two independent companies which he left in garrison, and went to the frontiers of Pennsylvania, from whence the troops were ordered away to Albany in New York by general Shirley, who upon the death of general Braddock succeeded to the chief command of the troops in America.

Colonel Dunbar was greatly blamed for not continuing at Fort Cumberland and fortifying himself there, which he might easily have done; and would then have been such a check, during the rest of the summer, upon the French and their scalping Indians, as would have prevented many of those dreadful barbarities that were committed, in the sequel, upon the now defenceless western borderers of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland; who, notwithstanding the imminent danger with which they were threatened, suffered the spirit of opposition to their governors to get the better of their reason, and so divided their councils, that they could be brought to no effectual resolutions for the public safety. These disputes prevailed chiefly in Pennsylvania, the richest of these three provinces, between the assembly and the governor; and as they were of vast detriment to that and the neighbouring colonies in America at the time they subsisted, I shall here give a cursory view of them, and in what manner they subsided.

The subjects of these disputes were various; but the principal one was that about taxing the estates of the proprietors in common with those of the inhabitants. The assembly prepared a bill in August for raising sixty thousand pounds on the present emergency, in which the proprietary estates were to be taxed with the rest. The governor pleaded an exemption for those estates, and the particular orders he had to refuse any bill with such a clause. The assembly and the governor were both positive, the one in pressing, the other in refusing to pass the bill so circumstanced. Many angry messages passed between them; and their animosities rose to such a height, that all public business was at a stand; nor could any money be raised, or soldiers levied, for the defence of the country, as there was no money in the treasury to pay them.

In the midst of these debates many hundreds of the back settlers came down in a body to demand that relief to which, by the laws both of God and nature, they had a manifest and undoubted right. These unhappy and deserted people went first to the governor, who told them what he had done to gain from the assembly that relief which they solicited, shewing them at the same time an order from the proprietaries for five thousand pounds as a free gift, to be laid out in defence of the province. They then went to the assembly, who were so moved by their distress and importunity, that dropping all their disputes, they next day (the nineteenth of November) sent up a bill, granting sixty thousand pounds, on the same terms the governor would have passed it the August before. They also passed a militia bill (which had been long in vain solicited of them) by which those who could bear arms might be formed into regular bodies subject to discipline, and rendered more able to serve their country, and be a greater terror to their enemies.

Our colonies to the north of Pennsylvania were more unanimous, and more diligent in their warlike preparations. The assembly of New York in particular voted forty-five thousand pounds for the better defence of their country, which lay more open than any other to a French invasion from Crown Point. With this supply, and the help of the eastern colonies, it was resolved to adopt offensive measures, and to undertake the two expeditions; one against the French fort at Crown Point, the other against Niagara, between the lakes Ontario and Erie, as had been before concerted with the late general Braddock.

The execution of the first of these was committed to the care of colonel (afterwards general) Johnson, a native of Ireland, who had long resided upon the Mohock river in the western parts of New York, where he not only acquired a considerable estate, but was also beloved both by the inhabitants and the native Indians, whose language he had learnt, and had gained their affections by his faithful and humane behaviour towards them. General Shirley took upon himself the direction of the expedition against Niagara.

The troops destined for both these enterprizes were appointed to assemble at Albany, where most of them arrived before the end of June; but the artillery, battoes, provisions, and other necessities for the attempt upon Crown Point, could not be got ready till the eighth of August, when general Johnson set out with them from Albany for the Carrying-place at Lake George (otherwise Lake Sacrament) where the troops had already arrived under the command of major-general Lyman, and amounted to between five and six thousand, besides Indians raised by the governments of Boston, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and New York.

Every thing was now prepared for the march as soon as possible; and towards the latter end of the month general Johnson advanced with his troops about fourteen miles forward, and encamped in a very strong situation. Here he proposed to wait the arrival of his battoes, and afterwards to proceed to Ticonderoga, at the other end of Lake George, and from thence to Crown Point, which is a fort at the south end of the Lake Corlaer or Champlain. The French call it Fort Frederic.

Whilst the general remained in the above situation, he received advice from some Indian scouts that the enemy, to the number of two thousand, commanded by the baron de Dieskau, were on their march from Ticonderoga, by way of the South Bay, towards another of our fortified camps, since called Fort Edward, built and garrisoned with upwards of four hundred of the New Hampshire and New York men, by general Lyman, at the Carrying-place. General Johnson hereupon gave notice to colonel Blanchard the commander, with orders to call in all his out-parties, and to keep his whole force within the entrenchments. Early the next morning, September 8, it was determined in a council of war, to march one thousand men, with a number of Indians, in order to intercept the enemy in their return, either as victors, or defeated in their attempt. According to this resolution, colonel Williams began his march about eight o'clock in the morning, with one thousand men and two hundred Indians. This detachment in about an hour and an half were beat back by the French, and the general immediately hauled up some heavy cannon to a breast-work of trees that had been thrown up round the encampment, and made the best disposition he could to receive the enemy.

It seems that M. de Dieskau, the French general, trusting to the information of some deserters from general Johnson's camp, that it was in want of cannon, and in a defenceless state, was prevailed upon by the common voice of his troops, when he was within four miles and an half of Fort Edward (the first object of his expedition) to proceed to the attack of the English camp. Though this alteration in the enemy's route saved Fort Edward, it had like to have proved the destruction of the whole detachment under colonel Williams, who in his march fell into the very mouths of the French. However, the colonel behaved with great gallantry and prudence, and at length effected a retreat to the camp.

About half an hour after eleven the enemy appeared in sight, marching in very regular order directly directly for our center, when, without any apparent reason, instead of attacking the breast-work directly, they halted about one hundred and fifty yards from the camp, where their regular troops made their grand and center attack, the Canadians and Indians in their service dispersing themselves on our flanks. The enemy fired in platoons, but did no great execution, being at too great a distance, and our men defended by the breast-work. In the mean time our artillery, which was admirably well served by captain Eyre, began to play, and quickly dispersed the Indians and Canadians on our flanks, who fled for shelter to the adjacent woods.

The engagement soon after became general on both sides. The French regulars kept their ground and order for some time with great resolution and good conduct; but the warm and constant fire from our artillery and troops put them in some disorder. Their fire became more scattered, unequal, and faint: they made several attempts to penetrate our breast-work, first on the left and then on the right, but all in vain. At length, our men and the Indians observing the enemy's fire to grow continually weaker, and at very considerable intervals, without waiting for orders from general Johnson, jumped over their breast-work, attacked the enemy on all sides, killed between seven and eight hundred, took 30 prisoners, whilst the rest fled with the utmost precipitation. Amongst their prisoners was the baron Dieskau, the French general of all the regular forces lately arrived from Europe. The whole engagement and pursuit ended about seven o'clock.

Our greatest loss, according to general Johnson, in his letter to governor Wentworth, fell upon the party commanded by colonel Williams in the morning, in which we lost two hundred men killed. The enemy endeavoured to surround the detachment; but the officers, to save the troops, retreated and formed with the rest in the main battle of the day. Colonel Williams, major Ashley, six captains, and many subalterns, with forty Indians who fought like lions, and the brave old Kendric, the Mohawk Sachem, or chief captain, were slain. In the camp the loss was very small; and no person of distinction fell but colonel Titcomb, who was killed. General Johnson and major Nichols were wounded. The French general, the baron de Dieskau, was wounded in his leg and through both his hips. He was a man in years, an experienced officer, and a person of high consideration in France. He brought three thousand one hundred and seventy-one regular troops under his command to Quebec, in the fleet with admiral de la Mothe. These troops were partly in garrison at Crown Point, and encamped at the advantageous places leading to it. The loss of the French in their engagement with us amounted to near one thousand men. Their major-general was killed, and the greater part of their chief officers.

In a short time general Johnson recovered so well of his wound as to walk about and regulate his army, in order to pursue the advantage he had gained over the enemy, by attacking Crown Point. This was the general expectation of the country: but whether he was not properly assisted by the provinces, or seconded as he expected by governor Shirley, or could not get sufficient supplies for the intended expedition against Crown Point, we are at too great a distance to be perfectly informed, though perhaps all these reasons might concur in obliging him to delay his farther progress. This is certain, that his army stood in great want of provisions, as might be made appear by letters both from him and other officers in his army. A resolution was therefore taken to defer the attempt till the next year, and to return to Albany with the whole army: but although the expedition had failed in its main object, the conduct of general Johnson was so well approved of here, that his majesty was pleased to create him a baronet, and the parliament gratified him with a present of five thousand pounds.

Governor Shirley, who had taken upon him the expedition against Niagara, had not the good fortune to meet with the same approbation. The preparations for his expedition were not only deficient, but extremely slow; insomuch, that although his success was manifestly to depend upon his beginning his operations early in the spring, instead of that, it was the end of July before he was ready to set out for Albany; and being also obliged to wait for provisions by the way, it was the twenty-sixth of September before he was in readiness to cross the Lake Ontario. In this interval a great number of Indians who accompanied him from Albany returned home; and the few that remained with him declared that it was impossible to cross the lake at that season, or at any time before the following summer. All his measures being thus disconcerted, Mr. Shirley, after employing his troops for some time in building barracks, and beginning to erect two new forts, returned with the greatest part of the troops under his command to Albany, leaving colonel Mercer with a garrison of about seven hundred men at Oswego. A misunderstanding likewise arose between him and sir William Johnson, which was carried to such a height that nothing could extinguish their animosities but the interposition of royal authority; by which Shirley was recalled from his government, and obliged to return to England to answer for such parts of his conduct as should be judged exceptionable.

In the mean time the French, exasperated at their late defeat under the baron de Dieskau, set no bounds to their rage; and, in conjunction with their savage Indians, redoubled their fury against our defenceless planters; and wherever we had no forts or garrisons to defend our people, there these monsters made their ravages and committed their barbarities, butchering men, women, and children, and whole families, in the most cruel manner; though it must be allowed, that by the victory at Lake George some of the Indian tribes were attached more firmly to us, particularly the Cherokees, a nation bordering on South Carolina, who concluded a treaty with the governor of that province in the course of this year.

Having taken this view of the proceedings of our governors of the several provinces of America to drive the French from their encroachments there, let us now return to England to behold the vigorous measures pursued by the government, in resentment of the perfidious dealings of the French in regard to this nation.

The unprovoked hostilities committed by them in America so exasperated the nation, that our ministry thought it a justice due to the honour of his majesty's crown and kingdom, to repay the French in their own coin: and while they least suspected any thing of the kind, to strike such a blow as would deprive them at once of the means to mann their fleets. Accordingly, in the month of September a resolution was taken in council, and the lords of the admiralty were ordered to authorize and command the several captains and commanders in the royal navy, to seize and bring into port all manner of French ships, whether men of war or merchantmen: and, in order more effectually to animate the workmen in the dock-yards to proceed with alacrity in the building and repairing the many ships ordered to be put into commission, his royal highness the duke of Cumberland went this summer to Portsmouth, where he was received with the greatest honours; and lord Anson, with other lords of the admiralty, visited that place, and several other ports in the kingdom, in order to forward the maritime preparations, which were carried on with such diligence and alacrity, that before the end of this year the English navy amounted to one ship of an hundred and ten guns, five of an hundred guns each, thirteen of ninety, eight of eighty, five of seventy-four, twenty-nine of seventy, four of sixty-six, one of sixty-four, thirty-three of sixty, three of fifty-four, twenty-eight of fifty, four of forty-four, thirty-five of forty, and forty-two of twenty; four sloops of war of fourteen guns each, two of sixteen, eleven of fourteen, thirteen of twelve, and one of ten; besides a great number of bomb-ketches, fire-ships, and tenders; a force sufficient to oppose the united maritime strength of all the powers in Europe: whilst that of the French, even at the end of this year, and including the ships then upon the stocks, consisted only of six ships of eighty guns, twenty-one of seventy-four, one of seventy-two, four of seventy, thirty-one of sixty-four, two of sixty, six of fifty, and thirty-two frigates.

Mean while, in consequence of the orders for reprisals, our cruizers exerted themselves so effectually, that before the close of the year they had taken three hundred of the French merchant ships, and about eight thousand of their sailors. By these captures the French found themselves on a sudden deprived of a great body of seamen, and a very large property in trade; the with-holding of which distressed their people, and ruined many of their merchants. The outward-bound merchant ships were insured at the rate of thirty, and their homeward-bound at the rate of fifty per cent. while the English paid no more than the common insurance. This intolerable burden was severely felt by all ranks of people. Amongst them their ministry was publicly reviled even by their parliaments; and the French name, not long since the terror of Europe, was now become its contempt. But this violent proceeding, without a formal declaration of war on the part of Great Britain, was loudly impeached of injustice by the French court, and not greatly approved by many candid and thinking people at home.

However, to keep up the spirit of the nation, and conciliate the affections of the people, a resolution was taken to employ those admirals who had rendered themselves so popular by their courage and success towards the conclusion of the late war. Accordingly, sir Edward Hawke was sent with eighteen sail of men of war on a cruize to the westward, to wait for the French fleet under the command of M. du Guay, who had put into Cadiz, and was expected shortly to return to Brest. Sir Edward, however, missed of the French fleet, which got safe into that harbour on the third day of September; upon advice whereof he was called home. In the October following another fleet of twenty-two ships of the line, besides frigates and sloops, was sent upon another cruize under admiral Byng, with a view, as was said, to intercept the squadron commanded by La Mothe, in its return from America, after landing M. de Dieskau with his troops there: but this fleet likewise returned to Spithead about the latter end of November, without having been able to effect any thing, to the no small disgust of the nation. Commodore Frankland was sent this summer with a squadron to the West Indies.

As to our affairs in the East Indies, the ministry had in the preceding year dispatched rear-admiral Watson and rear-admiral Pocock with a squadron of capital ships, and colonel Aldercorn's regiment on board, to support our interests beyond the Line, which was no sooner known to the court of France, who dreaded the consequences of a war with the English on that trading coast, and were besides grown jealous of Dupleix's aiming to raise himself to the dignity of an independent eastern prince, and to establish his government at their expence, than they resolved to clear themselves of this powerful commander, and to establish a good harmony between the two companies in that part of the world: with this view they dispatched M. Godeheu, with a commission of commissary-general and governor-general of all their settlements, with instructions to supersede M. Dupleix in his government, and to do his endeavours to conclude a pacific treaty with the governor of Madras, and with the other English settlements on the coast of Coromandel. M. Godeheu executed his commission with dexterity and honour. His proposals were highly acceptable to the English; and on the twenty-sixth of December, 1754, articles of a provisional treaty, and articles and stipulations of a truce were signed between governor Saunders, president for the honourable East India company on the coast of Coromandel, and the sieur de Godeheu, his most Christian majesty's commissary. But this gentleman returning home soon after, M. de Leyrit his successor acted in such a manner as to convince the English that the tranquillity was not founded on so solid a basis as they expected; for early in this year (1755) it appeared that the French, in direct contravention to the provisional treaty, were endeavouring to acquire the dominion of all the Decan, or province of the hither peninsula of India. They also took possession of the fort of Golconda; and Leyrit supported the Polygor of Vellore, the strongest fort of the province, against his sovereign the nabob Mahommed Ally Khan, our ally, threatening, by a letter to the governor of Madras, and by marching three hundred French and as many seapoys from Pondicherry, to oppose the English employed by the nabob to collect his revenues from the tributary princes that held under him. Our fleet under Watson and Pocock was then sailed upon an expedition to reduce the strong places of the famous pirate Angria, on the Malabar coast, from whence he had for many years infested our trade in the East Indies, and greatly endangered both our navigation tion and that of the Dutch, and other European nations, to that part of the world.

I shall now resume the account of the state of affairs in Europe. The French court, as soon as they heard of admiral Boscawen's taking their two men of war, complained loudly at the court of Madrid of this transaction as a most unjustifiable proceeding, which threatened a dissolution of all faith amongst nations. This produced a spirited memorial from sir Benjamin Keene, our minister at that court, importing, that it was well known that the French fleet carried troops, ammunition, and every thing necessary for defending the countries which the French had unjustly seized in America, and of which the English claimed the property: that the rules of self-defence authorise every nation to defeat any attempt that may tend to its prejudice: that this right had been made use of only in taking the two French men of war: and that the distinction of place might be interpreted in favour of the English, seeing the two ships were taken on the coasts of the countries where the contest arose.

The disposition or the policy of the Spanish court happened to be such at this time, that they turned a deaf ear to all the remonstrances of France, and gave our sovereign the strongest assurances of its friendship, and of its intention to concern itself no farther in the differences between him and his most Christian majesty than as a mediator, if required, to accommodate matters. The French, however, still kept up an appearance of moderation: and although our cruizers continued to distress their trade, not only in the seas of America, but also in those of Europe, by taking every ship they could meet with; yet the politic adversary, to have a fair pretext to represent England as the aggressor, were so far from retorting these hostile proceedings, that their ministry, hearing that one of their ships of war had taken the Blandford, of twenty guns, with Mr. Littleton on board, going to his government of Carolina, and carried her into Nants, ordered the governor to be immediately set at liberty, and shortly after released both the ship and crew: but notwithstanding this shew of moderation, and that they were soliciting every court in Europe to interpose their mediation to prevail with his Britannic majesty to compromise the differences between France and England; yet they did not neglect the necessary preparations for war, but used double diligence in getting their squadrons ready for sea, lined their coasts opposite to England with troops, and prepared several flat-bottomed boats at Calais, Dunkirk, and several other ports, as if they really designed an invasion of England. They also made sure of our old ally the empress-queen, by means of the count d'Aubeterre, envoy-extraordinary from their court to that of Vienna, who entered into a secret negociation with the imperial minister, and promised, in the name of his master, that if the empress-queen would second the views of his most Christian majesty, she might command all that was in his power against the king of Prussia, of whom she, at this time, affected to be more than commonly jealous.

In the midst of this hurry his majesty returned from his electorate, which he left on the eighth of September, and he arrived at his palace of Kensington on the fifteenth of the same month.

By this time the public received some intimation of the negociations of France with the empress of Germany: whereupon his Britannic majesty, to put the matter out of all doubt, ordered his minister at the court of Vienna to demand the auxiliaries which he had a right unto by treaties from her Imperial majesty: but that princess not only refused to perform those engagements, under the pretence, that as the contest between us and France was not a casus fœderis, or clause in our alliance with her; but afterwards, when required by England to defend her barrier towns in the Low Countries, she excused herself from the service, under a pretence of her fears from the king of Prussia.

On the thirteenth of November his majesty met his parliament, and opened the session with a speech, in which he informed the lords and commons, "That the most proper measures had been taken to protect our possessions in America, and to recover such parts of them as had been usurped or invaded: that to preserve his people from the calamities of war, as well as to prevent a general flame from being lighted up in Europe, he had always been ready to accept of reasonable and honourable terms of accommodation; but that none such had been offered by France: that he had also confined his views and operations to hinder France from making new encroachments, or supporting those already made; to exert his people's right to a satisfaction for hostilities committed in time of profound peace; and to disappoint such designs as, from various appearances and preparations, there was reason to think had been formed against his kingdoms and dominions: that he believed no impartial power could object to proceedings so absolutely necessary for the defence and security of his people: that his good brother the king of Spain beheld with concern these differences; and the part which he had taken in the common welfare of Europe, made him earnestly wish the preservation of the public tranquillity, and had induced him to give the most solemn assurances of his firm resolution to continue in the same pacific sentiments: that he himself had greatly increased his naval force, and augmented his army in such a manner as might be least burthensome to his subjects: and finally, that he had concluded a treaty with the empress of Russia, and another with the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, which should be submitted to their perusal."

In the house of lords, the duke of Marlborough presented the form of a very long and explicit address of thanks for the approbation of the house, which was seconded by the earl of Marchmont. It occasioned violent debates, and was thought to have been one of the most extraordinary ever presented by that house. It was in substance as follows: "They thank him for his royal firmness, in not yielding to any terms of accommodation with France that were not reasonable and honourable, and for exerting his royal care so powerfully in the protection of his colonies: they acknowledge his majesty's wisdom and goodness in increasing his naval armaments, in augmenting his land forces, with so much regard to the ease of his people, and in generously giving encouragement to that great body of his brave and faithful subjects, with which his American provinces happily abound, to exert their strength on this important occasion: they observe, with pleasure, the pacific declarations of his Catholic majesty; promise their most zealous and vigorous aid and concurrence in this just and national cause, and to assist him in disappointing or repelling all such enterprizes as may be formed not only against his kingdoms, but also against any other of his dominions, although not belonging to the crown of Great Britain, in case they should be attacked on account of the part which his majesty has taken for maintaining the essential interests of his kingdoms."

The terms in which this address was couched gave infinite offence to, and was vehemently combated by, the lords in the opposition, headed by earl Temple, who insisted that in the first part of it the wisdom of the house was prostituted, by engaging to approve of the treaties of Russia and Hesse-Cassel, which they had not seen, and which they apprehended could be of no use to Great Britain: and in the second part, they said the house would be guilty of the greatest indiscretion, by consenting to measures which manifestly engaged this nation in a continental connection, for the defence of Hanover, that could not be supported by Great Britain; and would be so far from being of advantage to us at sea or in America, that it was to be feared it might in the end disable the nation from defending itself in other parts of the world. But the court party, upon putting the question, carried their address by a great majority of voices, and it was accordingly presented, and met with a most gracious answer from his majesty.

The address in the house of commons was replete with the same expressions of zeal, gratitude, and warm assurances to support his majesty. Nay the same, or nearly the same words, relating to the defence of his majesty's foreign dominions, were proposed to be inserted in this address, which was opposed strenuously by several gentlemen in high posts under the government, particularly by Mr. Legge, the chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. William Pitt, pay-master of the forces: but after a long debate, the form was approved by a considerable majority, and the address was presented, which met with a like gracious return from the throne with that of the upper house.

It was somewhat strange to see two persons who held such considerable places under the government, oppose, as they did upon almost every occasion, the secretary of state, who was supposed to know and speak the sentiments of his master: but the truth is, that there was a very strange jumble of parties in both houses; and it soon appeared that the public business could not go on unless another secretary of state was appointed in the room of sir Thomas Robinson, who, though a man of integrity and virtue, and a favourite with his sovereign, was not possessed of talents equal to the duties of his office, especially at so critical a juncture as that in which the nation now found itself. Mr. Pitt and Mr. Henry Fox, secretary at war, though they scarce ever agreed in any other point, united in opposing his measures; and their interest was so great in the house, and their abilities so universally acknowledged, though of very different kinds, that they were always sure of forming a party sufficient to clog the wheels of government, when matters went contrary to their inclinations. Mr. Pitt had, besides the advantage of his high post under the government, the additional weight of having in both houses many able men who were his friends or relations, particularly Mr. Legge, chancellor of the Exchequer, above-mentioned, the earl Temple, and the Grenville family, and almost all of them enjoying places under the government likewise. Sir Thomas himself therefore very wisely and dutifully resolved to take off some part of the opposition; and of his own accord, the very second day of the session, resigned the seals of secretary of state into his royal master's hands, who delivered them to Mr. Fox. About the same time Mr. Legge, disgusted with the new system of foreign measures, threw up his post of chancellor of the Exchequer, which was conferred on sir George Lyttleton, and lord Barrington succeeded Mr. Fox as secretary at war. Mr. Pitt was soon after dismissed from his employment, and the earl of Darlington and Mr. Hay appointed joint paymasters-general in his stead. Earl Gower was made keeper of the privy-seal, and the duke of Marlborough master-general of the ordnance. This was called the ministry with Mr. Fox at the head; but few of them were consulted in the administration of the more important affairs.

When the treaties with Russia and Hesse-Cassel came to be considered in the house of commons, some of the members proposed referring them to the examination of a committee; but this motion was rejected, in consideration of his majesty's having contracted them with a view to avert the storm that threatened his electoral dominions, on account of our quarrel with the French. The new ministry also, in order to reconcile the nation the better to these treaties, took advantage of the march of a large body of French troops down to their coasts, to insinuate, that the subsidiary troops might soon be found necessary to be brought over hither for the defence of our island against the French invasion. In fine, the question being put upon each of these treaties, they were approved by a majority of three hundred and eighteen against one hundred and twenty-six in the lower house, and by eighty-four against eleven in the upper. After this the commons proceeded to adjust the supplies for the ensuing year, when they voted fifty thousand seamen, including nine thousand one hundred and thirty-eight marines, together with two millions six hundred thousand pounds for their maintenance, and thirty-four thousand two hundred and sixty-three land forces, with 930,600 l. for their support. One hundred thousand pounds were voted as a subsidy to the empress of Russia, fifty-four thousand one hundred and forty pounds to the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel*, and ten thousand pounds to the elector of Bavaria.

* In the course of this year the protestant interest received a severe blow, by the defection of prince Frederic of Hesse-Cassel (son to this landgrave, and son-in-law to his Britannic majesty, whose daughter, the princess Mary, he had espoused) who on the seventh of March abjured the protestant faith, and turned Roman catholic: whereupon the king of Great Britain and the States-general, at the requisition of the old landgrave and the states of Hesse-Cassel, guaranteed the protestant religion and succession in that landgraviate.

I must here stop to commemorate a most awful event which happened in this month of November, and proved fatal to many places, occasioned by an almost universal convulsion throughout the known world, which was far from being unnoticed even in these kingdoms, where the waters in many places were agitated in a most surprising manner: but in Spain and Portugal the greatest mischief was sustained by this tremendous earthquake; and the proud city of Lisbon, capital of Portugal, was almost totally destroyed, with near seventy thousand inhabitants of all countries, though happily not above ten or twelve English were amongst the number. This fortunate circumstance, with respect to those of our nation, seems to have been owing to the day on which this fearful visitation happened, viz. the first of November, which is the festival of All-Saints, and is appointed at Lisbon for the celebration of the Auto da Fé*; and as in that day insults are frequently offered to protestants if met in the streets, most of the gentlemen of the English factory go the night before to their country houses, and do not return till the next day, when every thing is quiet. To this unhappy bigotry, which brings many of the country inhabitants to Lisbon to see the shew, the great loss of the Portuguese, and the preservation of the English, may therefore be reasonably attributed: but though the English were thus safe in their persons, almost all the houses they occupied were destroyed by the dreadful conflagration which accompanied the earthquake; and the greater part saved nothing but a little cash and some of their books.

When this dreadful convulsion began, which was between nine and ten in the morning, the weather was serene, and the sky without a cloud in it. The two first and most dreadful shocks continued for the space of a quarter of an hour; after which the water of the river Tagus, which runs along by the city, rose perpendicularly above twenty feet, and subsided to its natural bed again in less than a minute. It is agreed on all hands, that the fire which succeeded the earthquake was the principal cause of the total ruin of the city. It was occasioned by the vast quantities of fires lighted on that particular day on the altars of every church, chapel, and in every convent and private house; and many villains also confessed, on their executions for pillaging the ruins, that they had set fire to many places in the city to facilitate their depredations. The waverings of the earth were from east to west, which is the course of the Tagus from Lisbon to the ocean; the whole bed of which river is in all probability altered; for the principal quay of the city, built extremely strong of marble, cramped with irons, and jointed, sunk at once fifty fathoms below the surface of the water. The earth opened in abundance of other places in the kingdom, as at Alcantara, Sacavem, and Setuval, or St. Ubes: out of some of the chasms issued water, from others a sulphureous vapour, and from others proceeded nothing but air. Of three hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, which Lisbon was supposed to contain at the time of the earthquake, about seven thousand (some accounts made them nearer ten thousand) perished by this calamity, and the survivors, deprived of their habitations, and destitute even of the necessaries of life, were obliged to seek for shelter in the open fields.

His majesty had no sooner received intelligence of this melancholy event from his minister at the court of Madrid, than he sent a message to the house of lords, acquainting them with the same, and desiring their concurrence and assistance in relieving the unhappy sufferers. To which the lords returned a dutiful address, expressing their just sense of his majesty's royal concern for the great misfortune that had befallen the kingdom of Portugal, and for his generous compassion of the unhappy sufferers; and assuring his majesty of their hearty concurrence and assistance in sending such speedy and effectual relief as might be suitable to so afflicting and pressing an exigency. Accordingly the parliament, to the honour of British humanity, soon after voted a gift of one hundred thousand pounds; and likewise sent twenty thousand barrels of rice, a great quantity of corn and flour, and a large cargo of beef from Ireland, and many other necessaries for the relief of the distressed people of Portugal, to be at the disposal of his Portuguese majesty; who was so sensibly affected with this instance of British generosity, that, as a proof of his gratitude, he ordered M. de Castres, the English resident at his court, to give the preference in those supplies to the British subjects who had suffered by the earthquake. Accordingly, about a thirtieth part of the provisions, and two thousand pounds in money, were set apart for that purpose; and his Portuguese majesty returned his thanks in the warmest terms to the British crown and nation.

About this time the Esperance man of war, of eighty guns, belonging to the French, sailing from Rochefort to Brest to be completely manned, was taken with three hundred men on board, by the Orford, of seventy guns, captain Stevens, after three hours engagement, and brought by him into Plymouth. In short, matters were come to such a length between us and France, that it was daily expected war would be declared either by the one side or the other. The French court, however, did not chuse to do it first, for fear they should drive their own people, already oppressed almost beyond human sufferance, into mutiny and rebellion: and we had our reasons for not being the first to proclaim war, lest we might be deemed the aggressors, and consequently have given our allies a pretence to refuse their succours, in case they should be demanded in the course of the war. On these or the like principles both courts seemed to act. At last the French bethought themselves of an expedient to oblige our ministry to give such an eclaircissement concerning their intentions as should amount to a precise declaration, which was, by ordering Mr. Rouillé, secretary of state for foreign affairs in France, to write the following letter or memorial to Mr. Fox, secretary of state to his Britannic majesty.

* Or, Act of Faith, in which the convicts of the inquisition go in procession through the city; and frequently protestants and others are burnt alive by the sentence of this infernal tribunal.

"S I R,

"By order of the king my master, I have the honour to send you the following memorial, &c.

"The king is able to demonstrate to the whole universe, by authentic proofs, that it is not owing to his majesty that the differences relating to America have not been amicably accommodated.

"The king being most sincerely desirous to maintain the public peace, and a good understanding with his Britannic majesty, carried on the negotiation relative to that subject with the most unreserved confidence and good faith.

"The assurances of the king of Great Britain's disposition to peace, which his Britannic majesty and his ministry were constantly repeating, both by word of mouth and in writing, were so formal and precise, that the king could not, without reproaching himself, entertain the least suspicion of the sincerity of the court of London's intentions.

"It is scarce possible to conceive how these assurances can be reconciled with the orders for hostilities given in November 1754, to general Braddock, and in April 1755 to admiral Boscawen.

"The attack and capture, in July last, of two of the king's ships in the open seas, and without a declaration of war, was a public insult to his majesty's flag; and his majesty would have manifested his just resentment of such an irregular and violent proceeding, if he could have imagined that admiral Boscawen acted by the orders of his court.

"For the same reason the king suspended at first his judgment of the piracies that have been committed for several months, by the English men of war, on the navigation and commerce of his majesty's subjects, in contempt of the law of nations, and the regard they reciprocally owe to each other.

"The sentiments of his Britannic majesty gave the king room to expect, that at his return to London he would disavow the conduct of his admirals and naval officers, and give his majesty a satisfaction proportioned to the injury and the damage.

"But seeing that the king of England, instead of punishing the robberies committed by the English navy, on the contrary encourages them, by demanding from his subjects fresh supplies against France; his majesty would fall short in what he owes to his own glory, the dignity of his crown, and the defence of his people, if he deferred any longer the demanding of a signal reparation for the outrage done to the French flag, and the damage done to the king's subjects.

"His majesty therefore thinks proper to apply directly to his Britannic majesty, and to demand from him immediate and full restitution of all the French ships, as well men of war as merchant men, which, contrary to all law and all decorum, have been taken by the English navy, and of all the officers, soldiers, mariners, guns, stores, merchandizes, and in general of every thing belonging to these vessels.

"The king will always chuse to owe to the king of England's equity, rather than to any thing else, that satisfaction which he hath a right to demand; and all the powers in Europe will undoubtedly see in this step which he hath determined to take, a new and striking proof of that invariable love of peace which directs all his counsels and resolutions.

"If his Britannic majesty orders restitution of the vessels in question, the king will be disposed to enter into a negotiation for that farther satisfaction which is legally due to him, and will continue desirous, as he hath always been, to have the discussions relating to America, determined by an equitable and solid accommodation.

"But if, contrary to all hopes, the king of England refuse what the king demands, his majesty will regard this denial of justice as the most authentic declaration of war, and as a formed design in the court of London to disturb the peace of Europe."

Verfailles, Dec. 21, 1755.

The haughty terms in which this memorial was conceived, and the apparent incongruity of this correspondence between two nations so far engaged in hostilities as Great Britain and France were at this time, would not permit his Britannic majesty to answer this memorial otherwise than by his secretary of state. Mr. Fox therefore, by the royal command, sent to Mr. Rouillé the following answer, dated at Whitehall, January 13, 1756.

"S I R,

"I received on the third instant the letter, dated the twenty-first past, with which your Excellency honoured me, together with the memorial subjoined to it. I immediately laid them before the king my master; and by his command have the honour to inform your Excellency, that his majesty continues desirous of preserving the public tranquillity: but though the king will consent to an equitable and solid accommodation, his majesty cannot grant the demand that is made of immediate and full restitution of all the French vessels, and whatever belongs to them, as the preliminary condition of any negotiation; his majesty having taken no step but what the hostilities begun by France, in a time of profound peace (of which he has the most authentic proofs) and what his majesty owes to his own honour, to the defence of the rights and possessions of his crown, and the security of his kingdoms, rendered just and indispensable.

"I have the honour to be, &c."

At the same time, a refutation was drawn up of the charges brought in the French memorial against the English nation, and was transmitted to the British ambassador at each of the several courts of Europe, in order to be published for the satisfaction of the world, but is too long to be inserted here.

However, in consequence of these memorials and Mr. Fox's answer, the French king's orders were published at Dunkirk, for all British subjects to leave his dominions before the first of March, except such as might obtain his permission to remain. Another edict was published at the same time, inviting the French subjects to fit out privateers, offering a premium of forty livres (about thirty-six shillings English) for every gun, and as much for every man they should take from the enemy; and promising, that in case a peace should be speedily concluded, the king would purchase all the said privateers at prime cost. Pursuant to the above orders, the English vessels in the several ports of France were seized, and their crews sent to prison.

The fortifications at Dunkirk had already begun to be repaired, and a great number of artificers and seamen were employed in equipping a formidable squadron at Brest; and a strong body of forces were collected, as well as a considerable number of transports, in order to infuse into the people of this kingdom a belief of an intended invasion. It has been too much the foible of this nation to be terrified with every motion our neighbours the French make on the coast of the Channel. They took us therefore on our weak side: nor did they forget on this occasion to play off their old scarecrow the pretender against us; for in an article from Paris in the public papers of the beginning of September, we were told that the chevalier de St. George's eldest son had been two months in that city; that he had seen the king and the ministry, and had offered to hazard his person again to second the resentments of that court. It was added, that an embarkation was talked of for Scotland. This and a thousand other vague reports of the like nature, were the pure effects of French policy, to confound our intelligence, and keep us upon a wrong scent till they should be ready to strike the grand blow they really meditated, the reduction of Minorca; of which more in its place.

Our ministry, however, appear to have been so prepossessed with the belief that the French intended an invasion of these kingdoms, that when the parliament reassembled after Christmas recess, lord Barrington, as secretary at war, on the twenty-second day of January 1756, laid before the house an estimate for defraying the charge of ten new regiments of foot, over and above the thirty-four thousand two hundred and sixty-three land soldiers already ordered to be raised; and the sum of ninety-one thousand nine hundred and nineteen pounds ten shillings was voted for this purpose: and upon another estimate presented by the same noble lord, and founded on the same supposed necessity of augmenting the army, the farther sum of forty-nine thousand six hundred and twenty-eight pounds was voted for defraying the charges of eleven troops of light dragoons, and eighty-one thousand one hundred and seventy-eight pounds were voted for the charge of a regiment of foot to be raised in America for the year 1756, two hundred and ninety-eight thousand five hundred and thirty pounds for the maintenance of our forces already established in our American colonies, and seventy-nine thousand nine hundred and fifteen pounds for six regiments of foot from Ireland, to serve in North America and the East Indies. In a word, including several other sums, as well for defraying the expence of the army and navy as for other purposes, the whole of the supplies granted by parliament in this session amounted to seven millions two hundred twenty-nine thousand one hundred and seventeen pounds four shillings and six-pence. For raising this sum, besides the malt-tax and the land-tax at four shillings, the whole produce of the sinking fund, from the fifth of January 1756, until it should amount to one million five hundred fifty-five thousand nine hundred fifty-five pounds eleven shillings, was ordered to be applied, together with a million to be raised by loans on Exchequer bills at three per cent. one million five hundred thousand pounds to be raised by the sale of redeemable annuities at three and a half per cent. and five hundred thousand by a lottery at three per cent.

Sundry very good laws were enacted this session for the better supporting ourselves against the designs of the enemy, and for the encouragement and regulation of British commerce and navigation in general; such as, an act "to enable foreigners to serve as military officers in America;" an act "for supplying mariners on board of ships of war and merchantmen;" an act "for granting bounties on British and Irish linen exported;" an act "for the encouragement of fisheries in Scotland;" an act "for securing and encouraging the trade of his majesty's sugar colonies in America;" an act "for regulating workmens wages employed in the wool-len manufacture;" and an act "for the encouragement of seamen, and the more speedy manning the royal navy."

While the parliament of Great Britain was thus proceeding with the public business, the whole system of affairs in Europe took a new and sudden turn. His Prussian majesty having got intelligence that a secret negociation was carrying on between the courts of Petersburg, Vienna, and Versailles, which had for its object the partition of a part of his dominions; and fearful that if the Russians, taken by the late treaty into the pay of Great Britain, should get footing in Germany, he must be reduced to a very precarious situation; he therefore emitted a public declaration by his ministers in all the courts of Europe, "That he would oppose with his utmost force the entrance of any foreign troops into the empire, under any pretence whatsoever."

This spirited declaration of his Prussian majesty, and the favourable reception which that prince had given the duke de Nivernois, who had been lately sent from France to Berlin to propose a new alliance between the two courts, gave his Britannic majesty the most uneasy apprehensions for his electoral dominions, in case such an alliance should take place: and as nothing but necessity had induced the king to apply for Russian auxiliaries, he thought it most advisable to fall in with the views of his nephew, especially as they had now but one common interest, the preventing of foreign troops being introduced into Germany.

Advances were accordingly made on the part of our court to the king of Prussia, with such advantageous proposals as made him entirely relinquish all thoughts of a further negociation with the Grand Monarch; and a convention was concluded in the month of January between their Britannic and Prussian majesties, importing, "That having maturely considered, that the differences which had lately arisen in America might easily extend much farther, and even reach Europe; having, moreover, always the welfare and safety of Germany, their common country, much at heart; and being extremely desirous to maintain its peace and tranquillity, they had, as the most effectual means of obtaining this salutary end, agreed upon a convention of neutrality, by which they reciprocally bound themselves not to suffer foreign troops, of any nation whatsoever, to enter into Germany or pass through it during the troubles aforesaid, and the consequences that might result from them; but to oppose the same with their utmost might, in order to secure Germany from the calamities of war, defend her fundamental laws and constitutions, and preserve her peace uninterrupted."

The belief of an intended French invasion began now to prevail more and more. It was currently rently reported from the Hague that the troops, to the amount of one hundred and forty battalions, were to be transported in flat-bottomed boats: that M. de Belleisle was to command the expedition, who was already, with the prince de Soubise, making their circuit along the French coast: that eighty thousand men were marching to Dunkirk; and that a large fleet of men of war were actually in Brest road, ready to put to sea, under the command of M. du Perrier. About the same time advices were received, that great preparations had been making at Toulon for some months for the execution of an important expedition; calculated to deprive the British marine of its present opportunities of carrying on hostilities against the French in the Mediterranean. This enterprize was said to be a descent upon the island of Minorca, to be made with twenty-five thousand men, a great train of artillery, and supported by a fleet of eight sail of capital ships; and that the whole would be ready to put to sea by the beginning of April at farthest. The same advice was confirmed by sir Benjamin Keene, our ambassador at the court of Madrid, by sundry well-authenticated letters from the Hague, and at last from the governor of Minorca, general Blakeney, himself, who, in a letter to Mr. Fox, dated February 7, and received March 6, 1756, expresses himself thus: "I cannot be too early in acquainting you, sir, that by different informations from France and Spain, there is great reason to believe the French intend very shortly to make an attack upon this island. In consequence, I have called a council of war; and we were unanimously of opinion, that considering who these informations came from, and the reports every-where about, which seemed to tally with them, this island ought with the greatest speed to be put in the best state of defence it can."

All these informations, however, were totally disregarded by our ministry, who still affected to interpret all the motions of the French, in every part of their kingdom, to be destined either against the British isles, our plantations in America, or against Hanover; and they prevailed on his majesty to send a message to the house of lords on the twenty-third of March, signifying, "That he had received repeated advices from different places and persons, that a design had been formed by the French court to make an hostile invasion upon Great Britain or Ireland; and that the great preparations of land forces, ships, artillery, and warlike stores, then notoriously making in the ports of France opposite to the British coasts, left little room to doubt of the reality of such a design: that he had not only augmented his forces by sea and land to put his kingdom in a posture of defence; but that he had also, in order farther to strengthen himself, ordered transports to bring over hither a body of Hessian troops; and doubted not that he should be supported by his parliament in all such further measures as should be conducive to an end so essential to the honour of the crown, the preservation of the protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of these kingdoms."

It must, I am persuaded, give the reader some surprize, not to find the least notice taken in this message of the advices concerning the hostile preparations in the south of France for invading Minorca, or of any measures taken or intended by the ministry for its defence. This message was indeed pretty severely animadverted upon by several members of both houses, who violently opposed the bringing such a disgrace upon this nation as the transporting hither a body of foreign mercenaries to defend her and fight her battles. However, the ministerial influence prevailed; and both houses presented their addresses, expressing their indignation at so daring an attempt as the invasion of these kingdoms; and assuring his majesty that they would with unshaken zeal, vigour, and unanimity, stand by him against all his enemies, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes.

The ministry did not stop here; for in a very few days after Mr. Fox made a motion in the lower house, that an address should be presented to his majesty, beseeching him, that for the more effectual defence of this island against the threatened attack by a foreign enemy, he would be graciously pleased to order twelve battalions of his electoral troops, together with the usual detachment of artillery, to be immediately brought into this kingdom. This motion was agreed to by the majority, the address presented, his majesty's compliance obtained, and such expedition was used, that in the course of the next month both Hanoverians and Hessians arrived in England, and were distributed in camps in different parts of the kingdom. Un-speakable, however, was the indignation which the greater part of the nation expressed against the ministry, who, by neglecting the establishment of a regular militia (for which a bill had been prepared and offered by the honourable Charles Townshend in the course of this session, but rejected) had reduced Great Britain to so low an ebb of distress, as to oblige her to have recourse for safety and protection to the assistance of foreign auxiliaries. The rabble, who are ever in extremes, were inflamed to such a degree of animosity against these foreigners, that nothing could have restrained them from violent acts of outrage but the exemplary modest and inoffensive conduct by which the Germans, as well private men as officers, distinguished themselves.

While these measures were pursuing to guard against the impending danger, colonel Yorke, our ambassador in Holland, had orders to demand of the States-general the six thousand troops which, by treaty, they were obliged to furnish to England, when attacked or threatened by any of her enemies. Accordingly, on the thirteenth of February, he delivered a memorial for that purpose, but too long to have a place here. M. d'Affry, the French ambassador, presented to their High Mightinesses a counter-memorial, in which he insisted, that the English had no right to claim the assistance of their allies, as they were incontestably the aggressors; and desired their High Mightinesses would explain themselves categorically on the part they intended to take in the present dispute. The States-general, in answer to this demand, observed, that considering their situation, the bad state of their finances, and the decay of their commerce, nothing could be more agreeable to them than a neutrality, which they were determined to preserve until obliged to depart from it by good faith, and the religion of inviolable engagements they lay under by treaties to several powers. This answer was by no means satisfactory to the court of Versailles; and therefore M. d'Affry was ordered to desire their High Mightinesses to explain themselves with greater greater precision, intimating, that although his most Christian majesty desired not to multiply the calamities of war, yet he could no longer reckon among the number of his friends those powers who, far from fulfilling the defensive engagements they have contracted with him, would make a common cause with, and furnish succours to, his enemies.

Mean while, the English transports arrived in the Maese, and Mr. Yorke continued to insist on the embarkation of the six thousand men demanded. The States upon this were prodigiously embarrassed. They saw themselves reduced to this unavoidable dilemma: if the republic granted the succours demanded, she would thereby declare France the aggressor; if she refused them, then the French would gain their point, and the court of England be disobliged, which might prove of as bad consequence on the other side, with regard to their commerce. While their High Mightinesses were in this perplexity, his Britannic majesty foreseeing that, should they comply with his demands, they would expose themselves to the resentment of the French king, which they were in no condition to oppose; and probably willing, at the same time, to obviate the affront of a refusal, generously released them from their obligation, and consented to their neutrality.

By this time the British court were convinced, that the French squadron which had been so long preparing at Toulon, was designed for the reduction of Minorca: upon certain intelligence of which, they seemed to rouse as from a deep lethargy. Hitherto, by a most shameful neglect, they had been so far from supplying that important garrison with a proper reinforcement, that they had not even sent thither the officers belonging to it, who, to a considerable number, were in England upon leave of absence; nor were any directions given for the transporting of them until the French armament was ready to make a descent upon the island. And now, like persons suddenly awakened from a sound sleep, they did every thing with hurry, precipitation, and confusion. The notion of an invasion had taken such deep hold of their minds, that even at this critical juncture, when it so much behoved us to send a squadron which in all respects should be superior to the French fleet in the Mediterranean, they declared they could spare only ten ships; and even these were but in a very indifferent condition, and unprovided with either hospital or store-ships. They alleged afterwards, indeed, in their excuse, that they had been informed that the French would not be able to equip at Toulon above six or eight ships of the line, otherwise they should have made the squadron stronger.

The command of this important service was given to admiral George Byng. He was son of sir George Byng, afterwards viscount Torrington, one of the best seamen England ever produced; and the admiral himself had long experience in the navy. His abilities were unquestionable, and he had risen to the rank he then held without any reproach. Mr. West, a gentleman universally respected for his knowledge, ability, and resolution, and lately made an admiral, was sent with him as second in command. The orders Mr. Byng received, previous to his sailing, sufficiently discover how ignorant our ministry were of the force or destination of the Toulon squadron: for the admiral was therein directed, among other things, to endeavour to learn, on his arrival at Gibraltar, whether any French squadron had passed through the Streights; and that, being certified in the affirmative, as it was probably intended for North America, he should immediately detach rear-admiral West to Louisbourg or the island of Cape Breton, with such a number of ships as, when reinforced by those at Halifax, might constitute a force superior to that of the enemy.

On the seventh day of April the two admirals sailed from Spithead for the Mediterranean with the ten following ships; the Ramillies (admiral Byng's own ship) of ninety guns; the Buckingham (on board of which Mr. West had his flag) of seventy; the Culloden, of seventy-four; the Trident, Captain, Lancaster, Revenge, Intrepid, Defiance, and Kingston, from sixty to sixty-six guns each, having on board a regiment of soldiers to be landed at Gibraltar, with major-general Stuart, the lord Effingham, and colonel Cornwallis, whose regiments were in garrison at Minorca, about forty inferior officers, and near one hundred recruits, as a reinforcement to St. Philip's fortress. Admiral Byng, after a tedious voyage, occasioned by calms and contrary winds, did not arrive at Gibraltar till the second of May. There he found captain Edgcumbe, with the Princess Louisa, a sixty gun ship, and a sloop; and from his account soon perceived that things wore a very different aspect from that which had been given them in England: for Mr. Edgcumbe, who had, by a fortunate neglect of the French, escaped out of the harbour of Mahon with three ships while they were landing on the other side, informed the admiral, that instead of six or eight ships of the line, which it was pretended were the most the enemy could send to sea from Toulon, their squadron from that port really consisted of 12 ships, from sixty-four to eighty-four guns; four frigates, from twenty-four to twenty-six; besides sloops, and five bomb-vessels, under the command of M. de la Galissoniere, with a great number of transports, carrying a body of fifteen thousand land forces, which had sailed from Toulon the tenth day of April, just three days after Mr. Byng sailed from St. Helen's; and that his armament had already got possession of all Minorca, except St. Philip's castle. The difference in the real state, as well as the aspect of things, will in some measure account for part of that conduct for which admiral Byng was severely treated afterwards.

But before I proceed to relate the particulars of this unhappy expedition, I shall just take notice, that on the twenty-seventh of May his majesty put an end to the session of parliament in England with a speech, in which he thanked his parliament for the vigorous and effectual support they had given him; and acquainted them, that the injuries and hostilities which had been for some time committed by the French against his dominions and subjects, were then followed by the actual invasion of Minorca, though guarantied to him by all the great powers of Europe, and particularly by the French king: that he therefore found himself obliged, in vindication of the honour of his crown, and of the rights of his people, to declare war in form against France: that he relied on the Divine Protection, and

and the vigorous assistance of his faithful subjects, in so just a cause.

Admiral Byng having, on his arrival at Gibraltar, received the above information of the enemy's operations and strength on the island of Minorca and its coast, so very different from what he had been made to expect, issued orders, on the very day of his arrival, for all the ships of his squadron to complete their provisions and water with the utmost expedition. On the third the admiral went on shore, to communicate to the governor of Gibraltar his orders relative to a battalion of troops to be sent on board his fleet from the garrison, in order to reinforce the castle of St. Philip's. Major-general Fowke, the governor of Gibraltar, had also received instructions upon this head from the secretary at war, in three different letters: but either from some obscurity in those orders, or imagining that by sending away such a detachment he should too much weaken his own garrison, he did not think proper to part with any of his troops to the admiral, who thereupon sailed without them on the eighth of May, with thirteen ships of the line and three frigates, including commodore Edgcumbe's small squadron that he had found at Gibraltar, and some cruizers that joined him while there.

It has been already intimated, that the French fleet sailed from Toulon on the tenth of April with twelve sail of ships of the line, besides frigates and other armed vessels and transports, carrying fifteen thousand men, under the orders of the marshal duke de Richelieu, who was to command in chief by land on this expedition, while the count de la Galissoniere with his fleet was to prevent any succours being thrown into the fort from seaward, and to give battle to the fleet sent from England for its relief. On the eighteenth of April this armament arrived before Ciudadella, a castle situate in a port at the west end of the island of Minorca, about thirty miles from Port Mahon, where the troops were landed without the least opposition from the English, who had evacuated that place on the first appearance of the enemy, as altogether untenable against such a force.

Major-general Blakeney, governor of Minorca, on certain notice of the approach of the French fleet, took every precaution necessary for the defence of Port Mahon and Fort St. Philip; and as he had but about two thousand five hundred regular troops, he judged it better to collect them all into one body, than to let them be dispersed in small corps to garrison the lesser forts on the island, which he well knew must all submit one after another to the superior force of the enemy. He therefore withdrew them all, and ordered that they should spoil the roads, fell trees, and lay every obstruction in the way by which the French must pass on their march to Mahon, in order to render their access as difficult as possible thereto. At the same time, he directed all the cattle upon the island to be driven within the walls of Fort St. Philip; and his orders were so punctually executed, that after Richelieu had landed his troops and all his cannon, he found the road, which lay the whole length of the island (and no other practicable) so totally ruined, that it was impossible to draw them along. Besides, he was quite unprovided with beasts of draught, having brought none with him, and those upon the island being all secured. Under this disappointment, he was necessitated to reembark his heavy artillery, and send it by sea to Cape Mola, at the entrance of the harbour of Mahon, the place where he intended to erect his batteries.

On the arrival of the French in the island, the governor sent a trumpet with a letter to marshal Richelieu, to demand the reason of this hostile invasion, as there was no declaration of war between the two crowns? To which he received for answer, that the French modelled their behaviour by that of the English, who had taught them a new way of making war without a declaration, by taking two of the king's ships in America the preceding year, and still continuing to make prizes of several of the French merchant ships, sailing in security upon the ocean under the faith of treaties.

The French marshal met with so many obstacles in forming the siege of Fort St. Philip, that he could not open the trenches before the night between the tenth and eleventh of May, which was upwards of three weeks from his landing. The reason of this slow progress appears to have arisen from the vanity of the French ministry, or that of their general, who had neglected to provide such a number of engineers as the service afterwards required, imagining that the bare sight of the French army would strike terror into the handful of men immured with their governor in Fort St. Philip. The marshal had erected his batteries first at Cape Mola, at such a distance on the other side of the harbour, that they could do no execution. He was therefore necessitated to change his plan of attack, and to make his approaches on the side of St. Philip's town. Having planted his new batteries, and invested the place, Richelieu sent his compliments to general Blakeney, offering him his own terms if he would capitulate. The brave general returned his compliments, and said, it would be time enough to talk of that when they should be near enough to shake hands together; and immediately ordered his standard to be fixed on the most conspicuous part of the castle, and to be nailed as fast as possible, declaring it should not be taken down while he and five men remained alive. But we must suspend for the present our account of the farther progress of this memorable siege, till we have related the success of admiral Byng's expedition for its relief.

Mr. Byng, before he left Gibraltar, transmitted to the lords of the admiralty an account of the situation in which he had found affairs in the Mediterranean; and in his letter made use of some impolitic expressions, which were afterwards exaggerated, and construed to his ruin. This letter consisted of two parts; the former contained a positive impeachment of the ministry, for their not sending a fleet to the assistance of Minorca sooner; for (as he expresses himself) had he arrived at that island before the French had landed, he should in all probability have been able to have prevented their getting footing there. He complains of having been sent out from England not fully provided; and that when he arrived at Gibraltar, the place was wholly unprovided with magazines for supplying the necessities of his fleet: that the careening wharfs and storehouses had been suffered to run to decay and ruin, although this was the only place for the king's ships to careen at, and to be supplied with necessaries, when Mahon was invested. The latter part does as good as tell them, that they had sent him upon an impracticable service; and that if it miscarried, as in all probability it would, it must be laid to their charge, who had not sent a land force sufficient to raise the siege, as well as a fleet that was inferior to the enemy's.

Few ministers can bear to be schooled by their officers, whom they have in general been accustomed to consider as mere tools of the state, to do its business without presuming to judge of the propriety or impropriety of the service they may be ordered upon, or the counsels that have planned it. It must be supposed then, that Mr. Byng's letter to the admiralty was by no means pleasing to those at the helm. It was some time before they could rightly determine what they should do with it; suppress it altogether they could not; and the publishing it, they feared, would set their conduct in a very arraignable light. However, as they saw that Minorca must fall, they endeavoured to shift the blame upon Byng alone, for which purpose he himself had furnished ample matter in his letter, where he very impolitically declared, that he thought the success of his expedition very doubtful. This was interpreted, and industriously propagated, as a certain prognostic that Mr. Byng had no desire to fight or hazard any thing to relieve Fort St. Philip. As the populace are ever ready to embrace the invidious side of a report, this construction was universally adopted; and the nation was less surprised than incensed when the news arrived of Mr. Byng's ill success. But to resume his history.

The wind continuing easterly after the English fleet left Gibraltar, it did not arrive on the coast of Minorca till the nineteenth of May, at break of day, when the admiral, about five in the morning, dispatched captain Hervey in the Phoenix, with two other frigates, a-head of his fleet, to take as close a view as possible of the harbour's mouth, and to observe in what place it was practicable to throw any succours into the castle. Captain Hervey was also charged with a letter to general Blakeney, acquainting him that the fleet was arrived to his assistance; and desiring to know, by the return of the officer, what place the general would think proper to have the officers and recruits landed at; as also, in what other manner he could be of most effectual service to the garrison. Captain Hervey had not been dispatched above four hours, and there being only light breezes of wind, was not yet out of sight, when the French squadron appearing in the south-east quarter, the admiral thought it advisable to call in the Phoenix and the other frigates, and then bore away for the enemy, and made the general signal to chase. For want of sufficient wind, however, the line of battle could not be formed so properly as otherwise it might have been. About six in the evening the enemy, to the number of seventeen ships, thirteen of which appeared to be very large, advanced in order, but tacked at seven, in order to gain the weather-gage. Mr. Byng, in order to preserve that advantage, as well as to make sure of the land-wind, in the morning tacked also, being then about four leagues off Cape Mola.

The twentieth in the morning, the weather proving hazy, the enemy's fleet was not to be seen at day-break; but about noon it came in sight, and each side prepared for action. The line of battle being formed on both sides, and our fleet being ranged opposite to that of the French, the admiral made the signal for engaging: upon which the van under rear-admiral West bore down; and closing upon the enemy, attacked them with such fury, that the five headmost ships of the enemy which were opposed to him broke their line, and ran away to leeward, out of gun-shot. Had the van been properly seconded, there seems the greatest probability that the British fleet would have gained a complete victory, and Minorca would have been relieved: but the reverse happened; and the conduct of Mr. Byng on this occasion, though perhaps not so very bad as his enemies endeavoured to represent it, was still very exceptionable, and such as furnished matter for his subsequent ruin; for though he had under him a fine ninety gun ship, through a too rigid observance of discipline, or else through timidity, he forbore to bear down with his division to the support of the van; and the enemy's center keeping their station, rear-admiral West could not improve his advantage, without exposing himself to the danger of seeing his communication with the rest of the line entirely cut off. In the beginning of the action the Intrepid, in Mr. Byng's division, suffered so much in her rigging and hull that she could not be managed, and drove on the ship that was next in position: upon which the admiral made the signal for his division to throw all a-back, in order to avoid confusion; by which the rear was still farther separated from the van, and retarded from closing with and engaging the enemy. Mr. Byng also, when pressed by the captain of his own ship to bear down, declared that he would not act but with his line entire; and was never properly engaged, though he received some few shots in his hull. This hesitation of his, though proceeding from a care of his majesty's ships, and, as he declared, to avoid the error Matthews had fallen into in the Mediterranean fight, by breaking the line of battle, and exposing his own and other ships of his fleet to a fire they could not sustain, was certainly ill timed, and gave the French admiral, who was very desirous to put an end to the engagement, an opportunity to edge away with an easy sail to join his van, which had been defeated, and made the best of its way off; and though, towards the end of the action, when the French were manifestly flying, the admiral bore down with his division, yet the French ships, which were quite clean, were soon out of reach of ours, which were very foul, and altogether unfit for the pursuit of so nimble an enemy.

The English fleet continued four days on the place of battle, to repair their damaged ships and make them fit for action, in case the French should think proper to renew their attack: but no enemy appearing, a council of war was held to consult on the measures most proper to be pursued, when it was unanimously resolved, that as they had not land forces on board sufficient for the relief of Fort St. Philip; and as the French fleet might possibly be failed to Gibraltar to attack that important fortress, it was more expedient to return thither to prevent the execution of such a design, than to stay where they were sure it was out of their power to assist the garrison at Minorca. This resolution was likewise taken in an unfortunate hour; for if they had remained on their station but one day longer, they might have intercepted a large convoy of provisions and heavy artillery which Richelieu had sent for from from France, and without which, in all probability, he would never have been able to reduce the place.

The admiral was about a month in his passage back to Gibraltar, where he found commodore Broderick, who had been sent from England with five ships of the line to reinforce him; and it was intended, after having supplied the fleet with proper necessaries, to go and face the enemy once more: but before the admiral was ready for sailing, the Antelope, a fifty gun ship, arrived in the bay, with sir Edward Hawke, admiral Saunders, and several navy captains; also the earl of Panmure and lord Tyrawley. The two admirals had orders to supersede, to put under arrest, and to send home the admirals Byng and West, and several other officers of the fleet; and lord Tyrawley had the like orders in regard to general Fowke, and those land officers who had signed the council of war for returning with the fleet to Gibraltar. Admiral Hawke obeyed his orders, and on the ninth of July sent the state prisoners on board the Antelope, who brought them home to England, where we shall leave them to their destiny, and return to the siege of Fort St. Philip.

On the twelfth day of May, about eight at night, the enemy opened two bomb batteries, with which they began to play against the castle; and from this time to the fourteenth an incessant fire was kept up on both sides from mortar and cannon, the French continuing to erect new batteries in every situation whence they could annoy the enemy. On the nineteenth of this month the garrison were elated with joy at the sight of the British squadron; and Mr. Boyd, commissary of the stores, ventured to pass in a small bark with six oars from St. Stephen's Cave, through a shower of cannon and musket-balls, into the open sea, in order, if possible, to get on board the squadron, to give Mr. Byng intelligence of affairs in the island; but was obliged to return, on being chased by two of the enemy's tartans, and got safe back by the same route he had passed. Short-lived was the joy with which the sight of our fleet had inspired the brave, but unfortunate garrison; for, to their inexpressible surprise and disappointment, in two days after they beheld the French squadron return quietly to their station off Cape Mola, and no English ships were to be seen. This, added to a general discharge or feu de joye in the French camp, persuaded them that Mr. Byng had been worsted, and obliged to retire, by the French fleet under La Galissoniere.

Discouraging as such an event must have been to people under the circumstances of the besieged, it in no wise damped their courage and vigour, which rather increased with their labour and danger. By this time they were invested with an army of twenty thousand men, and pried incessantly from sixty-two battering cannon, twenty-one mortars, and four howitzers, besides the small arms which fired upon them continually from the windows of the houses in the town of St. Philip. Nevertheless, the loss of men within the fortrefs was very inconsiderable, the garrison being mostly secured in the subterranean works, which were impenetrable to shells or shot. From the seventh of June to the fourteenth the fire from the fort was weak; but on the fifteenth the besieged made a greater fire on the enemy than ever they had done since the siege began, so that they were obliged to draw back. In short, they managed their cannon and ammunition so judiciously, that they fired none till they were sure, and seemed to let the French erect their batteries only to have the pleasure of demolishing them. The French miners likewise desisted from their attempts of undermining the works, the difficulty of piercing the rock having at length subdued their patience, and frustrated their hopes of success in this point. The garrison, however, by this time were reduced to two thousand five hundred men, while, on the contrary, the enemy's army, which had been constantly reinforced by troops, ammunition, &c. was stronger than at the beginning of the siege; and the duke de Richelieu, fearing that the prolongation of the siege so far beyond the time his court was taught to expect being masters of Minorca, might give his enemies a handle to lessen his abilities in his sovereign's esteem, thought he had nothing left but to push matters with the utmost vigour; and having, by dint of an unremitting fire, made a practicable breach in one of the ravelins, and demolished most of the strong forts and defences round the place, on the twenty-seventh day of June it was resolved to try the effects of a general assault that very night. Every thing being disposed for this purpose, the artillery continued to batter the forts till ten o'clock in the evening, when ceasing all on a sudden, one cannon-shot, and four bombs thrown into the castle, announced the signal for beginning the assault. The enemy advanced with great intrepidity, and their commander the duke de Richelieu is said to have led them up to the works in person.

The besieged behaved like heroes, disputing the ground inch by inch. The assailants were mowed down as they approached with grape-shot and musquetry, and several mines were sprung with great effect, so that the glacis was almost covered with the dead and wounded. The French nevertheless persevered in the attack with uncommon resolution; and though repulsed on every other side, at length made a lodgment on the Queen's Redoubt, which had been greatly damaged by their cannon. Anstruther's Redoubt was also taken by assault, and the Argyll Redoubt by escalade. Lieutenant colonel Jefferies, the second in command, and indeed the principal acting man in the fort, was suddenly surrounded and made prisoner, as he was hurrying with a hundred men to the relief of the redoubts. Major Cunningham also, who had particularly distinguished himself during the siege by his courage, skill, and activity, though he had the good fortune to preserve his liberty, was so much wounded that he was not able to continue on duty.

Thus the governor was deprived of his two principal assistants, one being taken, and the other disabled. However, the enemy might have been perhaps dislodged from the posts they had seized, had a vigorous effort been made for that purpose, before they had leisure to secure themselves; but Richelieu, like a true Frenchman, had recourse to stratagem to effect what he could not accomplish by force, and ordered a parley to be beat, in order to obtain permission to bury the dead and relieve the wounded, which lay in heaps about the place of action. This was impolitically granted; and the use the enemy made of this humane indulgence was to secure the lodgments they had made, by introducing into them a considerable number of troops, through a subterranean passage which had been opened by a shell, and not discovered by the besieged till the day cleared up; and then it was too late to dispute the possession with the successful enemy, who by this passage had now opened to them a communication with all the other subterranean places, and by them with all the out-works. Upon this discovery the governor, while the cessation of hostilities yet continued, summoned a council of war, who having duly considered the impracticability of maintaining a fortress of such an extent by such a thin garrison, against such numerous forces, in possession of such advantageous posts, and the little prospect there was of receiving any assistance from the English fleet; and the officers of the artillery all declaring that the works were in a shattered ruinous condition, and irreparable in the present state of the garrison, the majority, upon all these considerations, declared for a capitulation, as the only means to preserve the remains of so brave a garrison, and the lives of a considerable number of his majesty's subjects. This resolution being taken, the chamade was beat; a conference ensued, and very honourable conditions were granted to the garrison, in which a very high encomium was paid to the bravery of the governor; marshal Richelieu declaring therein, that he had been induced, by the noble defence made by the governor and the garrison, to grant them such generous terms, which intitled them to march out with all the honours of war, and to be conveyed by sea to Gibraltar. The articles of capitulation being signed, and the hostages given, the French were put in possession of the gate, as well as two of the forts; but the garrison remained in the other works till the seventh day of July, when they embarked.

Thus ended this famous siege, which will ever stand in the records of history as a perpetual monument of British bravery and British negligence: for, had the garrison been properly reinforced in time, or had a sufficiently powerful fleet been sent out at first with Mr. Byng, there is great probability the French would never have been masters of it.

Immediately after the execution of the articles of capitulation, M. de la Galiffoniere sailed back to Toulon, and in a lucky hour he made his retreat; for in a few days after the surrender of the fort, sir Edward Hawke's fleet, amounting to twenty-three ships of the line, made its appearance off the island: but Galiffoniere was gone, and the British admiral had the mortification to see the French colours flying upon St. Philip's castle. But although thus disappointed in his hopes of encountering the enemy's fleet and relieving our own garrison, he at least asserted the empire of Great Britain in the Mediterranean, by annoying the commerce of the enemy, and blocking up their squadron in the harbour of Toulon. Having continued for some time on this service, he returned with the homeward-bound fleet to Gibraltar, from whence, about the latter end of the year, he set sail for England with part of his squadron, leaving the rest to protect our trade in those seas, which suffered greatly from the French privateers, which now began to swarm there. General Blakeney did not go to Gibraltar with the first division of the garrison, that he might have the more time to rest himself after the incredible fatigue and anguish of mind he had undergone. He arrived in England in the month of November; and tho' it has been generally thought that his merit was, by the partiality of the times, over-rated, in the same proportion that the misconduct of the unhappy Byng was exaggerated; yet his late majesty, who doubtless was perfectly well informed of every part of the attack and defence of Fort St. Philip, looked upon his conduct in so favourable a light, that, among other distinguished marks of his regard and favour, he was pleased to honour him with the dignity of a peer of Ireland, by the title of Lord Blakeney, of Mount Blakeney in the county of Limerick, of which place the general was a native.

I shall now proceed to a concise representation of the operations and transactions of our arms in distant parts of the world; and first, of the state of our affairs in America, which we broke off at the end of the year 1755.

The plantations, during the whole winter, were in the utmost disorder. The savage Indians ranged uncontrouled among the unguarded planters on the exterior parts of the colonies, whom they plundered, murdered, scalped, and used with the most inhuman cruelties. The parties that were sent out against them were often worsted, or fell into their ambushes. The cries and miseries of those who escaped were for some time ineffectual to procure them relief, although the governors of the several colonies were not insensible of the cruel usage of the people, and endeavoured with all their power to apply a remedy. With this view they were, during the winter, very intent in making due preparations for a vigorous campaign in the summer; and yet we shall find the enemy was very little annoyed, or any memorable exploits or expeditions performed by our forces, though numerous enough; nor our back settlements much better secured than they were before, save that a few forts were built, and that the Delawar and Shawanese Indians were pacified, and prevailed upon to lay down the hatchet, with which they had done so much mischief. General Shirley being recalled from his government of Virginia, his majesty was pleased, early in the spring of this year, to appoint John earl of Loudon (a Scots peer) general and governor in chief of that colony, and general and commander in chief of all his forces in North America. We shall leave his lordship in his voyage thither, to take a view of affairs in Nova Scotia, where the enemy met with several rebuffs.

General Lawrence, who had been remarkably successful in his attempts to humble the French, who had made prodigious encroachments on this infant colony, pursued his advantage, and set about extirpating the French neutrals and Indians there, who refused to conform to the laws of Great Britain, or to swear allegiance to king George, and had actually engaged to join, in the spring of this year, the French troops that were expected to arrive from Old France as early as possible, on that coast or at Louisbourg. General Lawrence did not only pursue these dangerous inhabitants with fire and sword, laying the country waste, burning their dwellings, and driving off their stock; but he thought it expedient, for his majesty's service, to transport the French neutrals, so as entirely to extirpate a people that only waited an opportunity to join the enemy. He accordingly distributed about seven thousand of them among the British colonies; in which distribution too many were transported to those colonies where they might, with great ease, get to the French forts on the back of our provinces on the south of the bay of St. Lawrence.

It was in the most rigorous season of the year that these poor wretches were thus transported, without money or effects to help themselves; so that each government into which those neutrals were sent, found itself loaded with a very great expence for their maintenance. This occasioned some very warm altercations between the general and the aggrieved governments, who accused him of having acted in an arbitrary manner, by thus imposing upon them a charge they were so little able to defray. As one expedient to maintain them, therefore, it was proposed to sell them with their own consent; but when this was mentioned to them, they unanimously rejected it with the utmost indignation. They alleged, that they were prisoners, and expected to be maintained as such, and not forced to labour. They said, they had not violated their oath of fidelity which by the treaty of Utrecht they were obliged to take: that they were ready to renew that oath; but that an oath of obedience was required of them, which was a new thing, and by which, they apprehended, they should be obliged to bear arms against the French, which they thought they could not be compelled to do. Thus general Lawrence cleared the country of the French neutrals; and the Indians in their interest, who had been very troublesome, being most of them Roman catholics, retired to Canada for protection, which established peace in Nova Scotia for a time.

The departure of lord Loudon from England was attended with such delays, that before he reached the army in North America (which was in the latter end of July) the marquis de Montcalm, who had been appointed to succeed the baron de Dieskau in the command of the French forces in that country, had time to arrive at Canada from France with three thousand men, and to take the field before us, notwithstanding the navigation of the river St. Lawrence being shut up with ice till the month of May. To this delay was principally owing the capture of Oswego, the key of the Lake Ontario, which was the most disastrous event that could have befallen our American affairs at this juncture. General Abercrombie had been dispatched in the beginning of March this year from England with two regiments, and with orders to supersede general Shirley; but it was so long before he arrived in America, that notwithstanding the preparations which had been made by the provincials under Mr. Shirley to open the campaign early this year, in order to reduce the fort of Niagara, to cover the borders of New York, and to secure the navigation of the Lake Champlain, by the conquest of Ticonderoga and Crown Point, they were obliged to halt at Albany for the arrival of a commander in chief, and of the regular forces from England, till the latter end of June, when general Abercrombie arrived and took the command: but even then, though he approved of Mr. Shirley's plan, yet he thought the season too far advanced to promise success, in so extensive an operation, with what forces he had under his command. He therefore waited the arrival of lord Loudon; and by that determination this year was lost, and the French left to strengthen their posts, and to distress our settlements unmolested.

Nor did they fail to improve the opportunity; they formed a camp at Ticonderoga, where, and at Crown Point, they had three thousand troops, and were daily increasing their numbers; and as they were well apprised that the English army could not undertake any expedition till the arrival of lord Loudon, which they knew could not happen till too late in the season for us to attempt Crown Point, or take any measures to prevent their progress, M. Montcalm resolved upon the siege of Oswego.

Oswego is a town of the Iroquois or Five Nations, in Canada, situate on the west side of the Lake Ontario, or Frontenac, three hundred and twenty-one miles west of Albany. Hither the English use to resort, to purchase of the distant Indians their skins and furs. It was a place of the greatest importance to us, not only for intercepting the commerce of the enemy, but also for impeding their hostile movements; and was, moreover, the only place on which we could build vessels for the navigation upon that great lake or inland sea, to preserve our interest and correspondence with the Indians that had not declared against us. Yet, notwithstanding the consequence this place was of to us, and the great advantage the possession of it would give the enemy in all their future operations, it had been so shamefully neglected, that the French might have made themselves masters of it the preceding year, but for some reasons of policy which then withheld them.

No sooner, however, did general Abercrombie receive certain advice that the French had determined upon the siege of this place, and that a large body of them were occupied on the eastern shore of the Lake Ontario, than he ordered a regiment of regulars, under the command of major-general Webb, to march to its relief. In the interim, lord Loudon arrived at Albany on the twenty-third of July; and although he greatly approved of Mr. Abercrombie's orders, yet the people of New England, New York, and the adjacent provinces, who had assembled an army of seven thousand men in order to attack Crown Point, insisted so peremptorily and obstinately on the executing of that measure, previous to all other operations, that altho' they were at last prevailed with to consent to the march of general Webb, the altercation on this matter took up so much time, that it was the middle of August before the regiment could set out from Albany. This period of inactivity on our side gave the enemy such an unlooked-for opportunity to complete their plan, that by the time general Webb got to the Carrying-place, between the Mohawk's River and Wood's Creek, he had the mortification to receive certain advice of the French having made themselves masters of Oswego and of Fort Ontario on the fourteenth of August, in four days after opening the trenches before them; and had made the garrison, and three hundred workmen and sailors employed to defend the passes to these forts, prisoners of war, who were sent to Montreal. The taking of Oswego struck a damp upon all the British colonies, as that was the place of strength they could depend upon to prevent the invasions of the French and Indians into their territories.

Monsieur de Montcalm, after his success at Oswego, took the route to Crown Point, with a design of forcing his way through the New England army, under the command of general Winflow at Fort William-Henry, in which sickness had made great havock, in order to seize on Albany. He knew our forces were much divided, and that general Webb was on his way to Oswego with his regiment. But lord Loudon, apprised of the design of the foe, ordered the several posts that way to be abandoned, and with all the regulars proceeded to support the New England men. He also ordered up the recruits of the Royal American regiment, being upwards of fifteen hundred men, and received a reinforcement from New England, which increased his army to the number of about eleven thousand; so that M. Montcalm could not reap all the advantages he promised himself from the reduction of Oswego. Soon afterwards the army went into winter-quarters.

About the same time that Oswego fell into the hands of the French, Fort Granville, on the Juniata river (one hundred and fifty miles west of Philadelphia) was taken by surprize by the French and Indians, in the absence of the garrison, which had marched out a day or two before on an expedition, having left but twenty-four men in it for its defence.

In the East Indies the British fleet under admiral Watson was employed with success this year, in an expedition against the famous pirate Tulgace Angria, the scourge of those seas, whose territories, from a nest of pirates, was become a sort of empire, subsisting much in the same manner on that coast as the states of Barbary, which sprang from a like original, have made themselves formidable to several of the European powers. His piracies, which had continued for a long time, he now carried to so audacious a length, that it became an interesting concern to humble this common enemy. Accordingly admiral Watson, with four capital ships of war, besides bomb-ketches, and seven or eight of the East India company's ships, sailed in the beginning of March from Bombay to attack Angria in his strong fort of Geriah, who, struck with terror at the appearance of such a formidable fleet, so far beyond his apprehensions, soon surrendered, and gave up his castle, with one hundred and thirty thousand pounds of treasure in it, as also all his fleet, which lay in the harbour, and with which he had for so many years reigned a terror to the maritime powers of Europe frequenting those seas, as well as to his neighbouring states on the Malabar coast.

Our success on this coast, however, was greatly counter-balanced by our losses in other parts of the East Indies. The reader may remember, that we left the French commandants, at the close of the last year, seeking for a pretence for rekindling the war on the coast of Coromandel. Accordingly, Monsieur de Bussy having received a reinforcement of five hundred Europeans under Mr. Law, began the year (1756) by falling upon and making a conquest of Ingeram, Baudermalauka, and Vizigapatam factories, belonging to the English. This having been foreseen, the greatest part of the company's effects were shipped off from the two former places immediately upon the fresh alarm of hostilities; and Vizigapatam being in no condition to withstand an army of ten thousand men, Europeans and Indians, with thirty pieces of cannon, which M. de Bussy brought against it, it surrendered by capitulation. By the capture of this place the French obtained entire possession of the coast, from Ganjam to Masulipatam. Nor did this misfortune come alone; for this same year Calcutta, and all the subordinate settlements or factories of our Indian company in Bengal, were taken and destroyed by Surajah Dowla, a new nabob of that province, who had been spirited up by our enemies to extirpate the English factories within his dominions, under various slight pretences of being treated with disrespect by governor Drake, of a right to certain duties which were refused by the company, and of their having given protection to certain persons who had fled from his tyranny.

About the end of May, 1756, this Surajah Dowla took the field with an army of thirty thousand horse, thirty thousand foot, and between three and four hundred elephants. His first operation was against Cassumbazar, a large town, situate in a very healthy and fruitful island of the Ganges, about one hundred miles above Huguely. He summoned the fort to surrender; but his demand not meeting with a compliance, and expecting a resolute and powerful opposition, the cunning nabob had recourse to stratagem to facilitate his intentions; and by proposing a truce for an amicable determination of the subject of complaint, he inveigled Mr. Watts, the chief of the factory, to his tent, under pretence of a conference, with a safe-conduct, as also two other gentlemen of the council; and having got them in his power, he treated them with the utmost indignity, and hurried them away to Muxadabad, and threatened to put them to death if the factory did not instantly surrender. These menaces had the desired effect: the fort was put into his hands on the fourth of June, the people of which he treated extremely ill, sending them also to Muxadabad, the capital of Bengal, to be confined in different prisons and dungeons.

Flushed with this success, the haughty eastern prince determined to proceed immediately with all his force against our principal settlement of Calcutta; before which place he appeared on the seventeenth of June, having driven the advanced guards from the passes into the fort. Mr. Drake, the governor, who was a quaker, resigned the business of fighting to Mr. Holwell his second; and taking with him all the treasure he could collect from the merchants, and the company's books, he retired with the ladies, and several other persons, on board the ships which laid off in the Ganges. Mr. Holwell resolutely kept within the place, which he declared he would defend to the last extremity, though the party that fled on board had carried one hundred soldiers from the garrison with them. The attack of the enemy, however, was so brisk, and their numbers so infinitely superior, that resistance seemed a madness; and the second day Mr. Holwell would gladly have made an honourable and safe retreat on board the ships; for for which purpose he intended to have demanded a capitulation: but the ships were now fallen several miles below the fort, and no boat was left in which the besieged could attempt an escape. This the nabob knew, and therefore would not hearken to any terms for the surrender of the place, the gates of which were opened to him on the evening of the nineteenth, when the Moors rushing in, killed all whom they first met with, stripped the rest naked, and, by their brutal sovereign's order, crammed one hundred and forty-six into a dungeon, called the Black-hole, only eighteen feet square, and with but two windows in it, where one hundred and twenty-three of them died before morning, being smothered by the excessive heat. Mr. Holwell was in the number of those who survived, and with his companions was sent prisoner to Muxadabad, with circumstances of such inhuman treatment as would be too shocking to repeat. After some time, however, they were released, as was likewise Mr. Watts, and the rest of the gentlemen who had been carried by the tyrant from Calcutta to the ground; and wrote to the governor of Madras, that no English subject should for the future presume to settle within his territory of Bengal.

Let us hence return to take a survey of the transactions in Europe.

The two nations of England and France had hitherto been committing hostilities upon one another without any formal declaration of war, the French fleet in America, and the English afterwards by way of reprisals in the open seas: but the English ministry finding many inconveniencies attending this method of proceeding, advised his majesty to declare war, without any further delay, which was done accordingly on the eighteenth of May, in the usual form. This was answered by a like declaration of the French court, dated at Versailles, June 9; either of which would take up too much room to insert here.

It was generally hoped that the war, thus kindled between France and England, would have been confined to the two nations at variance: but ambition knows no bounds. France no sooner understood that a treaty was concluded between his Britannic majesty and the king of Prussia, than she struck up an alliance with empress-queen of Hungary, under the name of a treaty of friendship and neutrality, by which the contracting parties reciprocally obliged themselves to the guaranty of all their dominions in Europe, and to furnish each other with eighteen thousand foot and six thousand horse, or with a proportionable sum of money, in case of any attack from any power whatever. To this treaty the neighbouring powers were invited to accede, with the most solemn assurances that the contracting parties had no other view than to preserve the general tranquillity of Europe. But an alliance between the houses of Bourbon and Austria was deemed so unnatural, and their interests so incompatible, that notwithstanding these pacific declarations, it was easy to see that France could have no other view in it than to prevent the Prussian monarch from defeating any attempt that she might be inclined to make against his Britannic majesty's electoral dominions. As to the queen of Hungary, she had long regretted the loss of Silesia, and only waited a convenient opportunity to dispossess the king of Prussia of this province. For this purpose, as I have elsewhere observed, she had entered into a secret treaty with the empress of Russia ever since the conclusion of the peace in 1748, whereby the latter engaged to assist her Hungarian majesty with one hundred thousand men, whenever required; who for the same reason gladly laid hold of this opportunity, by striking up an alliance with France, of increasing her forces by succours from that court, not doubting that, by such powerful assistance, she should be enabled not only to recover Silesia, but even to strip the king of Prussia of part of his dominions. The king of Poland, elector of Saxony, is said to have been likewise partly concerned in the same scheme, for which he severely suffered in the sequel.

His Prussian majesty foresaw the storm that threatened him. It is even said, that early in the spring of this year he received certain intelligence that the two imperial powers intended to unite their forces in order to attack his dominions: he therefore determined to use every method in his power to prevent it. In what manner he effected this will soon appear in the course of this history. At present, the domestic affairs of Great Britain demand some portion of our attention.

It has been already mentioned that admiral Byng, on his arrival at Gibraltar, was superseded in his command by sir Edward Hawke, and sent home prisoner; as was also his second in command rear-admiral West, several of the captains of the fleet, and general Fowke, with some of the land officers belonging to the garrison of Gibraltar. The prisoners all arrived on the third day of July at Portsmouth, where Mr. Byng was immediately put under arrest, and soon afterwards conveyed to Greenwich, and committed to the custody of the governor of the hospital, by whom he was kept strictly confined till the time of his trial by a court-martial, which was delayed by the absence of many evidences in the Mediterranean, required both in his favour and against him. Admiral West and lieutenant-general Fowke were ordered up to London, where the admiral met with a most gracious reception from his royal master; but general Fowke was ordered to take his trial for disobeying his majesty's orders, transmitted to him by the secretary of war, relating to the embarkation of a battalion of troops to be sent in the fleet with Mr. Byng to reinforce Fort St. Philip.

The court-martial commissioned to try the general consisted of two generals, eleven lieutenant-generals, and three major-generals, general sir Robert Rich being president. Mr. Fowke, in his defence against the above charge, urged, that his orders were not absolute, but discretionary; and that the execution of them was left to his and Mr. Byng's discernment and judgment, for which he particularly referred to a letter from the secretary of war to him, as commander in chief of Gibraltar; the whole tenor of which imported a discretionary power remaining in him as to the execution of those orders. He moreover defended the steps he had taken in withholding the forces, by shewing, that if he had made the detachment of a battalion, and put it on board the fleet, he should not then have had much more than two reliefs of men (so wretchedly was this important garrison garrison provided with defence) and this at a time when there was the greatest reason to believe that the place was in danger of being attacked. Notwithstanding this defence, and that the three letters from the secretary at war produced in court appeared to contain instructions that were very confused, at least, if not contradictory, his judges found him guilty of the charge; and he was sentenced to be suspended for the space of one year; a sentence which was not only confirmed by his majesty, but also accompanied with a dismissal from his service: nor was he restored during the course of this reign, though his case was generally thought to have been very hard.

In respect to the unhappy admiral Byng, no method had been left untried to inflame the nation to a degree of frenzy against him, by representing him as the sole cause of the disgrace in the Mediterranean, and the loss of Minorca; the importance of which (however little it seems to have claimed the attention of our ministry in the beginning) was now represented in the most striking colours. Admiral Byng had, before his return to Gibraltar, dispatched a letter to the admiralty, containing the particulars of the action off Minorca, and of the resolutions of the council of war he had summoned. This letter, however, was not made public till some days after sir Edward Hawke was sent out to supersede him; and even then it was curtailed, and mutilated in an extraordinary manner, several passages being suppressed which tended to his own justification, or contained any reflection upon the negligence or inattention of the ministry. This proceeding was certainly very unfair. Accordingly, the admiral's friends did not fail to publish his letter entire, with some remarks not very favourable to those who had thus garbled it.

His adversaries, however, had got the populace on their side; and there was not a species of libelling, in prose or verse, that was not exhausted to render him odious. They ridiculed and refuted the reasons he had given for returning to Gibraltar after his shameful rencounter with the French squadron: they inveighed against his insolence, his folly, his cowardice, and his misconduct: they even stuck not at making royalty itself an instrument of their artifice, by insinuating that his majesty had prognosticated Byng would not fight, from the contents of his first letter from Gibraltar. In a word, they exerted themselves so strenuously in maintaining and increasing the popular delusion, that no notice was taken of the misconduct of the ministry, while Byng was pointed out as the object of universal detestation. Addresses upon addresses were transmitted from all parts of the kingdom to the throne, particularly from the city of London, calling aloud for an examination into the cause of the infamy that had befallen the British arms by sea, and of the loss of the important island of Minorca, which by its situation drew to Great Britain the respect of Spain, the confidence of Italy, and the submission of the piratical states of Barbary.

His majesty, ever attentive to his faithful subjects, commanded an immediate examination into the causes of the loss of Minorca. We have already seen the punishment inflicted on Mr. Fowke; and now the whole magazine of political arts having been exhausted to fix the charge of cowardice, treachery, and treason, against the devoted admiral, he was at length ordered to prepare for his trial; the place appointed for which was on board his majesty's ship the St. George, in Portsmouth harbour; and the court was composed of four admirals and nine captains, whose names the reader will find at the foot of the page*. They sat thirty one days, Sundays excepted, (viz. from the twenty-eighth of December to the twenty-seventh of January) examining witnesses, and hearing the prisoner's defence. As this trial is in almost every one's hands, it would be needless to enter into a minute detail of particulars. Let it suffice then to say, that the court, upon summing up the evidence, were of opinion, "That admiral Byng did not do his utmost to relieve St. Philip's Castle, in the island of Minorca, then besieged by the forces of the French king;" and then came to the following resolution, That the admiral appears to fall under the following part of the twelfth article of the Articles of War, to wit, "Or shall not do his utmost to take or destroy every ship which it shall be his duty to engage; and to assist and relieve all and every of his majesty's ships which it shall be his duty to assist and relieve:" and as that article positively denounces the punishment of death on the delinquent, without any alternative left to the discretion of the court, under any variation of circumstances, they adjudged him to be shot to death. But it having fully appeared, by the evidence of lord Robert Bertie, lieutenant-colonel Smith, captain Gardiner (captain of the admiral's own ship the Ramillies) and other officers of the ship who were near the person of the admiral, that they did not perceive any backwardness in him during the action, or any marks of fear or confusion, either from his countenance or behaviour; but that he seemed to give his orders coolly and distinctly, and did not seem wanting in personal courage: from these and other circumstances, the court being induced to believe that his misconduct arose neither from cowardice nor disaffection, did therefore unanimously think it their duty to recommend the said admiral John Byng to his majesty, as a proper object of mercy†. Also, when they made a report of the sentence of death they had passed on the admiral, they added thereto the following remonstrance to the lords of the admiralty in his favour:

"We the underwritten, the president and members of the court-martial, assembled for the trial of admiral Byng, believe it unnecessary to inform your lordships, that in the whole course of this long trial, we have done our utmost endeavours to come at truths, and to do the strictest justice to our country and the prisoner; but we cannot help laying the distresses of our minds before your lordships on this occasion, in finding ourselves under the necessity of condemning a man to death, from the great severity of the twelfth article of war *, part of which he falls under, and which admits of no mitigation, even if the crime should be committed by an error in judgment only; and therefore, for our own consciences sakes, as well as in justice to the prisoner, we pray your lordships, in the most earnest manner, to recommend him to his majesty's clemency."

In consequence of this recommendatory remonstrance from the court-martial, and the petitions of lord Torrington, nephew to the unhappy admiral, and other persons of high distinction allied to his family, the lords of the admiralty applied to his majesty that the opinion of the twelve judges might be taken, whether the sentence of the court-martial was legal? The sentence was accordingly referred by the king to the judges, who declared it legal; in consequence of which, a warrant was signed by the lords of the admiralty for carrying it into execution: but it was again suspended, at the request of several members of the court-martial, who alleged, that they had something to disclose relative to the said sentence which greatly affected their own consciences; and application was made to the house of commons by one of the members, praying the aid of parliament to be released from his oath of secrecy, in order to disclose the grounds why sentence of death had passed upon the said admiral. Upon this, a bill for releasing the members from their oath of secrecy was ordered into the house of commons, and passed that house; and a respite was sent to admiral Byng for a fortnight: but when the bill came into the house of lords, and when the members were examined there, the same was rejected; so that this and every other tentative to get the admiral reprieved from his sad fate all proving ineffectual, he was, pursuant to his sentence, executed on the fourteenth of March, 1757, on board his majesty's ship Monarque, in Portsmouth harbour. A few minutes before he was called out of the cabin to die, he gave a paper to Mr. Brough, the marshal of the admiralty, who attended him, in which he declared himself "a victim, destined to divert the indignation and resentment of an injured and deluded people from the proper objects." In his last moments, he behaved with a dignity and fortitude that never yet inspired a breast conscious of guilt or infected with cowardice.

Thus ended the enquiry into the conduct of general Fowke and admiral Byng; the one of whom was broke and dismissed his majesty's service, for not following instructions which contradicted themselves; and the other suffered an ignominious death for following the advice and opinion of a council of war, and for not having done every thing that was perhaps possible to have been done for distressing the enemy, and relieving the fortress they had besieged. I have collected the proceedings of this remarkable affair together into one point of view, though they were, by several incidents, protracted nine months or thereabouts; as well that the reader might have a more distinct and clear idea of them, as to prevent any unnecessary digressions that would break in upon the chain of other events †.

As the success of the war now begun seemed to depend chiefly on a naval force, it will not be improper to give the state of the royal navy of Great Britain at the time it was declared, which was as follows:

The zeal of the people of England for their sovereign's service and the honour of their country was never more warmly expressed than on the occasion of declaring war against France. Addressees were presented to the king from the city of London, the merchants, and by most of the trading towns and corporations in the kingdom. All ranks and degrees of men seemed unanimous in their resolution to assist his majesty in any measures he should judge proper to be taken to annoy the enemy, and defend the kingdom. The landholders and corporations not only submitted with cheerfulness to the great supplies appointed by parliament, but also raised great numbers of men for the service of their country, by voluntary contributions and large premiums. Nay, a number of public-spirited merchants of the city of London taking into consideration the great utility that would arise to the naval service by training up a young nursery of seamen, from whence the government might, on any sudden emergency, always draw an immediate supply of hands to man their ships, formed themselves into that laudable association, known by the name of the Marine Society; and contributed considerable sums of money for equipping such orphans, friendless and forlorn boys, as were willing to engage in the service of the navy. In consequence of this truly patriotic plan, many thousands of wretched vagrants were rescued from misery, and rendered useful members of society, of which they must have proved the pest and reproach but for this humane interposition.

The first home expedition against the enemy, after the declaration of war, was that against the island of Chause, about two or three leagues distant from Granville in Lower Normandy, conducted by captain Howe in the Dunkirk, with three frigates, who on the fourteenth of July came to an anchor before the fort which defended the island, and was garrisoned by one hundred men, who did not give the English much trouble; for just as captain Howe had cleared his ship for action, the governor came on board and surrendered, without firing a gun. The island of Chause belonged to the farmers-general, but is inhabited only by tradesmen, and produces scarce any thing but wine. We kept the island some few days, then demolished the fort and other buildings, nailed up the cannon, and carried off all the live cattle, wine, and other effects of any value. After which the ships threw a few bombs into Granville, which did some execution; but not having a sufficient supply to do all the mischief they might have done, they returned to Spithead.

All this time, however, our trade suffered heavily from the enemy's cruizers, who were so numerous, and so properly stationed for intercepting our homeward-bound merchantmen, that by Michaelmas this year the French had taken two hundred and thirty of our ships; amongst which was the Warwick man of war and four privateers; one ship with eight hundred soldiers for New York, and another with eighty-eight people on board for Newfoundland. We had indeed, in the same space of time, taken from the French two hundred and fifty-one ships, amongst which were the Arc-en-Ciel, a man of war of fifty guns, a rich Martinico man, four ships with about three hundred soldiers and provisions on board for North America; but allowing the difference of value between the English and French cargoes, we had at this time little to boast of, and our trade was notoriously neglected.

Our adversaries the French, on the contrary, left no method untried to secure their navigation and commerce, by endeavouring to engage neutral ships in their service, when the circumstances of war might make it dangerous or impracticable to carry on a communication with their colonies. With this view his most Christian majesty licensed Dutch ships to trade with, or to carry the produce of their islands, from which, in common with other natives, he had excluded them in times of peace; and the Dutch on their side assumed a right which they pretended to claim on the faith of treaties, to carry the goods of our enemies, though at the same time the French king, by an ordinance, dated July 8, 1756, laid them and all other neutral nations under the severest prohibition not to carry British property. The British court, however, shewed a becoming spirit on this occasion; for his majesty's ships of war had orders to keep a sharp look-out for Dutch ships that should be found transporting either soldiers, arms, ammunition, or contraband goods, to any of the territories or plantations of the French king. Accordingly, a great number of them were brought into the Downs in the course of this year, laden with masts, yards, &c. for the use of the enemy, of which the Dutch complained as a very great hardship; but we shall have occasion to treat of this affair between us and their High Mightinesses more at large hereafter. Events of a more striking nature now claim our attention.

The empress of Russia, highly discontented with the treaty his Britannic majesty had made in the beginning of this year with the king of Prussia, without communicating the same either to herself or her ministers, carried her resentment of this proceeding so far as to renounce the late treaty she had concluded with Great Britain, and to reject the tender of the first payment of the stipulated subsidies. Not only so, but she acceded publicly to the treaty of Versailles, and soon after put those very troops in motion against the king of Prussia which Great Britain had agreed to take into her service, in order to prevent foreign troops from entering into Germany. The empress-queen, on her side, alarmed at the very extraordinary military preparations which his Prussian majesty had been for some time making throughout his dominions, assembled a considerable body of troops to guard against a surprize. At the same time, she ordered her minister at foreign courts to present a rescript in her name, in which she disclaimed all hostile intentions in the augmentation of her forces, declaring that it was intended only for a security to her own dominions, which she saw threatened with an approaching invasion: that in the late treaty she had concluded with the court of France, the maintaining the treaty of Westphalia in full force was absolutely and clearly stipulated: and that, notwithstanding certain reports had been industriously propagated that her alliance with the court of France contained secret articles, calculated for the total suppression of the protestant religion, she solemnly declared that she had contracted no engagements with that court which could in the least affect the protestant interest, or infringe the liberties of the Germanic body. In the same piece, which was dated the thirteenth of July, 1756, some reflections were thrown out against the king of England (as elector of Hanover) and his Prussian Prussian majesty, as having entered into a league on these groundless suggestions against the house of Austria. The courts of London and Berlin did not suffer this rescript to go long unanswered. His Britannic majesty gave orders to his minister at the diet of Ratisbon to present a memorial in his name, as elector of Hanover, justifying his treaty with the king of Prussia, which he declared to have been entered into in consequence of the empress-queen's refusal of the succours stipulated by treaties when demanded, to guard against the designs of France upon his electoral dominions, which for some time had been too glaringly displayed for any one to be mistaken therein; and that neither himself nor his Prussian majesty had any farther views in the treaty in question than to form an alliance for the securing their respective dominions, and preserving peace and tranquillity in the empire.

His Prussian majesty in his memorial retorted upon the empress-queen the charge of being the aggressor, declaring that the military preparations he had made had been only in consequence of the great armaments which she herself had set on foot for some time past all over her dominions: that he had greater reason to be attentive to these dispositions, as he had received undoubted intelligence at the same time of the march of a considerable body of Russians towards Courland; and that these military motions, on the part of the two imperial crowns, having obliged him to demand of the empress-queen a categorical answer, whether they were designed against him or not? her imperial majesty had thought proper to return thereto a very ambiguous, dry, and unsatisfactory answer, which served only to confirm his majesty in his suspicion of a design being formed against his dominions; and that therefore it became his indispensable duty to take every measure which should appear most proper to guard against such an insult. Soon after delivering this memorial to the imperial diet, his Prussian majesty ordered M. Klingraaf, his minister at the court of Vienna, to assure the empress-queen that he would instantly put a stop to all his military preparations, provided she would promise that his dominions should not be invaded either this year or the next. This request, not to be molested for two years by one who had a right to claim the security of peace by the faith of treaties, was far from being impertinent or imperious. Nevertheless, her Imperial majesty disdainful, as she said, to be thus challenged and dictated to by a prince of the empire, returned a more haughty and less satisfactory answer to this demand than she had done to the former.

The moment his Prussian majesty was advised of this conduct of the court of Vienna, which he seems to have all along suspected, and therefore had held himself in readiness to take the field at all events; he lost no longer time in fruitless negotiations, but immediately put his troops in motion, and ordered his minister at Dresden to demand of the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, a passage for his army through Saxony: to which the latter forbore giving any determinate answer; and dreading, as he had reason to do, the consequences of admitting the army of a doubtful friend, and of a prince who had already given sufficient intimations of his being well acquainted with the private engagements subsisting between the Saxon cabinet and the two empresses against him, collected his whole forces with all possible diligence, and ordered them to fortify themselves in the strong fortrefs of Pirna, till he could receive such relief from his confederates as the nature of his distress, and of their common cause, required. He then ordered a written answer to be delivered to M. de Malzahn, the Prussian minister, in which, among other things, he said, that he flattered himself the king of Prussia would rest satisfied of his intention not to take any part in the differences that have arisen between his Prussian majesty and the empress queen, and not require any thing of his Polish majesty or his subjects, contrary to the liberty of a prince of the empire, or that should oblige him to have recourse to the Germanic body and the guarantees of the treaties of peace for the due execution of those treaties. This declaration was sent to the king of Prussia by lord Stormont, the British minister, accompanied by the count of Salmont, one of the Saxon ministers: but his Prussian majesty, who was already determined in the conduct he was to pursue, would admit of no other alternative than that of his Polish majesty separating the army he had assembled, and sending the troops encamped at Pirna back into quarters.

The truth seems to be, that the fate of Saxony was at all events to answer the designs of Prussia; for upon the king of Poland's refusing (as it was very natural to think any one in his circumstances would) to disband all his forces, the Prussian monarch immediately marched two armies into Saxony, one directing its route to Leipzig, under prince Ferdinand of Brunswic, and the other to Dresden; which latter place, as the least tenable, was abandoned by the king of Poland, who taking with him his two sons, Xaverius and Charles, fled before his invader to his strong camp at Pirna, the queen of Poland and the rest of the royal family remaining in Dresden.

Besides the two armies that marched into Saxony, the king of Prussia at the same time assembled two others in Upper and Lower Silesia, which possessed themselves of the passes communicating with the circles of Buntzlaw and Konighen-Gratz, besides a large body of troops assembled at Glatz, and another kept in Prussia to oppose the Russians. His Prussian majesty, on entering the Saxon territories, published a manifesto to justify his conduct. No sooner had he seized upon Dresden, the capital of the electorate, than he sent an officer to the queen of Poland, to demand the keys of the archives, the cabinets, and the treasures of her husband. The queen was forced to submit to this demand; but at the same time, having assembled all the foreign ministers, she begged of them, with tears in her eyes, to represent to their respective courts how rigorously the court of Saxony was treated by the king of Prussia. Deaf, however, to all her complaints, that monarch gave orders for blowing up and demolishing the fortifications of Wirtemberg, and Torgau to be fortified; at which place he established the government under a Prussian ministry, after turning out all the Saxon ministers of state and members of the council. He appointed baron Wyllech governor of Dresden, who seizing upon all the Saxon officers found in that city, obliged them to swear not to serve against the Prussians, before he would grant them their liberty; liberty; and stripping the city of all the artillery, arms, and ammunition found therein, he sent them down the Elbe to Magdebourg. Such a conduct sufficiently shewed that his Prussian majesty was determined to treat this wretched electorate in the same manner as the dominions of an open enemy.

Nor did the city of Leipzig, of which prince Ferdinand had taken possession, experience any milder treatment. The inhabitants were obliged to provide the Prussian army with provisions at a stated price (far short of their cost) on pain of military execution; and an order was issued for the payment of all taxes and customs to the king of Prussia. In this extreme distress his Polish majesty filled all the courts of Europe, in amity with Saxony, with the most pathetic memorials against these proceedings; proceedings indeed which struck most of them with astonishment; but none more so than his Britannic majesty, the faithful ally of Prussia, who was so far from being in the secret of this invasion, that he publicly avowed, and in some sense protested against it. His Prussian majesty, aware of the difficulties in which his conduct towards Saxony would embroil him, immediately circulated a memorial through Europe, in which it was declared, "That the steps he had taken were the pure effects of necessity, and of that regard which every one owes to his own safety; and that among the papers belonging to his Polish majesty of which he had possessed himself, he had found the original treaties, letters, &c. which had passed between the courts of Petersburg, Vienna, and Dresden, which would enable him to prove unanswerably the plot which had been formed by those powers to strip him of a great part of his dominions; but that, by the vigorous measures he had taken, the iniquitous schemes of an ungrateful and ambitious court (meaning that of Saxony) had been happily discovered, and their taking effect prevented."

The Saxon army continued still encamped near Pirna, in a place almost inaccessible, and very strongly fortified. The king of Prussia being joined by prince Ferdinand's army from Leipzig, closely invested the Saxon camp, and at the same time measures were taken to engage the Austrians who were coming to their assistance. The passes into Bohemia were all occupied by advanced guards of Prussians, and a detachment from the army was encamped at Aufsig, on the south side of the Elbe, under field-marshal Keith. By this means the Saxon camp was hemmed in, in the manner of a blockade, and those troops reduced to the utmost distress for want of provisions, while the Prussians were plentifully supplied with every necessary. This hastened the march of an Austrian army under the command of count Brown, a general in whom the court of Vienna placed the greatest confidence. The king of Prussia, whose vigilance nothing could escape, had early notice of their intended march, and determined to disconcert their measures. Accordingly, his majesty set out from his camp at Seidlitz on the twenty-eighth of September, and took upon himself the future conduct of the forces encamped at Aufsig, which consisted only of twenty-five thousand men, the king having been obliged to leave the main body of his troops in the neighbourhood of Pirna, in order to keep the Saxons blocked up.

His Prussian majesty being arrived in marshal Keith's camp, put his army in motion without delay, being resolved to march in quest of count Brown. He formed a van-guard of eight battalions, ten squadrons of dragoons, and eight squadrons of hussars. He put himself at the head of this body, and marched to Tournitz, leaving orders for the rest of his army to follow in two columns, the one by the way of Prescobot, and the other the same way the van-guard had taken. From Tournitz he marched with his van towards Welhmina, where he arrived that evening (the 30th) an hour before sun-set. From thence he could descry the Austrian army, with its right wing at Lowoschutz, and its left extended towards Egra. That very evening the king himself occupied with six battalions a hollow and some rising ground which commanded Lowoschutz, and which the Austrian general had by a great oversight neglected to secure, but which his Prussian majesty resolved to make use of the next day, in order to march and attack the enemy. His army arrived in the night at Welhmina, where the king only formed his battalions behind one another, and his squadrons in the same manner, which remained all night in this posture, the king himself not going to rest, but keeping watch (covered only with his cloak) before a little fire at the head of his troops.

On the first of October at day-break his majesty took with him his general officers, and shewed them the ground which he intended to occupy with his army, viz. the infantry, forming the first line, to occupy two high hills and the bottom between them, some battalions to form the second line, and the third to be composed of the whole cavalry. The Austrians, however, who had by this time discovered their error in neglecting those advantageous posts, now prepared to dispute the possession of them; and notwithstanding the king made all possible dispatch in strengthening the wings of his army upon these hills, and that the infantry were no less diligent in securing their post at the right, yet the enemy's Pandours, Croatians, and grenadiers, who were posted in vineyards inclosed with stone walls, so harrassed the left wing as it was forming, that it was obliged immediately to come to engagement.

The Prussians, however, continued advancing with great firmness, till they came to the declivity of the hills towards the enemy, from whence they saw the town of Lowoschutz filled with a great body of infantry, and a large battery of twelve pieces of cannon in front; their cavalry were formed chequer-wise, and in a line between Lowoschutz and the village of Sanschitz. His majesty having spent some time in reconnoitring the disposition of the enemy, gave orders to his cavalry to begin the attack by falling upon the enemy's horse, which were drawn up in their front. This attack was made with such vigour, that the Austrian cavalry presently gave way; but the enemy keeping up a terrible fire from several pieces of cannon, and from a great body of infantry which they had posted in some hollow places behind their horse, the Prussians could not pursue their advantage without running into needless danger; and therefore returned and formed again behind their line of infantry. They soon returned to the charge, however, which they maintained with such spirit and a resolution, that in spite of the fire of above sixty pieces of cannon, which played upon them from the hollow ways and ditches, they totally defeated the whole Austrian cavalry, and even drove the infantry from the ditches in which they were posted. At the same time, by a masterpiece of generalship, the king ordered the whole infantry to march on gradually, and then on a sudden to wheel about and attack the town of Lowoschutz in flank. This service was performed with equal courage, conduct, and success, as the former, amidst a most terrible fire of cannon, and the resistance of a body of infantry prodigiously superior to themselves. The Prussians set fire to the suburbs of the town, carried the post, and put the whole Austrian army to flight.

Count Brown finding the battle irreparably lost, retired to the other side of the Egra, and pitched his camp at Budin, while his Prussian majesty kept the field of battle, and established his head-quarters at Lowoschutz. The army of the Austrians was sixty thousand strong; that of the king of Prussia, as I have already observed, did not exceed twenty-five thousand. The battle lasted from seven in the morning till three in the afternoon. The loss of the Prussians was two thousand killed and wounded; among the former were one general of infantry, two major-generals of cavalry, and one colonel of the grenadiers. The loss of the enemy was computed to amount to between six and seven thousand killed and wounded, and five hundred taken prisoners; amongst whom was prince Lobkowitz; five pieces of cannon and three pair of colours fell also into the hands of the victors *.

The king, after gaining his point by disabling count Brown from marching to the relief of the Saxons under his blockade, ordered his victorious troops to return into that electorate, and join that body of his forces employed in this service. The wretched Saxons, on their part, seeing all hopes of relief by the way of Bohemia totally cut off, their provisions being also exhausted, and famine flaring them in the face, were reduced either to attempt an escape by stratagem, or to lay down their arms and surrender themselves to the king of Prussia.

An escape was most eligible, and they attempted it in the following manner: on the twelfth day of October, as soon as the day was shut in, they secretly threw a bridge of boats over the Elbe, near Konigstein. At nine o'clock, having removed almost all their artillery to the last mentioned place, they struck their tents, and by seven next morning his Polish majesty and the whole Saxon army passed the river undiscovered, or at least unmolested. This plan was concerted with count Brown, who, to facilitate the execution, secretly left his camp at Budin; and with a considerable body of horse, having marched sixteen German miles, he arrived in the neighbourhood of Konigstein the same day; and the day before general Nadasti arrived with about six thousand irregulars, which he posted in such a manner as to prevent the eight Prussian battalions that were encamped on that side the Elbe, at Lemon, from being joined by the Prussians that were at Scandau.

This disposition greatly facilitated the passage of the Saxons, which was likewise concealed by the darkness of the night, and a thick fog on the succeeding morning; so that it was near nine o'clock before the Prussians at Seidlitz knew that the Saxons had left their camp. The Austrian general, however, was again guilty of an oversight on this occasion, in neglecting to reconnoitre the country through which he was to escort the Saxon army. This neglect ruined the whole plan; for as soon as the Saxon advanced-guard had, with great difficulty, got about half way up a steep mountain over-against Konigstein, they found that the Prussians had already made themselves masters of all the defiles, and that it was impossible for them to force their way. The Saxon army now finding themselves surrounded on every side, and that their crafty enemy having foreseen their design, had suffered them to march into this toil, that he might the more easily secure them, they offered to capitulate, which was accordingly agreed to, and they surrendered themselves prisoners to his Prussian majesty. A proposal was then made to them to enlist under the Prussian banner, which the greatest part of them accepted, took the oath of fidelity to the conqueror, and were incorporated amongst his troops.

Thus deprived of all his military strength, the unfortunate king of Poland found it in vain longer to struggle with his fate: he therefore submitted to be sent, with the queen his consort, to Warsaw in Poland; thus in a manner abdicating the electorate of Saxony, which fell under the government of the king of Prussia.

While the Austrian and Prussian armies were in the field, the emperor was engaged by his consort

* It is worthy of remark, that in this battle, which opened the first campaign of a most bloody war, the two commanders in chief who fought against each other were originally subjects of the British crown.

Count Brown, who was at the head of the Austrians, was a native of Ireland, and had risen to the high rank he held in the imperial army entirely by his great military abilities, which he had displayed on several occasions, but more particularly in the last war the court of Vienna had waged against the king of Prussia.

Field-marshal Keith, who commanded under the king of Prussia, was younger son of George Keith, earl Marischal of Scotland, and born in that kingdom in 1698. When he was only seventeen years of age, he entered with his brother lord Marischal into the rebellion of 1715. The defeat of his party obliged him to seek his fortune abroad; and he obtained a commission in the Irish brigade, commanded by the duke of Ormond in Spain. Here he continued about ten years; but being recommended to Catherine I. the empress of Russia, then reigning, she received him in a most distinguished manner, and in a little time advanced him to the rank of lieutenant general. In the war that broke out between Russia and Turkey in that reign, he gave such proofs of his courage and military skill, that his reputation at the court of Petersburg greatly increased, insomuch that the czarina sent him to the court of London, upon the return of the peace, in quality of her ambassador-extraordinary. His embassy being finished, he was sent into Finland against the Swedes, over whom he gained the famous victory of Wilmanstrand.

After the peace of Abo in 1743, he was appointed ambassador-extraordinary to compliment the king of Sweden on the election of a successor to the crown; but the expences he incurred while in this high station so far impaired his fortune, that finding he could not support the dignity of a marshal with the Russian pay, he accepted of an invitation from the king of Prussia, who gave him a pension over and above his pay, and admitted him his companion in a private tour through Germany, Poland, Hungary, and other places, in disguise, and placed the greatest confidence in his abilities and integrity.

to issue three imperial decrees in full diet at Ratisbon against his Prussian majesty: the first, summoning him to withdraw his troops from the electorate of Saxony; the second, commanding all the vassals of the empire employed by the king of Prussia to quit that service immediately; and the third, forbidding the members of the empire to suffer any levies of soldiers for the Prussian service to be made within their respective jurisdictions. The French king's minister at the diet declared, that his most Christian majesty, considering the proceedings of the king of Prussia as a direct breach of the rights and liberties of the empire, was determined to succour, in the most effectual manner, the empress-queen, and other princes of the empire who had been insulted and injured by him, and for that purpose would forthwith send such a number of troops to their aid as might be thought sufficient to maintain the liberty of the Germanic body. The like declaration was also made on the part of the czarina of Russia. The ministers of the empress-queen, both at London and at the Hague, demanded in her name the succours those two powers were bound, by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, to afford the house of Austria, which was peremptorily refused by both nations. The French were all this time labouring hard to throw the whole blame of the war, on the eve of breaking out in Germany, upon the treaty signed between Great Britain and Prussia at the beginning of this year, and to persuade the catholic princes that their alliance was formed with a particular intention to destroy the Romish interest and religion in Germany: and upon this assertion, which the court of France gave the authority of an incontestible fact, a convention was now concluded with the emperor, which regulated the number and service of the forces to be sent from France into Germany.

The season being now so far advanced, his Prussian majesty cantoned his forces in the neighbourhood of Seidlitz, and along the Elbe towards Dresden. His other army, which had entered Bohemia under the command of the count de Schwerin, retired to the confines of the county of Glatz, where they were also distributed into winter-quarters; and thus this short, but most active campaign, was finished by the beginning of November.

During these transactions on the continent, our losses and disgraces both in the Mediterranean and North America, and the advantages gained upon us both by sea and land, occasioned great murmurings and heart-burnings among the people in England, who imagined they saw a great deal of mismanagement, as well in the directive as in the executive part of the government. Their discontents appeared not only in their addresses to the throne, but likewise in the instructions which the members of a great number of corporations gave to their representatives in parliament; the general purport of which was, to make a strict enquiry into the causes of our miscarriages; how the large sums that were granted in the last session of parliament had been applied; and to pass a militia-bill, whereby the hiring of subsidiary forces for the defence of the kingdom, on any future emergency, might no longer subsist. Some complained of the weak and ill-concerted measures of the ministry; others, of the treachery, ignorance, and cowardice of our commanders, both at sea and land; that no wisdom or policy could be seen in our counsels; and, in short, that the nation was on the very brink of destruction, into which it must inevitably fall, if the conduct of affairs was still continued in the same hands.

So repeated, so loud and vehement were the clamours of the people, and of all persons, high and low, against the pilots of the helm, that at length they reached the royal ear. His majesty, ever glad of an occasion to convince his British subjects that he had their interest, glory, and advantage at heart, superior to all other considerations, proceeded as far as he in prudence thought advisable, to make such alterations in the ministry as might please his people. Accordingly, in November the duke of Devonshire was appointed first commissioner of the Treasury, in the room of the duke of Newcastle; the right honourable Henry Bilson Legge was made chancellor of the Exchequer, instead of sir George Lyttleton. By another commission for the marine department, the place of first lord of the admiralty, filled by lord Anson, was given to earl Temple, brother-in-law to Mr. Pitt; and the right honourable George Grenville was made treasurer of the navy. Lord-chancellor Hardwicke having resigned the seals, they were put in commission; and, lastly, to the infinite joy of the whole nation, who now began to idolize Mr. Pitt, that gentleman was appointed one of his majesty's secretaries of state, in the room of Mr. Fox. The fears of an invasion being now perfectly subsided, and Hanover thought in more danger than Great Britain, orders were issued for sending home the Hanoverian and Hessian troops, whose abode here had occasioned great disturbance and uneasiness.

A few days after the adopting these agreeable measures, his majesty, on the second of December, met his parliament, and by a gracious speech from the throne, in great measure obviated all applications which the representatives of the people had been instructed by their constituents to make.

He began "by expressing his hope, that, under the guidance of Divine Providence, the union, fortitude, and affection of his people, would enable him to surmount all difficulties, and vindicate the dignity of his crown and the rights of his subjects against the ancient enemy of Great Britain. He assured them that the succour and preservation of America constituted a main object of his attention and solicitude; and observed, that the growing dangers to which the British colonies might be exposed, from the late losses in that country, demanded resolutions of vigour and dispatch. He said, that an adequate and firm defence at home should maintain the chief place in his thoughts; and that in this great view he had nothing so much at heart as to remove all grounds of dissatisfaction from his people: that for this end, he earnestly recommended to the care and diligence of the parliament the framing of a national militia, planned and regulated with equal regard to the just rights of his crown and people; an institution which might become one good resource in times of general danger. He observed, that the unnatural union of councils abroad; the calamities which, in consequence of this unhappy conjunction, might, by irruptions of foreign armies into the empire, shake its constitution, overturn its system, and threaten oppression to the protestant interest on the continent, were events which must sensibly affect the minds of the British nation; and had fixed the eyes of Europe on this new and dangerous crisis. He then informed them, that the body of his electoral troops, which were brought hither at the desire of his parliament, he had now directed to return to his dominions in Germany, relying with pleasure on the spirit and zeal of his people in defence of his person and realm. He said, that he fully confided in the wisdom of his parliament, for preferring more vigorous efforts, though more expensive, to a less effectual, and therefore less frugal, plan of war: that he had placed before them the dangers and necessities of the public; and it was their duty to lay the burdens they should judge unavoidable, in such a manner as would least distress and exhaust his people; and concluded with these remarkable words, "Unprosperous events of war in the Mediterranean have drawn from my subjects signal proofs how dearly they tender the honour of my crown; and they cannot therefore, on my part, fail to meet with just returns of unwearied care, and unceasing endeavours for the glory, prosperity, and happiness of my people."

Most affectionate and loyal addresses were presented by both houses in return to this speech; after which the legislature proceeded to dispatch the national business.

In the course of this year a scarcity of corn, and dearness in consequence, of all sorts of provisions, was severely felt in most parts of England, owing in great measure to the iniquitous practice of engrossing, and had occasioned many tumults and risings among the lower sort of people. His majesty had in his speech recommended this matter to the consideration of his parliament, desiring they would take such measures as they should judge most proper to remedy the abuse complained of, and relieve the distresses of the poorer class of his subjects. The commons therefore had no sooner discussed the form of their address, than the house resolved itself into a committee to deliberate on this matter; and a bill was immediately framed to prohibit, for a limited time, the exportation of all kinds of corn, either in the grain or meal; and an embargo was laid on all ships laden with that commodity for foreign parts.

The committee of supply and of ways and means were next appointed, who proceeded to consider the public estimates, when it was resolved to strengthen the hands of government, by making the most ample provision for the prosecution of the war. The land forces were augmented from thirty-five thousand to forty-nine thousand seven hundred forty-nine effective men, including four thousand and eight invalids. The seamen were settled at fifty-five thousand men, including eleven thousand four hundred and nineteen marines, with sufficient to provision for their maintenance. His majesty was also enabled to perform his agreement with and provide for his Hessian and Hanoverian forces. Besides which, they granted ample sums for garrisons, for the ordnance, for levying new regiments, for forming and maintaining an army of observation in Germany, and fulfilling his majesty's engagements with the king of Prussia; for the support of the British forts on the coast of Africa; for the relief of South Carolina and Virginia; the support of Nova Scotia and Georgia; for enabling the East India company to keep a military force in their settlements; and for several other uses and contingencies: which supplies in the whole amounted to eight millions three hundred and fifty thousand three hundred and twenty-five pounds some odd shillings and pence. Immense as this sum was, they who granted it found means to establish funds for the payment thereof to more than the amount, in order to prevent any deficiency that might happen in any branch of the ways and means.

The Hessian troops having been denied winter-quarters by the publicans, who could not be compelled to receive them by law (as being foreigners) and these troops having suffered extremely by the severity of the winter, the parliament thought proper to pass a bill to make provision for quartering foreign forces, which received the royal assent by commission on the seventeenth of December. By this act, foreign troops were in every respect to be treated as the native troops of this kingdom, till their return home.

The next object that engaged the attention of the legislature was a bill for the establishment of a national militia; a measure that promised infinite advantages to the public. This scheme had frequently been attempted in former sessions, but had always been attended with such a train of difficulties, and such a clashing of interests, as had hitherto rendered it abortive. It had been a constant source of dispute and contention between the crown and the commons; but now both appeared to concur in rendering it serviceable to the community. This bill was mentioned so early in this session of parliament as the fourth day of December, by colonel George Townshend, eldest son to the lord viscount Townshend, a gentleman alike distinguished by the abilities of his head and the virtues of his heart. The motion being approved, the task of preparing the bill was assigned to the proposer, and a considerable number of the most able members in the house: but, by the many difficulties which this committee had to encounter, and the competitions of interests they had to reconcile, it was the twenty-seventh of January, 1757, before it was ready for the first reading. After mature deliberations and various alterations, it was carried through the lower house, and sent to the lords for their concurrence. There it underwent several considerable alterations; the most disagreeable of which was, the reducing the number of militia-men to one half of what the commons had proposed, viz. to thirty-two thousand three hundred and forty men for England and Wales, instead of seventy thousand. This amendment occasioned some warm debates in the lower house, when the bill was returned, and several conferences were held with their lordships. At length, however, the two houses agreed to every article, and the bill was soon confirmed by the royal sanction.

A violent opposition, however, was raised to this constitutional bill without doors, chiefly occasioned by the intrigues of some discarded people in power, who, disappointed in their endeavours to get it thrown out by the parliament, resolved to make use of every art to prevent its being carried into execution: in a word, such a dislike to this new service service was every-where propagated amongst the lower and middling class of people, that in counties whose lieutenants were well disposed and well officered, it was the utmost difficulty to raise the common men by ballot; and scarce any where could it be performed for some time, without great discontent, and even riots. The farmers and landholders were frightened with an opinion that the militia would rob them of their servants; and the labouring men were terrified with the suggestion that they would be misused, and sent to fight the battles of some foreign prince or state, or be transported like felons to the plantations of America. Prejudices were thus formed in their minds, which could be hardly removed by some length of time, and the most serious and laboured representations of the expediency of the act, and of the evil designs of those who had set them against so salutary a law; and, after all, the nation would have been deprived of the advantages of a serviceable militia, had not the same spirit which carried the bill through the parliament, exerted itself in the execution of it.

Though a national militia is of too much importance to this kingdom to render any thing that can enforce or explain it unnecessary, yet as the act now established for that purpose is of too great a length to be inserted entire, I have therefore substituted the following abstract thereof for the information of my readers; which, for its brevity and plainness, at the same time that it includes every essential part of the said act, is superior to any other I have met with. It was printed and distributed throughout the city of York, by the direction and at the expence of George Fox Lane, esq. member for that city, for the better information of persons chosen by lot to serve in the militia for that county.

The PAY, PRIVILEGES, and DUTY, of a MILITIA-MAN.

PAY.

A private man, for each day he is employed in the militia, shall receive one shilling. There shall be one corporal to every twenty private men, who shall be paid one shilling and six pence every day he is employed.

Out of the private men, vacancies, on the death or removal of serjeants, may be filled up, in the proportion of one to every twenty private men;

Who are in that case discharged from serving as such,

And shall have the pay of a serjeant, viz. every day in the year one shilling.

The serjeant-major must be made out of the serjeants, and shall be paid two shillings and six-pence more a week.

PRIVILEGES.

No militia-man can be compelled to march out of the kingdom;

If ordered out on actual service, he shall receive a guinea before the day he is ordered to march.

If ordered out, leaving a family not of ability to support themselves, the parish officers where such family resides shall relieve them by a weekly allowance, until his return, and be reimbursed out of the county stock.

The two days in any one month, in harvest, may be changed to Tuesday and Wednesday in Easter-week.

If any day is inconvenient, on account of fairs and markets, it may be altered to any other day in the same week, except Sundays.

After exercise, every man shall clean and return his arms, cloaths, and accoutrements.

Changing his residence, he shall serve in the division he shall remove to, on giving previous notice to the deputy-lieutenants, and receiving a certificate from them.

And, in case of invasion, imminent danger thereof, or a rebellion, he may be drawn out for actual service, and in such case only, and in this kingdom only, and not elsewhere.

By the numerous armies which the French were now preparing to send into Germany, to assist the empress-queen against the king of Prussia, it was apparent that the electorate of Hanover would be exposed to their hostilities: to prevent which it was judged necessary to form an army of observation, to act as occasion should require on the frontiers of his majesty's German dominions, to protect them from the insults of the enemy. Accordingly, a message was delivered, February 15, by the king to Mr. secretary Pitt, to be by him presented to the house of commons, signifying, "that it was always with reluctance his majesty asked any extraordinary supply of his people; but that as the united counsels and formidable preparations of France and her allies threaten with the most alarming consequences Europe in general; and that as these most unjust and vindictive designs were particularly and immediately bent against his majesty's electoral dominions, and those of his good ally the king of Prussia, his majesty does confide in the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful commons, that they would cheerfully assist him in forming and maintaining an army of observation for the just and necessary defence and preservation thereof, and to enable his majesty to fulfil his engagements with the king of Prussia for the security of the empire against the irruption of foreign armies, and for the support of the common cause."

This message met with as favourable a reception as could possibly have been wished. It was read in the house of commons, with a copy of the treaty between his majesty and the king of Prussia, which was approved, and his majesty's request granted, two hundred thousand pounds being appropriated for the relief of the king of Prussia, and maintaining the army of observation. Smoothly as this measure passed down with the legislature, it was by no means relished by the bulk of the nation, who could not without regret behold us thus hurrying into a continental war, which might embarrass our operations by sea, take off our attention to the capital object of America, and tend to increase the enormous load of taxes and debts under which the people and the kingdom already groaned: but the popularity of the new secretary, and the vigorous opposition he and his colleagues had ever made to German connections, charmed the nation into a compliance with a measure, the bare suspicion of which would have lost any other ministry all the confidence of the people.

His royal highness the duke of Cumberland having been appointed, by his majesty, commander in chief of the army to be raised in Germany to observe the motions of the French, he set out accordingly for Hanover in the beginning of April.

The change in the ministry which had taken place at the close of the last year, had been generally considered as an act of prudence, and a just regard to the general voice, which was heard from all quarters of the kingdom, exclaiming against the mal-administration of those in power. The public was pleased with the change, especially when it was observed what measures the new ministry took to correct and amend the false steps of their predecessors, to restore the honour and credit of the nation, to lessen public expences, by reducing the enormous salaries of the great officers of state, and the vast number of useless places; and put the national affairs upon such a footing as to give lustre to the crown, and safety to the people. This was visible in all their proceedings.

In the very beginning of this year a design was formed for reducing the important fortress of Louisbourg under our dominion; and eleven ships of the line, a fire-ship, a bomb-ketch, and fifty transports, were ordered, under the command of sir Edward Hawke, to get ready for North America. The admiral was to take on board six thousand two hundred effective men, exclusive of officers, to be commanded by general Hopson, assisted by lord Charles Hay. Admiral Osborn was sent with another squadron to reinforce that already in the Mediterranean under admiral Saunders. A squadron was also dispatched to the East Indies under the command of commodore Stephens; and our interest in the West Indies was consulted by sending a fleet to Jamaica, under the command of admiral Coates.

But as faction is ever restless, and envy ever blind to merit, these gentlemen, whose views carried with them all the appearances of a noble disinterestedness, as well in the senate as in the cabinet, could not escape the common lot of patriots. Those of the old ministry who had been displaced to make room for these, were too much concerned, both in interest and reputation, to sit down quiet under their dismissal, especially when the conduct of their successors gave daily opportunities for drawing comparisons so very humiliating to their administration; and so well were they versed in the intrigues of a court, that they found it no difficult matter to poison the royal ear, by the most injurious representations of the new ministers, whom they set forth as obstinate, imperious, ignorant, and even lukewarm in their loyalty. In these endeavours they were powerfully assisted by such of their faction as had been still continued in places of power about the crown. Add to this, that as they still sat in the same senate and council with their antagonists, they to the utmost of their power combated every scheme that was proposed by them. Thus, by clogging the wheels of state, and distracting our councils, the good purposes of the ministry were frustrated, and the government put into such an agitation, that his majesty was in a manner forced into a new change of administration. Accordingly, on the ninth of April Mr. Pitt, by the royal command, resigned the seals of secretary of state for the southern department. In the room of Mr. Legge, the king was pleased to grant the office of chancellor of the Exchequer to the right honourable lord Mansfield, chief-justice of the court of King's Bench, whom we have formerly mentioned by the name of Mr. Murray, and who had been lately ennobled in consideration of his eminent services. Mr. Pitt's dismissal was accompanied with those of several of his friends. The board of admiralty was changed, and the earl of Winchelsea put at its head; and some other removals were made, all of the same tendency. Mr. Fox, who had been secretary of state, but displaced to make room for Mr. Pitt, was gratified with the lucrative office of paymaster-general of the forces; but no gentleman could be prevailed upon to succeed Mr. Pitt in his employment; and indeed it was at this time a very ticklish post: the strain of popular favour ran with such vehemence on the side of the latter, and his colleague Mr. Legge, that it required a person of the most distinguished abilities to give common satisfaction in the management of national affairs. In the mean time, the people, who idolized the now displaced ministers, seemed to vie in displaying their respect and affection for them, which was immediately shewn by presentations of freedoms from a number of the most populous and opulent corporations, with addresses of thanks to Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge for their integrity and services, inclosed in gold boxes, and other elegant materials, enriched with emblems conveying the sentiments of national approbation. But as I shall have occasion again to touch upon this head, I shall say no more at present, but resume the account of parliamentary proceedings, and continue them to the end of the session, to preserve entire the connection of the many other interesting events, as well foreign as domestic, that distinguished this year.

It must be acknowledged, to the honour of this parliament, that they were in general extremely ready to adopt any scheme that seemed calculated for the interest of the nation. The society of the Free British Fishery presented a petition, importing, "That having been obliged, in the infancy of their undertaking, to incur a much larger expence than was at that time foreseen, they now found themselves such considerable losers, as to be utterly incapable of carrying on the fisheries with any prospect of success, unless assisted by farther bounty from parliament; that they therefore hoped, that, for the prosecution of the fisheries, they might have liberty to make use of such nets as they should find best adapted to the said fisheries, each buss carrying to sea the same quantity and depth of netting which, by the fishery acts, they were then bound to carry; that the bounty of thirty shillings per ton, allowed by the said acts on the vessels employed in the fishery, might be increased; and that, inasmuch as many of the stock-proprietors were unable to advance any farther sum for carrying on this branch of commerce; and others unwilling, in the present situation, and under the present restraint, to venture any further sum in the undertaking; that the stock of the society, by the said acts made unalienable, except in case of death or bankruptcy, for a term of years, might forthwith be made transferable; and that the petitioners might be at liberty, between the intervals of the fishing seasons, to employ the busses in such a manner as they should find for the interest of the society."

The house having taken the substance of this petition into consideration, granted the several requests therein contained, and augmented the bounty of thirty shillings per ton to fifty. About the same time, and in consequence of a petition presented by the city of London, a bill was prepared and passed into a law, for the more effectual preservation and improvement of the fry and spawn of fish in the river of Thames and water of Medway;

and for the better regulating the fishery in these rivers. The two next measures adopted by the parliament which merit our notice were, first, a bill for the relief of the poor and distressed silk manufacturers, who were deprived of all employment, and consequently of the means of subsistence, through the interruption of the Levant trade, occasioned by the war, and the delay of the merchant ships from Italy. By this bill, therefore, liberty was given to any persons to import from any place, in any ship or vessel whatever, till the first day of December 1757, organzine thrown silk, of the growth or produce of Italy, to be brought to the custom-house of London wheresoever landed; but that no Italian thrown silk coarser than that of Bologna, nor any tram of the growth of Italy, nor any thrown silk of the growth or produce of Turkey, Persia, East India, or China, should be imported by this act, on pain of forfeiting the commodity. This bill was doubtless a deviation from the famous act of navigation, and was remonstrated against as such by petitions from divers merchants and importers of raw silk, and others, who thought their interests hurt by it; but the parliament overlooked this temporary inconvenience, for the sake of furnishing a present supply to the poor manufacturers, who were actually reduced to the lowest depth of distress.

Such were the miseries which the poor had suffered, both the last year and this, by the excessive price of corn, that it had driven them into repeated riots in different parts of the kingdom; and in many instances the behaviour of the rioters had been destructive of all law and society. Nevertheless, as it was notorious that the frauds of fore-stallers and engrossers had in great measure occasioned the scarcity, the government was very sparing of punishment towards the ill-judging authors of these tumults; and the parliament taking this affair into their consideration, resolved to apply such a remedy as appeared to them most likely to prevent the return of this national calamity; and a bill was brought into the house of commons, to explain and amend the laws against regrators, fore-stallers, and engrossers of corn. Enquiry was also made into the abuses of millers and bakers, with regard to bread, who were accused of having adulterated this indispensable necessary of life with common whiting, lime, allum, and other ingredients pernicious to the human constitution.

But the most interesting measure pursued by the house of commons during this session, and that to which at once most excited the attention, and flattered the wishes of the people, was the enquiry into the loss of Minorca, which had raised such universal clamour throughout the nation. Pretty early in the session the commons addressed his majesty, That he would be pleased to order to be laid before them copies of all the letters and papers, containing any intelligence received by the secretaries of state, the commissioners of the admiralty, or any others of his majesty's ministers, in relation to the equipment of the French fleet at Toulon, or the designs of the French on Minorca, or any other of his majesty's possessions in Europe, since the first day of January 1755, to the first day of last August. They likewise begged leave to peruse a list of the ships of war that were equipped and made ready for sea, from the 1st of August 1755, to the 30th day day of April in the following year; with the copies of all sailing orders sent to the commanders during that period; as also the state and condition of his majesty's ships in the several ports of Great Britain, at the time of admiral Byng's departure, with the squadron under his command, for the relief of Fort St. Philip, during the period above-mentioned, according to the monthly returns made to the admiralty, with the number of seamen mustered and borne on board the respective ships. They demanded copies of all orders and instructions given to that admiral, and of letters written to and received from him, during his continuance in that command, either by the secretaries of state or lords of the admiralty, relating to the condition of his squadron, and to the execution of his orders. In a word, they required the inspection of all papers which could in any manner tend to explain the loss of Minorca, and the miscarriage of Mr. Byng's squadron.

To these addresses his majesty most graciously gave his acquiescence; but they whose safety depended upon intricacy, confusion, and a majority, which they spared no arts of whatever kind to obtain, so managed, that this enquiry was committed to the whole house, and the papers were swelled into such a preposterous number, that it required more time than a whole session of parliament would allow. However, the proceedings of the ministry received the protection of a parliamentary approbation, though this could by no means silence the murmurings of the people, who expected at least that the examinations that came before the committee, in the course of their enquiry into this important affair, and their proceedings in consequence thereof, would have been made public; but in this they were all disappointed. However, it must be confessed, that the readiness his majesty shewed to gratify his people by sifting this shameful affair to the bottom, and the exemplary, though perhaps severe punishment inflicted upon the supposed author of our naval disgrace in the Mediterranean, without any regard paid to family, former services, or even favourable circumstances, struck terror into our commanders both by sea and land, who were now clearly convinced, that they could hope for no countenance from their sovereign, should they betray a timorous or inactive conduct in the day of trial. Thus it was the means of reviving that courage and vigour for which Britons had been so long and so justly famous, and greatly damped the spirits of our boasting enemy, whose valour had arisen only from our timidity, and whose success was owing to our negligence.

On the fourth day of July, the session was closed with a speech from the throne, wherein his majesty was pleased to assure the parliament, that the success and preservation of America had been his constant care, and, next to the security of his kingdoms, should continue to be his great and principal object: that he had taken such measures, as, he trusted, by the blessing of God, would effectually disappoint the designs of the enemy in those parts: that he had no farther view but to vindicate the just rights of his crown and subjects from the most injurious encroachments; to preserve tranquility, as far as the circumstances of things might admit; and to prevent the true friends of Britain, and the liberties of Europe, from being oppressed and endangered by any unprovoked and unnatural conjunction.

We now come to another change or rather settlement in the ministry; and indeed, it was high time that this material point should be adjusted, as our councils had been for some time in a continual fluctuation, so that no schemes could be pursued, no enterprise of moment undertaken for the good of the nation. Three months and upwards had elapsed in this uncertainty; the trading part of the kingdom in general wished to see Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge replaced in their former stations; but the other party, I mean the old ministry, could not bear the thoughts of seeing the highest and most lucrative places of the state occupied by those who were the only means of turning them out. Long and warm was the contest betwixt them, which perhaps would not have ended without some terrible convulsion in the state, had not some leading men, of moderate principles, interposed with their salutary advice, which was, for both parties to consent to a compromise, and by taking in some of each, to form a coalition. This was a prudent and well-judged expedient, as it offered the only possible means of allaying the rage of faction, and healing those divisions which were likely to prove more pernicious to the public than were the mistaken conduct and counsels that had been so much complained of. This expedient being approved of and adopted, his majesty, in consequence thereof, was pleased to restore the seals to Mr. Pitt, appointing him secretary of state for the southern department, on the twentieth day of June, and five days after, Mr. Legge was reinstated in the office of chancellor of the exchequer, promotions that afforded universal satisfaction: sir Robert Henley was made lord keeper of the great seal on the thirtieth day of June; the custody of the privy seal was committed to lord Temple; a new board of Treasury was appointed with the duke of Newcastle at the head; and lord Anson was appointed the first lord of the admiralty; the earl of Thomond was made treasurer of the king's household, and Mr. Fox paymaster general: in a word, the royal favour was so equally distributed, that all animosities being now forgot, and former irregularities buried in oblivion, all parties seemed to harmonize in one view, the public good; which happy disposition produced effects far exceeding the most sanguine expectations, and this prudent arrangement was highly applauded by all who were not under the influence of violent attachment to party, or a narrow and exclusive spirit.

Having given this succinct view of the state of the administration at home, let us now turn our eyes to the continent, where we shall find the beginning of this year marked with a striking instance of the dreadful effects of frantic enthusiasm, in the attempt made upon the life of the king of France, on the fifth day of January, at Versailles, in presence of his son the dauphin, and surrounded by his guards and all the great officers of the crown. This extraordinary affair happened in the following manner:

A wretch of the dregs of the people, named Robert Francis Damien, born in a little village in the neighbourhood of Arras, had lived a considerable time as a servant with several families in Paris, but had been successively dismissed from his places on account account of a passionate and gloomy disposition, which approached to a degree of madness. The general murmurings which he had heard about the banishing the parliament, on account of the disputes concerning the administering the sacraments, had heated his indignation: it seems he had no design to kill the king, which indeed he might easily have done, but only to wound him, in order (to make use of his own words at the time of his trial) that God might touch his majesty's heart, and work on him to restore them to their former footing. The archbishop of Paris, he said, was the sole cause of all these troubles; and that, for his part, the only motive that urged him to the commission of this act was "for religion's sake." All those who have attempted the lives of christian princes, have made use of this pretext: it is sufficiently known that Henry III. and IV. of France fell by the hands of fanatics, but there was this difference between them and Lewis XV. that they were murdered because they appeared to be enemies to the pope, and Lewis was stabbed for having seemed desirous to oblige the pope.

The assassin had provided himself with a clasp knife, one side of which had a long sharp pointed blade, and the other was to cut pens with, and was about four inches long: he waited for the instant the king was to get into his coach to go to Trianon. It was near six o'clock in the evening, the day was shut in, the weather was excessively cold, so that almost all the court were wrapped up in large cloaks. The villain, who wore a large cloak also, pushes through the guards, brushes the dauphin as he passes by him, gets in between the body guard and the king, who was just stepping into his coach, strikes him with his penknife in the right side, between the fourth and fifth ribs, returns his knife into his pocket again, and remains upon the spot with his hat upon his head. The king finding himself wounded, turned about, and seeing a strange man standing close by him, with his hat on, and his eyes staring wildly, cried out, "I am wounded! stop that man, but do not hurt him."

Happily the king's wound was but slight; however, as there remained suspicion that the instrument might have been poisoned, several experiments were made upon animals, all of which served to relieve the people from their apprehensions. As for Damien, he made no attempt to escape, but suffered himself quietly to be seized; he was conveyed to prison, and soon brought to his trial, when all his answers served to discover that he was in an absolute state of insanity, and what was the cause of his madness; it was evident, that the king's treatment of the parliament, and the complaints both they and the public made against the archbishop of Paris, had turned the brain of the criminal, and stirred him up to this attempt. The unhappy wretch was afterwards put to the torture, in order to extort a confession, if he had any accomplices; but notwithstanding every species of cruelty that human invention could devise was practised upon him, it had no effect; no sufferings being sufficient to make him break silence. To render his punishment more public, he was conveyed to Paris, there to undergo a repetition of all his former tortures, a relation of which would be equally foreign to our purpose and disagreeable to our inclination; suffice it to say, that his miseries were at length terminated by being drawn asunder by four young and vigorous horses; after which, his body and limbs were reduced to ashes under the scaffold; his father, wife, daughter, and family, banished the kingdom for ever; the name of Damien effaced and obliterated, and the innocent involved in the punishment of the guilty.

Lewis had no sooner recovered, than in order the more effectually to fulfil his engagements with the empress queen, he raised two great armies. The first of these, consisting of eighty thousand men, the choicest troops of France, were put under the command of M. d'Estrées, a general of great reputation, under whom served M. de Contades, M. Chevert, the count de St. Germain, all officers of distinguished bravery and abilities. This formidable army crossed the Rhine early in the spring, marched by Westphalia, seized upon the town of Embden, and whatever belonged to the king of Prussia in East Friesland, and by slow marches made the best dispositions to over-run Hanover. M. d'Estrées fixed upon Munster for his head-quarters.

The other army of the French consisted of twenty-five thousand men, under the command of the prince de Soubise, and was destined to join the imperial army acting against the king of Prussia and his allies; and before Soubise passed the Rhine, he took possession of several places belonging to the king of Prussia in the Low Countries.

In the mean time the empress of Russia, true to her engagements with her imperial sister, dispatched one hundred and thirty thousand of her troops to her assistance, under the command of general count Apraxin, who began his march in the month of November of the preceding year 1756, and advanced to the borders of Lithuania, with a view particularly to invade Ducal Prussia, while a very strong fleet was equipped in the Baltic, to act in concert with this numerous army.

The Austrian army assembled in Bohemia, consisted of upwards of an hundred thousand men, headed by prince Charles of Lorraine and marshal Brown. The Swedes, though their king was allied in blood and inclination to his Prussian majesty, were very inclinable to accede to the general confederacy against him; and the duke of Mecklenburgh embraced the same party, and engaged to join the Swedish army, whenever it should be assembled, with six thousand men. The destruction of his Prussian majesty now seemed so certain, that the Aulic council no longer kept any measures, but openly declared him to have incurred the ban of the empire in his quality of elector of Brandenburg, and to have forfeited all his rights, privileges, immunities, &c.

Frederick, thus surrounded on all sides by enemies, did not however lose for an instant that courage and prudence which have ever distinguished him in all his situations, and have gained him the admiration of all Europe. He ordered Mr. Henouin, the French minister at Dresden, to depart that city; and having thrown two bridges over the Elbe, early in the spring he commanded the several districts of the electorate of Saxony to furnish him with great numbers of waggons, each drawn by four horses; the circles of Misnia and Leipzig were required to provide four hundred each, and the other circles in proportion: and as he was well informed, that the alarming progress of the Russian troops was stopped, by the want of provisions and of forage, he adhered to the wise maxim he had always adopted, of removing the seat of war as far as possible from his own own dominions, and determined to carry it into Bohemia, there to attack the Austrians with his united force.

With this view he ordered his armies in Saxony, Misnia, Lusatia, and Silesia, to enter Bohemia in four different places at the same time; the first body or grand army he took under his own command, attended by marshal Keith; the second was commanded by prince Maurice of Anhalt Dessau; the third by prince Ferdinand of Brunswick Bevern; and the fourth by that gallant and experienced general marshal Schwerin. All these armies began to move the same day, viz. April the eighth; and the design was so well concealed, and their several routes so wisely directed, that they entered Bohemia almost without opposition, the Austrians never suspecting the least of such a visit, till the Prussians were considerably passed the frontiers.

To deceive the Austrians, the king dispatched the prince of Bevern with his army towards Egra. From this appearance the enemy judged, that though he designed the Bevern and Schwerin armies should penetrate into Bohemia, yet he did not intend to join them with his own; and seeing the Prussian troops thus divided, M. Brown sent a considerable detachment, under the command of general Aremberg, to oppose the corps marching towards Egra. This event the king of Prussia had foreseen, and was prepared for it; for by a sudden motion towards the left, he cut off all communication between Aremberg's detachment and the main army. The Austrians, however, did not perceive the king's view, but exulted in an event which was the certain prelude to their own destruction. They mistook this stroke of generalship for a retreat, and confidently gave out that the Prussians were fled.

Mean while, the prince of Bevern advancing at the head of his army from his quarters of cantonment near Zittau in Lusatia, made himself master without the least opposition of the first post of Bohemia, at Krottaw and Grottenstein, drove away the enemy from Kratzow, and continued his route towards Reichemberg, where the enemy's army, consisting of twenty-eight thousand men, commanded by count Konigsfeg, was posted. This brought on an action on the twenty-first of April, which redounded highly to the honour of the prince of Bevern; for though there were many defiles in his way, and the enemy was in possession of several advantageous eminences, he gained a complete victory, driving the enemy before him above a mile. This action began at six o'clock in the morning, and lasted five hours. The loss of the enemy was said to amount to 1000 killed and wounded, twenty of them officers; 400 soldiers were taken prisoners, and three standards remained with the victors, who on their side had only seven subaltern officers, and one hundred rank and file, killed; one general, sixteen other officers, and about one hundred and fifty rank and file, wounded.

Marshal Schwerin's army marched with incredible expedition, and reached Koningshorff, on the Elbe, the twentieth. He entered Bohemia in five different places at once, and found the inhabitants in the utmost consternation. The enemy immediately filled the dangerous defile of Gulder Oussel with Pandours, to dispute his progress in Bohemia;

but they were defeated as soon as discovered. A considerable magazine, consisting of forty thousand bushels of oats, and two thousand barrels of meal, was seized at Jung Buntzlau. The Austrians every where fled before him; and he joined the prince of Bevern almost without loss, making himself master of the circle of Buntzlau; and the neighbouring country submitted to the Prussians almost without opposition. The prince of Anhalt Dessau with his corps drew near the king of Prussia's army.

Mean while the king, at the head of the principal army, moved along the Elbe, and after passing the Eger, advanced to Budin; whence the Austrians, who had an advantageous camp there, withdrew to Wastwarn, half way between Budin and Prague; and as his majesty thought, from the motions of count Brown, that the Austrians would make a stand at the plain of Giffchen, he passed the Moldau at the head of thirty thousand men, leaving the command of the rest of the army under the command of the prince of Anhalt Dessau.

I have already observed, that by a sudden and masterly movement, his majesty had cut off all communication between the detachment of twenty thousand men, which had been sent to watch his motions, under count Aremberg, and the main army of the Austrians. Having gained this advantage, to weaken the enemy, the latter became more cautious; and though they had been reinforced by an army from Moravia, by the remains of the troops lately defeated by the prince of Bevern, and by several regiments of the garrison of Prague, so that they were now near one hundred thousand strong; yet, instead of marching in quest of the invaders, to prevent their uniting, prince Charles of Lorraine and count Brown resolved to wait their approach, having strongly intrenched themselves on the banks of the Moldau, to the north of Prague, in a camp so fortified by every advantage of nature and art, as to be deemed almost impregnable. The left wing of the Austrians was secured by the mountains of Ziscka, and the right extended as far as Herboholi.

The vivacity of the Prussian hero was not, however, to be damped by these difficulties. Being joined, immediately on his crossing the Moldau, by the troops under marshal Schwerin and the prince of Bevern, according to the excellent dispositions he had made for that purpose, he resolved to attack the enemy in their camp with these united forces the same day, being the sixth of May. Accordingly, orders were given for the army to file off on the left of Potschernitz, in order to execute this design. Upon this motion of the Prussians, count Brown was obliged to wheel to the right, to avoid being flanked. The Prussians continued their march to Bichowitz, traversing several defiles and morasses, which for a little while separated the infantry from the rest of the army; and they having begun the attack with too much precipitation, were at first repulsed. Here that brave general, marshal Schwerin, received a mortal wound as he was encouraging the men, and died at the age of eighty-two, covered with military honour, and deeply regretted by his sovereign and the whole army. The infantry which had been separated in their march being now rejoined, made a fresh attack on the enemy's right wing, and entirely broke it; while the cavalry on the left, after three charges, compelled all the Austrian horse in their right wing to retire in great confusion; the Prussian troops in the center then attacked and entirely routed that of the enemy. The left wing of the Prussian army now advanced towards Michely, and being there joined by the horse, renewed their attack on the Austrians, who were retreating towards Saszawa. In the mean time, the troops on the right attacked the remains of the left wing of the Austrians, and made themselves masters of three batteries. But the behaviour of the infantry in the last attack was so courageous, as to leave little to be done by this part of the cavalry.

Prince Henry of Prussia and the prince of Bevern performed wonders, taking from the enemy, sword in hand, two of their batteries; and prince Ferdinand of Brunswic took the left wing of the Austrians in flank, while the king with his left, a body of cavalry, secured the passage of the Moldau. In a word, after a very long and obstinate dispute, and many signal examples of valour, the enemy was forced to abandon the field of battle, leaving behind them the greatest part of their baggage, and indeed their whole camp. The remains of their left wing, to the amount of ten or twelve thousand men, fled toward Benetschau, where they were afterwards assembled by M. Pretlach, general of horse. The infantry retired towards Prague, with their commanders prince Charles of Lorraine and marshal Brown; but they were greatly harassed in their retreat by a detachment of the Prussians under M. Keith. The number of the prisoners taken on this occasion by the victors amounted to four thousand, thirty of whom were officers of distinction. Their loss amounted to about two thousand killed and three thousand wounded. Among the former, besides M. Schwerin, were the prince of Holstein Beck, one other general, and three colonels; among the latter, five generals. The number of the killed and wounded on the side of the Austrians was much greater. Marshal Brown received a wound which, from the chagrin he suffered, proved mortal soon after.

As the greatest part of the Austrian army, soon after their defeat, retreated and took shelter in Prague, that large city was presently invested by the victorious Prussians, commanded by their king on the side of the Moldau, and by marshal Keith on the other. In four days the whole city was surrounded with lines and entrenchments, by which all communication from without was entirely cut off, and about forty-eight thousand Austrians inclosed within the walls, with prince Charles of Lorraine, marshal Brown, the two princes of Saxony, and most of their chief generals.

Every thing remained quiet on both sides, scarce a single cannon being fired for some time after the blockade was formed. The Austrian general, however, in order to ease the city of the multitude of forces cooped up useless within the walls, serving only to consume the provisions, formed a design to attack the Prussian army in the night, and, if possible, cut a way through the camp of the besiegers. With this view, in the night between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of May, the Austrians made a furious sally with 12,000 men, commanded by prince Charles of Lorraine in person, and attacked the Prussians on the side of marshal Keith's quarters at Weissenberg. Happily his Prussian majesty had received intelligence of the enemy's design by a deserter that very afternoon, and was prepared for their visit; so that the Austrians found the attack turned upon themselves; and were forced to retreat into the town with very considerable loss. On the twenty-ninth, the Prussian artillery being arrived, they began to batter and bombard the town in a most furious manner, which they continued without intermission till the eighteenth of June, whereby the city was reduced to a heap of rubbish, and the inhabitants and numerous garrison were reduced to such distress for provisions, that they were obliged to subsist upon horse-flesh. The Prussian monarch and his army now shared in imagination the spoils of the ancient and illustrious house of Austria, whose affairs were indeed in a most desperate situation. The distance from Prague to the archduchy of Austria was not very considerable, and secured only by the Danube. Vienna trembled lest she should next experience the horrors of a siege; and all the empress-queen's hereditary dominions lay open and exposed.

In this critical state of affairs the empress-queen appointed Leopold count Daun to the command of the Austrian forces. This general had never commanded in chief before, but had acquired great experience under the best officers in Europe, particularly the great Khevenhuller, who was extremely fond of him. He was cautious, steady, penetrating, and sagacious: he never trusted that to hazard which could be effected by a prudent delay: he was circumspect in all his measures, and impenetrable in his designs. Such was the general on whom the court of Vienna now cast its eyes, as the properest person to stem the torrent of disgrace that had well-nigh overwhelmed its arms, to save his country from ruin, and by his prudence and cautiousness to check the fire and vigour of the Prussian monarch, who, setting no bounds to his ambition and arms, seemed to trust all to his good fortune and military skill.

Count Daun arriving at Boemischrod, within a few miles of Prague, the day after the defeat of the grand army, he began to collect the fugitive corps that had fled from the fate of that day; and soon assembled a force so considerable as to attract the attention of his Prussian majesty, who detached the prince of Bevern with twenty battalions and thirty squadrons to observe his motions, and with orders to attack him before his numbers should become too formidable: but Daun acted on more sure principles than to stake the ruin of a cause he was sent to retrieve, on the chance of a battle, with troops that were sunk in disgrace, and in want almost of every necessary, against an army flushed with victory, and abounding with all conveniencies for subsistence and action. Accordingly, he no sooner heard that the prince of Bevern was on his march towards him, than he retreated to the Elbe, and intrenched himself strongly in a camp at Mallechau near Kolin, opened a way for the daily supply of recruits sent to his army, and by this conduct and situation inspired the garrison of Prague with fresh courage, who expected soon to be relieved.

In the mean time the king of Prussia, distracted with impatience at the length of the siege of Prague, whose surrender within a few days after being invested he had looked upon as certain; and finding that count Daun's army was daily increasing, and would soon be able not only to oppose the detachment under the prince of Bevern, but even in a condition to raise the siege; resolved to march and give the count battle with one part of his army, while he kept Prague blocked up with the other. Marshal Keith remonstrated earnestly against this measure, and advised him to wait for the Austrians attempting to raise the siege, as thirty-two thousand men, which was the whole number set apart by the king for that service, was a very inadequate force to attack an army of sixty thousand men (for so many did Daun by this time count under him) commanded by a brave and experienced general. Impetuous in valour, and blinded with his amazing successes, Frederic rejected this sage counsel, bid defiance to all opposition, and on the thirteenth of June quitted the camp before Prague, escorted by a few battalions and squadrons, with which he joined the prince of Bevern's army at Milkowitz. After this junction the king advanced on the eighteenth towards Kolin, in the neighbourhood of which count Daun had his camp, defended by a prodigious train of artillery which he had caused to be brought from Olmutz, and had placed on redoubts and batteries erected on the most advantageous posts, with lines and heavy pieces of cannon at every accessible part of the camp.

When the Prussians came in sight of the enemy, they found them drawn up in three lines, on a very high ground, between Genlitz and St. John the Baptist, which was rendered almost inaccessible by several difficult defiles that ran along the foot of the hills. Notwithstanding this advantageous position, his majesty began the attack between two and three in the afternoon, and made himself master of two eminences, on which were the enemy's principal batteries, and two villages defended with infantry; but could not force the third post, the fire of the enemy was so violent, though they returned seven times successively to the charge, led on by that valiant soldier and great general prince Ferdinand: but as their cavalry could not act in their support, they were obliged to give it up. The king was now in an agony of despair at the fatal consequences that were likely to attend his precipitate resolution, taken contrary to the good advice of a faithful servant, whose valour was tutored by experience. He resolved, however, to make one more furious effort to retrieve, if possible, the disgrace he had sustained. With this resolution, he put himself at the head of his cavalry, and attacked the left wing of the enemy with the greatest bravery, exposing his person in the most perilous situations, in order to animate his men: but his was a lost cause; the enemy repulsed all his efforts. Fortune however befriended him so far, that he drew off his forces, with all his baggage and artillery, in good order, in sight of the enemy, without their making one attempt to pursue him. Thus ended an action that might more properly be called a carnage than a battle, both armies losing a prodigious number of men. The Prussians had upwards of eight thousand killed and wounded, and a great number were made prisoners or deserted. The Austrians had above ten thousand killed and wounded.

Having seen his army make good their retreat, the king of Prussia's next and immediate care was to prevent the bad effects of this day's work, should the news thereof reach Prague before he could take proper measures to secure that part of his troops, artillery, &c. employed in the siege of that city. Therefore, though he had been on horseback all day, and present at every attack, he left his army at Nimburg, under the command of the prince of Bevern, and with an escort of twelve or fourteen hussars only set out for Prague, where he arrived next morning, and immediately gave orders for sending off all his artillery, ammunition, and baggage, which were all safely withdrawn; and the troops had begun their retreat before the Austrians in the city heard of the battle; but when they saw the Prussians retiring, a large body of them sallied out under the command of prince Charles of Lorraine (marshal Brown being by this time dead of his wounds) and came up with the rear of the Prussians, but found it so well covered that they could do very little execution.

Count Daun now entered the city of Prague, amidst the loud acclamations of the imprisoned Austrians, who received him as their deliverer; and the united forces of the imperial generals being now greatly superior to those of the king of Prussia, that prince was in a short time obliged to evacuate Bohemia and retire into Saxony. The king attributed the loss of the battle of Kolin wholly to himself. The candour with which he acknowledged his mistake is so extraordinary in a king and a conqueror, that I am persuaded the reader will not be displeased to hear it in his majesty's own words, in a letter to the earl Marischal, which also gives the best narrative and proof of this affair. He first does justice to the valour of his enemy: "The imperial grenadiers, says he, are a noble corps: one hundred companies defended a rising ground which my best infantry could not carry. Ferdinand, who commanded them, returned seven times to the charge; but to no purpose. At first he mastered a battery, but could not hold it. The enemy had the advantage of a numerous and well-served artillery. It did honour to Lichtenstein who had the direction. Only the Prussian army can dispute it with him. My infantry were too few. All my cavalry were present, and idle spectators, excepting a bold push by my household troops and some dragoons. Ferdinand attacked without powder; the enemy, in return, were not sparing of theirs. They had the advantage of a rising ground, of intrenchments, and of a prodigious artillery. Several of my regiments were repulsed by their musquetry. Henry performed wonders. I tremble for my worthy brothers: they are too brave. Fortune turned her back on me this day. I ought to have expected it: she is a female, and I am no gallant. In fact, I ought to have had more infantry. Success, my dear lord, often occasions a destructive confidence. Twenty-four battalions were not sufficient to dislodge sixty thousand men from an advantageous post. Another time we will do better. I have no reason to complain of the bravery of my troops, or the experience of my officers: I alone was in fault, and I hope to repair it." Then, after taking notice of the formidable confederacy against him, he concludes thus: "I know not whether it will be a disgrace to to me to submit; but I am sure there will be no glory in vanquishing me."

He supported his disaster, however, with a magnanimity that did him infinite honour; and notwithstanding his severe trial, and the melancholy prospect that surrounded him, he soon rose above his misfortunes, and by an amazing vicissitude of events, turned his disgrace upon his enemies with ample retaliation. We shall leave him, however, for the present, and turn our eyes to the other side of Germany, which we shall find involved in the general bloodshed and confusion that now began to desolate the whole empire.

When the designs of the French upon the electorate of Hanover became too obvious to admit of the least doubt, it was thought high time for his Britannic majesty to take such steps as might most effectually conduce to the defence and preservation of his paternal dominions: therefore, very early in the spring of this year, orders were sent thither to recruit the troops that had been sent back from England, to augment each company, to remount the cavalry with the utmost expedition, and not to suffer any horses to be conveyed out of the electorate; as also to provide the magazines in that country with all things necessary for fifty thousand men, who were to form an army of observation.

But such was the equity of his Britannic majesty, and his precaution to avoid the least apparent cause of provocation to any power to invade his German dominions, that he would not bring an army into the field until he had published to the world the just motives that had compelled him to have recourse to those means Providence had put in his power to repel the hostile designs of his enemies. Accordingly, he emitted the following declaration or manifesto, dated at Hanover, in the month of April:

"His Britannic majesty, elector of Brunswic-Lunenbourg, did his utmost to prevent the war which hath arisen between him, as king, and the crown of France, and to regulate in an amicable manner the differences which occasioned it. His majesty's endeavours for this end having proved ineffectual, he made it his study to hinder the war from spreading, and the peace of his German dominions in particular, and that of the empire in general, from being involved in disturbances, in the motives whereof they had no concern.

"For these reasons, and in consideration of the great probability in the autumn of 1755, that the crown of France, in resentment of those differences, meditated an attack upon the king's German dominions, his majesty in the beginning of the following year concluded a treaty with the king of Prussia; the intention whereof was, to compel that crown to drop its designs, which it was natural to expect would be the consequence. And another war having, contrary to his majesty's expectation, broke out soon after in the heart of Germany, his majesty has carefully avoided taking any part in it.

"It is impossible for the impartial world, after considering his Britannic majesty's conduct on this occasion, which manifestly tended only to the aforesaid ends, not to see the injustice of the motives and pretexts which the court of France would allege to justify their invasion of the electoral territories of Brunswic, which are under the protection of the empire. If they build their pretext on the war that has broke out between England and France, it is evident that this war, both in its rise and object, are entirely foreign to his majesty, as elector, and to his German territories. As to the second war, namely, that which hath been lighted up in Germany, the crown of France, as guarantee of the peace of Westphalia, hath not, on one hand, the least pretext to act against the aforesaid states, whilst they cannot convict his majesty of any contravention of the said peace: and, on the other hand, France cannot, as the ally and auxiliary of the empress-queen of Hungary and Bohemia, act against a member of the empire, who is not at war, nor hath the least difference with her imperial and royal majesty.

"Whereas, nevertheless, a numerous French army hath entered the empire by Westphalia, which, after putting a garrison in the imperial city of Cologne, is advancing towards the electoral dominions of Brunswic, hath already penetrated into the bishopric of Munster, and there exacted contributions; by which their views and designs against the said electoral dominions of Brunswic are clearly manifested: his Britannic majesty, as elector of Brunswic Lunenbourg, sees himself unwillingly reduced to the indispensable necessity of assembling an army, and ordering it to march, in order to divert, with the assistance of the Most High, all violence, injustice, and usurpation from his own dominions, and those of his neighbours.

"In order to prevent any person from being deceived by a groundless suspicion, his majesty would not omit this opportunity of declaring, in the face of the whole empire, that he is very far from designing to act offensively against any of his co-estates in the empire, nor even against the crown of France: and that by the armament and march of his forces, to which step he has been forced, he seeks only to divert, as has been said, with the Divine Blessing, all invasion, violence, and hostility; and do in that event, as a principal member of the empire, what is just in the sight of God and man, and what he owes to the safety of the country which God hath entrusted to him.

"He rests assured, that no person will misconstrue or misinterpret the justice of this self-defence to which he is forced: in particular, he trusts to the amicable confidence of his co-estates in the empire, that they will not counteract his views, which are favourable to themselves, and tend to remove war and its calamities from their frontiers; but that they will rather concur with and promote them: that, knowing that his majesty's forces will observe the most rigorous discipline, they will, in return, give them proofs of their good-will, particularly, by supplying them, for ready money, with what provisions and forage they may stand in need of; and, in fine, that they will not furnish to the adverse party the smallest thing that may be prejudicial to his dominions or to their own."

This declaration was immediately followed by assembling the army of observation, which consisted of Hanoverians, Hessians, and the troops of some less respectable states, to the amount of forty-seven thousand men, to be joined by a body of three thousand Prussians; the whole to be under the command of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, who, as we have already observed, set out from England in the month of April to put himself at their head.

As soon as his royal highness arrived at Hanover, he immediately put the troops in motion, and ordered them to repair to the camp marked out between Hamelen and Nienburg. In a few days after the army passed the Weser, and arrived at the camp at Bielefeldt, and took possession of the castle of Retberg, which the French had abandoned. Here the duke fixed his head-quarters, to be at hand to learn the disposition of the French army, and act in consequence. Hither also the generals appointed to command the several divisions repaired, to concert the plan of operations with their royal commander.

His royal highness's army was posted in the following manner: at Bielefeldt, six battalions and six squadrons, under the command of lieutenant-general baron de Sporcken; six battalions under lieutenant-general de Block, at Hervorden; six battalions and four squadrons, under major-general Ledebour, between Hervord and Minden; seven battalions and ten squadrons, under lieutenant-general d'Oberg, in the neighbourhood of Hamelen; and five battalions and four squadrons, under major-general de Haufs, near Nienburg.

This was certainly a most admirable disposition; but his highness soon receiving intelligence that the French army assembled on the Lower Rhine and the duchy of Cleves, consisting at that time of seventy battalions (of six hundred men each) forty squadrons (of three hundred men each) and fifty-two pieces of cannon, under the command of the marshals d'Etrées and Contades, had received orders to march forward, and that the design of this march must be to get between him and the Weser, he determined at length to break up his camp at Bielefeldt, and remove to a more advantageous and safe situation, as it was impossible on that ground to withstand the vast superiority of men the French generals were bringing against him. Accordingly, on the thirteenth of June he ordered his army to proceed towards Hervorden; and on the fourteenth the allies encamped at Cofeldt, and staid there the next day. These motions of his royal highness induced the French generals to march forward with their army, and either oblige the duke to repass the Weser or to stand a battle: but being too weak for the latter, he chose to retire as the French approached; and on the twentieth of June repassed the Weser, and encamped his troops between Minden and Oldendorp, in a most advantageous situation, having the Weser in front, and the right and left covered with eminences and morasses. In the mean time, the French fixed their head-quarters at Bielefeldt, which the allies had abandoned.

It was universally believed that, in this situation, the army of the allies would have vigorously disputed with the French the passage of the Weser, which secures Hanover against foreign attacks; but how greatly was the world disappointed in its expectations, when they were informed by authority that the French, after possessing themselves of Embden, had passed that river on the tenth and eleventh of July with their whole army, without the loss of a single man! By the accounts transmitted of this affair, we find, that while marshal d'Etrées, by feigned marches, concealed from the duke of Cumberland the real dispositions that were made for passing the Weser, the marquis d'Armentieres, who had laid his bridges between Hoxter and Blanckenow, in the district of the abbey of Corby, passed that river with ten battalions, twelve squadrons, and ten pieces of cannon. The duke of Cumberland could not oppose it, as he lay with his army below Hamelen, extending towards the Lower Weser; and the duke de Broglie and M. de Chevert, each with a body of troops, drew his attention towards Minden and Rintelen. The last-mentioned town was defended by a fort, in which were three hundred Hessians, who surrendered prisoners of war. The French abandoned that fort, after taking out of it twelve iron cannon, two culverins, two mortars, and what stores they found in it.

By the afternoon of the eleventh the whole of the French army had effected its passage; and having seized the important pass of Stadt Oldendorff, they pitched their camp upon the fine plain of that name. The French proceeded immediately to raise heavy contributions in Hanover, their general sending to the regency of that electorate a requisition, demanding that deputies should be sent to his head-quarters to treat about the matter; with which they were obliged to comply.

His royal highness the duke of Cumberland having no longer any reason to doubt that the French were bent upon attacking him, he drew up his little army on the heights between the Weser and the woods, with his right towards the river, and his left close to the woods; on the point of which he erected a battery of twelve pounders and haubiters, supported by the hunters and two battalions of grenadiers, posted in the corner of the wood, upon the left of the battery, under the command of major-general Schulemberg, with the village of Hastenbeck in his front. There was a hollow way from the left of the village to the battery, and a continual morass on the other side of Hastenbeck to his right. In the evening of the twenty-fourth of July he called in all his out-posts, and kept the whole army on their arms all night.

On the twenty-fifth in the morning the French army was seen advancing in columns, and soon began to cannonade the allies very severely, which they continued the whole day, and made several feints as if they intended to attack the right, the left, and the center; but nothing was done that day. The duke's army continued on their arms all the next night. The battery at the end of the wood was repaired, and count Schulemberg reinforced with six battalions of grenadiers, under major-general Hardenberg, and two pieces of twelve pounders. His royal highness also gave orders for erecting a battery of twelve and six pounders behind the village of Hastenbeck; and, in fine, took all the precautions that the best general could possibly do to give the foe a warm reception; and as soon as it was day-light got on horseback to reconnoitre their position, which he found to be the same as on the preceding day. At a little after five the French began a very smart cannonading upon the battery behind the village that was supported by the Hessian infantry and cavalry, whose countenance and steadiness, amidst so severe a fire, was truly admirable. Between seven and eight the firing of small arms began on the left of the allies, when his royal highness ordered major-general Behr, with three battalions of Brunswickers, to support the grenadiers in the wood if their assistance should be wanted. The cannonading went on all the time, rather augmenting than decreasing; but it did not create the least disorder in the confederate troops.

The fire of the small arms on the left increased, and the French seemed rather to gain ground; whereupon the duke detached three Hanoverian battalions and six squadrons round the wood by Afforde, who towards the close of the day drove several squadrons of the enemy back to their army. The grenadiers in the wood, however, apprehensive of being surrounded, from the great numbers of the enemy that appeared there, and were marching round on that side, thought it adviseable to retire nearer the left of their own army; by which unfortunate motion the French got possession of the Hanoverian battery on the left without opposition. On this occasion the hereditary prince of Brunswick distinguished himself, at the head of a battalion of Wolfenbuttle guards, and another of Hanoverians, who with their bayonets fixed retook the battery from a much superior force of the enemy: but the French being in possession of a height that commanded and flanked both our lines of infantry and our battery; which attack they could support under cover of a hill, and his royal highness could not dispute without exposing his flank both to the artillery and musquetry; and finding it was impossible to dislodge them without exposing his own troops to too great a hazard, he ordered a retreat, which was effected in the greatest order, to Hamelen, without the least molestation on the part of the enemy, whether it was owing to what they had suffered, or to the firm countenance of the allied troops. The loss of the allies in this engagement, which may be said to have lasted three days, was five hundred and forty seven killed and missing, and nine hundred and seven wounded. The French, according to their own accounts, lost two thousand and upwards; but they gave out that it would not have exceeded seven or eight hundred killed and wounded, had it not been for a mistake between a regiment of Beauce and that called the Little Switzers, which fired upon each other so long and so furiously, that the latter was almost destroyed. Wherever the blame of this blunder lay, it certainly was of great advantage to the duke in making his retreat unobserved, and without pursuit.

The duke of Cumberland made but a short stay at Hamelen; and leaving a small detachment for its defence, continued his route to Nienburg, where he encamped. As for Hamelen, it soon submitted to the French, who dismantled the walls, and carried off sixty pieces of brass cannon, several mortars, with large quantities of provision and ammunition, and even part of the equipage of the allied army. Here the French halted for some time; and here it was that M. d'Etrées was, by the order of his most Christian majesty, obliged to resign the command in chief of the French forces to the duke de Richelieu, who had been raised to that post by court intrigue, through the means of madame de Pompadour, Lewis's female favourite. Two days after Richelieu's arrival at the French camp, which was in the beginning of August, he detached the duke de Chevreuse to take possession of the city of Hanover, with the title of governor of that city. The regency finding that all the measures taken for their defence were now of no use, enjoined the inhabitants to remain quiet, and receive the French within their walls without opposition: upon which the Hanoverian garrison, after being disarmed, was left at liberty to go where they pleased; but an ordonnance was published by the new governor, enjoining the inhabitants to dispose of their fire-arms, of what kind soever, under severe penalties.

About the same time marshal Contades, who had been sent with a detachment to reduce the territories of Hesse Cassel, was met at Warburg by the prince of Hesse's master of the horse, who declared in his master's name, that the French should be furnished with every thing the country could afford; and the magistrates of Cassel presented the marshal with the keys of the city gates. The marquis d'Armentieres, another French general, ordered Gottingen to supply him, within a limited time, under pain of military execution, with four thousand pounds of white bread and two thousand bushels of oats, which was more than the whole country could afford, an hundred loads of hay, and other provisions.

The duke of Cumberland continued all this time retreating from Nienburg: he retired into the duchy of Verden, and from thence to Stade, where the archives and many valuable effects of the electorate of Hanover had been deposited. His royal highness reinforced the garrison of this city with two regiments, and a camp was marked out on the glacié for the army. All the provisions and forage which he had at Verden were brought hither, his royal highness being made to believe that he should be able to maintain his ground between the Aller and the Elbe, and be effectually supported by four English men of war which at that time lay off the port of Stade, in case the French should attempt to attack him.

It must be confessed that his royal highness made the wisest dispositions for a defence; but what could avail the greatest generalship without an army capable of disputing the ground with an enemy that was in a condition, and determined to force their way? Richelieu followed the duke step by step with his whole army, as far as the Aller. He hemmed the allied army in on every side; and notwithstanding the four English men of war just mentioned, got possession of a fort at the mouth of the Zwinga, which cut off the duke's communication with the Elbe.

The two armies being now very near each other, many skirmishes happened, and several places were taken and retaken. But the duke's army, though in a strong situation, was by far too weak to think of holding out against the numerous forces of the French, which, as I have already observed, almost surrounded him. Under this pressure of untoward circumstances, not in a condition to fight, nor in a situation, there appeared no other possible means of preventing the total destruction of the allied army but by coming to some sort of terms with the enemy. The king of Denmark opportunely stepped forth and interposed his mediation, which was accepted by the commanders in chief of both armies; and on the eighth of September, 1757, the duke of Cumberland signed a convention for a neutrality with the French, well known by the name of the Convention of Closter Seven, from the place where it was signed, and by which thirty-eight thousand Hanoverians laid down their arms, and were dispersed into different quarters of cantonment.

The overtures for this convention, it seems, were made by the regency of Hanover, without the participation of the British court. Now, as by this step the king of Prussia's dominions were exposed to the whole power of France on that side, it was but natural to suppose that such a procedure might perhaps be a means of lessening, if not dissolving, that confidence and mutual friendship which subsisted between their Prussian and Britannic majesties: and indeed his Prussian majesty no sooner was apprised of the convention of Closter Seven being signed with the French marshal, than he wrote a very sharp letter with his own hand to the king of England on that subject, in which he complained bitterly of being made a sacrifice; and peremptorily insisted upon his majesty's not listening to any engagement in which he was not comprehended. His Britannic majesty, in answer to this letter, thought proper to order a declaration to be communicated to all foreign ministers residing at the British court, on the sixteenth of September, in which he disclaimed any share in making the said convention, and declared his resolution to act in constant concert with the king of Prussia, in employing the most efficacious means to frustrate the unjust and oppressive designs of their common enemies; promising at the same time punctually to fulfil all his engagements with his Prussian majesty, and to support him with firmness and vigour.

The convention of Closter Seven, however, was attended with the most fatal consequences to the king of Prussia, who was thereby not only deprived of the assistance of near forty thousand good troops, but also actually invaded by his numerous enemies on all sides, the duke de Richelieu soon after entering the Prussian territories, near Wolfenbüttele, with one hundred and ten battalions, one hundred and fifty squadrons, and one hundred pieces of cannon; and penetrating into Halberstadt and Brandenburg-Prussia, plundering the towns, exacting contributions, and committing such excesses that would give horror in the relation. Nor were the French the only enemy let loose upon his Prussian majesty. The Russians, who for a long time had proceeded but slowly, all at once quickened their march, and entered Ducal Prussia, under marshal Apraxin and general Fermor, marking their progress by every inhumanity that could be expected from an army of lawless barbarians. A large body of Austrians entering Silesia, advanced as far as Breslau; then turning back, they laid siege to Schweidnitz, the key to Silesia. Another body entered Lusatia, another quarter of the Prussian territories, and made themselves masters of Zittau. Twenty-two thousand Swedes penetrated into Prussian Pomerania, reduced the towns of Anclam and Demmin, and laid the whole country under contribution. The army of the empire, reinforced by that of prince Soubise, was preparing to enter Saxony, and thus left the Austrians under count Daun at liberty to turn the greatest part of their forces to the reduction of Silesia. Another body of Austrians piercing through Lusatia, passed by the Prussian armies, and suddenly presenting itself before the gates of Berlin, laid the whole country under contribution.

The total ruin of his Prussian majesty was now generally prognosticated; but he met with effectual resources in the fidelity and bravery of his troops, and his own courage and policy. The Russians were the first object that drew his attention: he therefore detached field-marshal Lehwald into Prussia with an army of thirty thousand men, to endeavour to stop the inhuman ravages of those savage invaders, during the absence of his master. This general was encamped at Velau, when the Russians, to the number of eighty thousand, after taking Memel, the first town in Ducal Prussia, in the month of July, pitched their camp in a well-fortified situation, near Nertutten. Notwithstanding their great superiority, M. Lehwald, provoked by the distresses of a country he was not able to defend or deliver from the cruel invaders by any other means, determined to attack them in their intrenchments with his little army. Having sent colonel Malachowski with a party to reconnoitre the position of the enemy, he gave orders for beginning the attack the next day, being the 30th of August.

The Russian army was formed in four lines, each line defended by a numerous artillery, and with batteries erected on all the eminences, containing in all two hundred pieces of cannon. The Prussians began the attack at five in the morning, which was carried on with so much vigour, that the whole first line of the enemy was entirely broken, and they were driven from all their batteries. The duke of Holstein Gottorp, brother to the king of Sweden, at the head of his regiment of dragoons, routed the Russian cavalry, and afterwards fell upon a regiment of grenadiers, which he cut in pieces; but when the Prussians came to the second intrenchment, M. Lehwald, seeing he could not attempt it without exposing his whole army, took the resolution to retire, which he did in the best manner, and without the enemy's daring to stir out of their intrenchments to pursue him. The Prussian army returned to its camp at Velau.

The loss of the Prussians did not exceed three thousand killed and wounded; whereas that of the Russians amounted to upwards of ten thousand. General Lapuchin was wounded and taken prisoner, but was sent back upon his parole. The Prussian army had at first made themselves masters of above eighty pieces of cannon; but these they were obliged to abandon, with eleven of their own, for want of carriages. Three Russian generals were killed, but the Prussians lost no general nor officer of distinction.

After this engagement, M. Lehwald altered the position of his army, by drawing towards Peterfswald; and the Russians, after remaining quite inactive till the thirteenth of September, on a sudden, to the great surprize of every one, retreated out of Prussia with such precipitation, that they left all their sick and wounded behind them, to the amount of fifteen or sixteen thousand, together with eighty pieces of cannon, and a considerable part of their military stores. They made their retreat in two columns, one of which bent its course towards Memel, whilst the other took the nearest way way through the bailiwick of Abfternen. Both columns burnt every village they passed through without distinction, and strewed the roads with the mangled bodies of the wretched inhabitants. M. Lehwald detached prince George of Holstein with ten thousand horse in pursuit of these barbarians; but he was stopped in his course, by the bridges thrown over the river Memel having been broke down by the violence of the stream.

It does not at this time appear what could be the real cause of this sudden retreat of the Russians; but as the czarina was about this time seized with an apoplectic fit, it was given out that the army was ordered home, to support the regulations she had made about a successor, in case of a vacancy in the throne. It is most probable they wanted subsistence. However this might be, his Prussian majesty was by this turn delivered from the powerful diversion made to his arms by the Russians in favour of Austria: but his affairs were still in a very deplorable condition. He had no troops to spare for the defence of his territories invaded by the French, nor to give them battle; wherefore the French marshal revelled with impunity in the open country, collecting the public revenues, and fattening on the contributions which he drew from thence and the electorate of Hanover, and other conquests which defrayed the expences of the war. Gueldres was reduced, after a long blockade, on the twenty-fourth of August; so that the whole country was exposed to the enemy as far as Magdebourg.

Just before the retreat of the Russians, the Swedes, who had now resolved upon an open rupture with his Prussian majesty, invaded Prussian Pomerania with an army of twenty-two thousand men, seized upon Anclam and Demmin, and prepared to do the same by Sterin, the capital of the duchy of that name. While every one was greatly at a loss to account for the reason of this invasion, the Swedish commander, count Hamilton, published the following declaration in vindication of his master's conduct: "That the king of Sweden, as guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia, could not help sending his troops into the upper part of the duchy of Pomerania belonging to the king of Prussia; and that therefore all the officers appointed to receive the public revenue in that country, must pay what money they had in their hands to general Hamilton, who was commissioned to receive the same for his Swedish majesty: that, moreover, an exact account was required within eight days of the revenues of the country; but that no more than ordinary contributions would be demanded of the inhabitants, who might rest assured that the Swedish troops should be made to observe the strictest discipline."

To this declaration his Prussian majesty replied, by his general Manteuffel (who had a command of twelve thousand men in Pomerania, to cover Stetin from any surprize) "That the crown of Sweden could not, upon any legal foundation, lay any thing to his charge, to make it appear that he really disturbed the peace of Westphalia; and enjoined his vassals, magistrates, and subjects, in the Anterior Pomerania, not to pay any regard to the Swedish declarations, but to preserve their fidelity and allegiance to him their lawful sovereign, upon pain of incurring his most rigorous indignation."

While both sides were thus employed in defending their respective measures, M. Lehwald finding himself at liberty by the drawing off of the Russians, detached prince George of Holstein Gottorp to the relief of Pomerania with sixteen thousand men, and soon after followed with the rest of his army. The Swedes were in expectation of being joined by fifteen thousand French and six thousand Mecklenburgers; but M. Lehwald coming upon them so opportunely prevented this junction; and the Swedish general was reduced to such straits that he retired with the utmost precipitation. In a word, the Prussian general not only recovered all the country the enemy had seized upon, and drove them entirely away, but, by the end of the year, added to his master's dominions all Swedish Pomerania, except the fortified town of Stralsund. Thus ended the Swedish campaign, after their army, without fighting a single battle, had been reduced by sickness, desertion, and other accidents, to one half the number it consisted of when they first took the field.

It may not be improper to take notice here of some events, which could not easily be introduced before without breaking the thread of my narration.

Towards the beginning of July the empress-queen recalled her ministers, count Colorado and monsieur Zohern, from London; in consequence of which, Mr. Keith, our minister at the imperial court, set out from Vienna; as did also Mr. Dayrolles, our resident at Brussels, about the latter end of the same month.

Much about the same time an order was issued by the imperial court for all communication with England to be broke off; and our vice-consul at Ostend was desired to order the packet-boats and British shipping at Ostend, Bruges, and Nieuport, to depart in twenty-four hours, and not to return into any of the ports of the empress-queen till farther measures should be concerted; which order was immediately obeyed. In this ordonnance the following reasons were assigned by the court of Vienna, for thus excluding the English from ports that had been procured for that house by English arms and treasures, viz. "That her Imperial majesty, the empress-queen, could not with indifference behold England, instead of giving the succours due to her by the most solemn treaties, enter into an alliance with her enemy the king of Prussia, and actually afford him all manner of assistance, assembling armies to oppose those which the most Christian king, her ally, had sent to her aid; and suffering privateers to exercise open violence in her roads, under the cannon of her ports and coasts, without giving the least satisfaction or answer to the complaints made on that account; and the king of Great Britain himself, at the very time she was offering him a neutrality for Hanover, publishing by a message to his parliament, that she had formed, with the most Christian king, dangerous designs against that electorate: therefore her majesty, desirous of providing for the security of her ports, judged it expedient to give the fore-mentioned orders; and at the same time to declare, that she could no longer permit a free communication between her subjects and the English, which had hitherto been founded upon treaties that Great Britain had, without scruple, openly violated."

But notwithstanding these orders, they suffered our packet-boats with letters to pass as usual to and from Ostend, as the postage of our letters brought in a good revenue to the post-office of the Austrian Netherlands. Ostend and Nieuport, however, by order of her Imperial majesty, admitted each of them a French garrison, though the empress still reserved to herself in both of them the full and free exercise of all her rights of sovereignty, an oath being administered to the French commandant for this purpose. The magistracy of Hamburgh had likewise notice given them, in the names of their Imperial and French majesties, not to admit any English men of war or transports into their harbour, on pain of having a French garrison sent to take possession of their city. Lastly, before the end of the year, the Aulic council issued a decree against the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, on account of his conduct in the present conjuncture of affairs.

I will now resume the history of military transactions, beginning with those conducted by his Prussian majesty.

Upon that monarch's quitting Bohemia, after the unfortunate battle of Kolin, he retired, as we have already observed, towards Saxony, when he pitched his camp at Leitmeritz, on the river Elbe. Various skirmishes, and some disadvantageous actions, followed the loss at Kolin. Gabel, an important pass, and well garrisoned with four battalions, under the command of major-general Puttkammer, situate between Boemish-Leypa and Zittau, was surprised and taken by a strong detachment of Austrians, under the command of the duke of Aremberg and M. Macguire, on the eighteenth of June. Prince Henry of Prussia, the king's brother, who had been sent with a detachment to watch their motions, was soon after in danger of being surrounded by the enemy, who followed him, laid Zittau, a strong trading town in Upper Saxony, in ashes, by a dreadful bombardment, and obliged the garrison to surrender. This called for immediate relief. His Prussian majesty did not hesitate a moment to quit his camp, with part of his army; and leaving the remainder under M. Keith, to guard the passes of the mountains of Bohemia, he by forced marches came suddenly upon the Austrians near Bautzen, obliged them to retire, and delivered his brother's army. The king was soon after joined, between Bautzen and Gorlitz, by M. Keith, whom he had ordered to quit the mountains of Bohemia, when the united force of these two armies amounted to sixty thousand men, besides twelve battalions and ten squadrons which were stationed at Pirna, under the prince of Anhalt Dessau, to prevent any surprize from Dresden.

By this time his Prussian majesty had received undoubted intelligence that the army of the empire, commanded by the prince of Saxe Hildburghausen, and that of the French under the prince de Soubise, making together about sixty thousand men, were advancing towards Saxony, in order to recover that electorate from him. He determined, if possible, to force the Austrians to a battle, before the imperial army should have time to effect its designs. With this view, he transferred his head quarters to Bernstedel, and on the fifteenth day of August came in sight of the Austrian camp, and within cannon-shot of it. In this position the king continued five days, trying every expedient to bring the Austrians to a battle, who as constantly declined it, notwithstanding their prodigious superiority, being at least one hundred and thirty thousand strong, which was more than double the forces of the king of Prussia. The king, finding all his art and stratagem could not bring his design to bear; and hearing that the army of execution were now advanced as far as Erfurth in Saxony, he set out from Lusatia, accompanied by M. Keith and thirty thousand men, leaving the rest of his army in a strong camp near Gorlitz, under the prince of Bevern, to observe the enemy's motions. He now made a quick march by the way of Leipfic towards Erfurth, to give battle to the combined army of the French and the empire; but by the time he arrived at Erfurth, which was on the fourteenth of September, the combined army had retreated to Gotha; and it was generally supposed they would retreat farther back, until they could be joined by a large detachment which they expected from Richelieu's army, who, after the signing of the convention of Closter Seven, had entered the country of Halberstadt. Against him the king of Prussia detached prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, who scoured the country, beat up the quarters of the French at Egelin, and made twenty officers and four hundred soldiers prisoners; but when the grand army advanced against him, he retired to Wansleben, where he so posted himself as to cut off all supplies of provision from the enemy.

After the king of Prussia had left Lusatia, the Austrians came out of their camp; and after a bloody skirmish, in which they had considerably the advantage, obliged the prince of Bevern to retreat with the Prussian army from Gorlitz to Rothenberg; from whence he proceeded to Buntzlau in Silesia, and by a forced march reached Breslau on the first of October, without suffering any farther loss, though the numerous Austrian army was for some days always in his rear. The prince chose a very strong camp on the river Oder, where he intrenched himself, and in that position remained to cover the last-mentioned city. In the meantime, the Austrians made themselves masters of Lignitz, and a considerable part of Silesia.

From Gotha the combined army, on the approach of his Prussian majesty, retreated towards Eysenach, where they intrenched themselves in a very strong camp. By the nineteenth of September the Prussian army was advanced to the neighbourhood of Gotha; on which day a skirmish happened between the advanced parties of the two armies, in which general Seydelitz defeated a large corps of the enemy, consisting of two regiments of Austrian hussars, one regiment of French hussars, and a detachment made up of French grenadiers, besides a numerous body of Croats and Pandours; obliged them to abandon the town and castle of Gotha, of which they had possessed themselves, and to retire with great precipitation to their main army. In this action the Prussian general took several officers prisoners, and killed about three hundred men. Soon after this skirmish the king of Prussia advanced to Eysenach, with a design to attack the combined army; but they were so strongly intrenched that it was impracticable; and as he found he could not provoke or draw them out of their camp, he was obliged, by scarcity of provisions, to return back to Erfurth, and soon after towards towards Naumburg: whereupon the combined army marched, and again took possession of Gotha, Erfurth, and Weimar.

The king of Prussia, finding that all his attempts to draw the enemy from their intrenchments to engage him in the open field were fruitless, had recourse to one of those masterly strokes by which a general is better seen than even by the gaining a victory. He made a feint about the beginning of October, as if he intended to march to Berlin with the greatest part of his army, leaving general Keith with only seven or eight thousand men to defend Leipzig. Upon this the French and German generals, believing their passage was now open; and knowing how much the Prussian forces were divided, and at great distances from each other, they resolved to seize the opportunity of making themselves masters of the course of the river Sala, of Leipzig, and of the Prussian magazines at Torgau. Accordingly, having advanced to the Sala, they crossed that river, presented themselves before Leipzig, and summoned M. Keith to surrender. To which that gallant general answered, That the king his master had ordered him to defend the place to the last extremity, and he would obey his command. The enemy then thought of laying siege to the town; but before they could make any one preparation for that purpose, they were alarmed by the approach of the king of Prussia, who, wisely foreseeing the effect of his feint, had by previous and private orders collected together all his distant detachments, some of which were twenty leagues asunder. The Prussian army arrived near Leipzig on the twenty-seventh day of October, and remained the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth, when every body expected that a battle would be fought in the plains of Lutzen: but the enemy, who still continued bashful, had, on advice of the king's approach, repassed the Sala, and burnt down the bridges over that river; but they were soon repaired, and the whole Prussian army crossed over, and on November 3, in the evening, drew up over-against the enemy. This brought on the ever-memorable battle of Rosbach, fought on the fifth of November, 1757. The king was going to make the attack on the fourth, but deferred it on perceiving that the enemy had changed the position of their camp. That whole day, therefore, was spent in a cannonade, which did no great execution on either side. The king of Prussia, in the mean time, made the necessary dispositions, agreeable to what he had reconnoitred of the enemy.

This delay of the Prussian army seems to have misled the enemy into a notion, that they had no disposition to risque an action with the combined army, who were very advantageously posted; and to determine them not only to wait for the Prussians, but to attack them in their camp at Rosbach: for on the fifth of November, about nine o'clock in the morning, the infantry of the combined army, which had drawn nearer upon the rising grounds towards the Prussian camp, filed off to the right, and the whole army was put in motion. It was two o'clock at noon, however, before the king of Prussia could form any certain judgment of the intention of the enemy's movements, which were various and complicated. At length, however, it was manifest that they intended to attack him, and that their dispositions were made with a view to surround the Prussian army, and to open the action by an attack on its rear. His Prussian majesty, however, with that presence of mind and military skill peculiar to himself, caught them in their own snare. He drew up his army in order of battle, and by a half turn to the right marched parallel with the enemy.

In this position, and just before the battle began, the king made the following speech to his army: "My dear friends! the hour is come, in which all that is, or ought to be dear to us, depends upon the swords which are now drawn for the battle. Time permits me to say but little; nor is there occasion to say much. You know, that there is no labour, no hunger, no cold, no watching, no danger, that I have not shared with you hitherto; and you now see me ready to lay down my life with you, and for you. All I ask is the same pledge of fidelity and affection that I give. And let me add, not as an incitement to your courage, but as a testimony of my own gratitude, that, from this hour, until you go into quarters, your pay shall be doubled. Acquit yourselves like men, and put your confidence in God." The effect of this speech may be more readily conceived than described. An universal shout proclaimed the general emotion. An heroic phrenzy seemed to take possession of every individual; and to this disposition the victory that ensued may perhaps be in a great measure ascribed, since we want not many instances in history, where prodigious superiority of numbers have been forced to give way before the martial enthusiasm of a handful of men.

The following is the account of this famous battle, as published by authority, from the best relations transmitted from the scene of action:

"The king of Prussia having taken the resolution to march up to the enemy and attack them, had determined to begin the charge with one wing only; and the disposition of the enemy made it necessary that it should be with the left wing: but the very instant the battle was going to begin, his majesty ordered the general who commanded the right wing to decline it, to take a proper position in consequence thereof, and above all, to prevent being surrounded. All the cavalry of the right wing, except two or three squadrons, had already marched to the left, which was done at full gallop; and being arrived at the place assigned them, they formed over-against that of the enemy. The cavalry moved on immediately; the enemy's advanced to meet them, and the charge was very fierce, several regiments of the French coming on with great resolution. The advantage, however, was entirely on the side of the Prussians. The enemy's cavalry being routed, were pursued for a considerable time with the greatest spirit; but having afterwards reached an eminence which gave them an opportunity of rallying, the Prussian cavalry fell upon them afresh, and gave them so thorough a defeat, that they betook themselves to flight in the utmost disorder. This happened at four in the afternoon.

"Whilst the cavalry charged, the infantry opened themselves. The enemy cannonaded them very briskly during this interval, and did some execution; but the Prussian artillery was not behind hand with them. This cannonade having continued on both sides a full quarter of an hour, without the least intermission, the fire of the infantry fantry began. The enemy could not stand it, nor resist the valour of the foot, who gallantly marched up to their batteries. These batteries were carried one after another, and the enemy were forced to give way, which they did in great confusion. As the left wing advanced, the right changed its position; and having soon met with a small rising ground, they availed themselves of it, by planting sixteen heavy pieces of artillery on it. The fire from thence was partly pointed at the enemy's right, to increase the disorder there, and took their left wing in front, which was excessively galled thereby.

"At five the victory was decided, the cannon ceased, and the enemy fled on all sides. They were pursued as long as there was any light to distinguish them; and it may be said that the night alone was the preservation of this army, which was so formidable in the morning. They took the benefit of the darkness to hurry on to Freyburg, and there to repass the Unstrut, which they did on the morning of the sixth, after a whole night's march.

"The king set out early in the morning with all his cavalry to pursue them, supported by four battalions of grenadiers, the whole infantry following them in two columns. The enemy had passed the Unstrut at Freyburg, when the Prussians arrived on its banks; and as they had burned the bridge, it became necessary to make another, which however was soon done. The cavalry passed first, but could not come up with the enemy till five in the evening, upon the hills of Eckertberg. It was too late to force them there; and the king therefore thought proper to canton his army in the nearest villages, and to be satisfied with the success the hussars had, in taking near three hundred baggage waggons, and every thing in them."

This glorious victory, glorious both in the action and in its consequences, was more agreeable to his Prussian majesty than any one he had ever gained, as it was obtained with so very inconsiderable loss to his troops, of whom not above five hundred were killed and wounded. Amongst the latter was prince Henry of Prussia and general Seydelitz, but their wounds were of no consequence. As for the loss sustained by the enemy, it appears, from the accounts of their own officers, to have amounted to upwards of three thousand killed upon the field of battle, and above six thousand made prisoners; amongst whom were eight French generals, besides several German generals, and two hundred and fifty officers of different ranks; sixty-four pieces of cannon, with kettle drums, standards, and colours, in great number, fell also into the hands of the Prussians. General Revel, brother to the duke de Broglie, died of his wounds the day after the battle of Merleburg. This heavy misfortune which befel the combined army was generally attributed to the injudicious dispositions of the two commanders, and in part to the discontent of the men, who were not only unpaid, but had actually been without a morsel of bread for two days preceding the engagement. What renders this victory more remarkable on the side of the Prussians is, that the king having been obliged to leave some detachments to secure certain posts, and to cover the baggage during the battle, the whole force he brought into the field scarcely amounted to eighteen thousand effective men; whereas the enemy boasted that they were seventy thousand strong; but admit that they were no more than fifty thousand, it was a vast superiority to be thus shamefully beat.

The French under the duke de Richelieu were preparing to go into winter-quarters; but hearing of the defeat of the combined army, they again put themselves in motion, and a large body of them advanced as far as Duderstadt, to favour the retreat of their countrymen under the prince of Soubise, who with great precipitation made the best of their way from Erfurth to the county of Hohenstein, and from thence bent their march towards Halberstadt. Of the remains of the imperial army, which was almost entirely dispersed, whole battalions deserted, and went over to the victor of Rosbach.

While things went on thus successfully for his Prussian majesty in Germany, his troops were closely pressed by the Austrians in Silesia. Schweidnitz, the only town of strength in that duchy, was closely besieged by a superior force under general Nadaſti, and the little army of the prince of Bevern cut off from its relief by the main army of the enemy, under the command of prince Charles of Lorraine and count Daun, who, while Nadaſti was employed in the above siege, had invested Breslau on the left of the Oder, while the prince covered it on the right. Schweidnitz surrendered after a siege of near three weeks; during which time it sustained a furious bombardment. Nadaſti having supplied it with a sufficient garrison, marched with the remainder of his troops and joined the Austrian main army.

In the mean time, his Prussian majesty, while he was improving the victory he had gained over the French and Imperial armies, received advice of the siege of Schweidnitz, and the situation of the prince of Bevern. Sensible of the danger, and firmly persuaded of the fidelity of his generals and the bravery of his troops, and that they would defend themselves to the last extremity, he formed the resolution of marching to their assistance with a considerable part of the victorious army; though, what is almost incredible to relate, part of them had been assembled but a few days before from places more than an hundred miles distance. The king set out from Leipzig on the twelfth of November for Silesia, and in a few days attacked Naumburg, on the Queiss, having in his route detached M. Keith with a considerable part of the army to clear Saxony from all the Austrian parties, and then to make an irruption into Bohemia; which he did so effectually, as to raise large contributions in the circles of Sartz and Leitmeritz, and even to strike terror into Prague itself. His majesty continued his march with the rest of the army with unparalleled rapidity, and by the twenty-eighth of November got to Barchwitz, near the Oder, where his vanguard surprised a detachment of one thousand one hundred Austrians, fifty of whom were slain, and one hundred and fifty made prisoners. After detaching M. Keith, as before observed, the king had left himself only 15,000 men, but on his march was reinforced by the late garrison of Schweidnitz, which by a surprising effort of courage had made their escape from the Austrians.

This

This garrison, which consisted of about four thousand men, had seen with the utmost indignation the capitulation which the general who commanded at Schweidnitz had made, not only against their consent, but even in spite of their repeated offers to force their way through the besiegers, or perish every man. Being at last, however, obliged to submit, as the Austrians were conducting them into Bohemia, where they were to be confined, they learnt by chance the great victory their monarch had obtained near Rosbach; which news animated them so far, that they unanimously rose upon the escort that guarded them, which was not very strong, and put them entirely to flight. Thus freed, they marched on without very well knowing their way; but fortune still continuing to favour them, they came directly upon the army commanded by their king, to whom their junction added a considerable strength.

The whole army of the Austrians being now united; and advice having been received not only of the king of Prussia's late victory over the combined army, but also that he was advancing to the relief of the prince of Bevern, the Austrian generals took a resolution to attack this last in his intrenchments, and if possible to dislodge him. Accordingly, on the twenty-second of November, about nine o'clock in the morning, they put their resolves in execution, with a force three times superior to that of the prince of Bevern. The Prussians, however, with surprising intrepidity, stood two of the most violent attacks that could be made; but at the third, overpowered with numbers, and assailed on all sides, and night coming on, the prince of Bevern, to prevent a total defeat, withdrew the greatest part of his army to a rising ground on the banks of the Oder, whilst the rest of the troops threw themselves into Breslau, which in all probability they might have defended till the king had come up to its relief; but on the twenty-fourth, the prince of Bevern going to take a view of the position of the enemy, with only a single groom to attend him, fell in with a party of Croats, who took him prisoner. In consequence of this misfortune, his army decamped that same night, leaving in Breslau only four battalions, under the command of lieutenant-general Leswitz, who, unable to maintain himself in a place so extensive and so ill fortified, capitulated the next day, on condition that the garrison should march out with all military honours, but that they should not act against the empress-queen during the course of the war.

When an account of the battle before Breslau was brought to Vienna, the news at first occasioned great joy at court; but it was much abated by the particulars of the action, one of the most bloody that history can furnish an instance. The Austrians owned that such another victory would annihilate their army, for it cost them the lives of twenty thousand men; a number almost equal to the whole of the prince of Bevern's army before the battle. This will not appear exaggerated, when it is considered that the heat of the action lasted from eleven o'clock in the morning till five in the evening; and that four almost impregnable intrenchments were to be forced, planted thick with cannon, which fired cartridge-shot for seven hours successively. The Prussians were never put into confusion, and retreated in good order. Their loss was not above four thousand men killed, wounded, and taken prisoners.

The prince of Bevern's army having passed the Oder at Glogau, joined the king of Prussia at Barchwitz on the second of December. He had also been reinforced on his march by a body of troops which he had ordered from Saxony, and the garrison of Schweidnitz, as before related. Hearing that prince Charles of Lorraine had left Breslau with his army, and that he had taken post at Lissa, a village about sixteen miles distance from that city, the king, who, with Cæsar, thought "Nihil actum dum aliquid agendum," determined, notwithstanding the inferiority of his forces, to attack the Austrians in their intrenchments, whose right wing was covered by the village of Neerpen, and their left by that of Golau, with the rivulet of Schweidnitz in their rear.

On the fourth of December the Prussian army marched to Neumarck, where they seized upon the enemy's ovens, and upon a considerable magazine, and made prisoners six thousand Pandours and hussars that guarded them. After this seizure, and after having distributed to his army the provisions he had taken, his Prussian majesty resumed his march towards Lissa.

General Zithen, who led the vanguard of light horse, about seven in the morning of the fifth fell in with a body of Austrian hussars, and three regiments of Saxon dragoons, which had been detached by the Austrian generals, in order to retard the king's march, and conceal their own motions; for they held the small number of Prussians in such contempt, that their intention was to have met the king, and to have saved him two German miles to come at them. The Prussians, however, drove this advanced party back to their camp, took six officers and about five hundred men prisoners. As soon as the Prussian army had got to the high grounds about Lissa, general Zithen perceived that the enemy's whole army was forming. He immediately acquainted the king with what he had discovered, who, after having himself surveyed their disposition, made his own with that quickness and true judgment that has always rendered him so justly celebrated.

He gave orders for his troops to extend themselves to the right as far as the rivulet of Schweidnitz, and to charge the left wing of the enemy. The action began in a wood, where the enemy had posted some regiments of infantry, with forty pieces of cannon. The Prussians carried this battery, tho' with a considerable loss; drove the Austrians out of the wood, and turning the enemy's cannon upon themselves, plied them with a most furious fire. The Austrians hereupon were obliged to change their position; they had lost the post that covered their right wing, which put them under the necessity of taking precipitately to the first post that came in their way, in order to prevent the Prussians raking their whole army from wing to wing. They posted some brigades of foot on an eminence that lay behind the wood, which was soon attacked by the right of the Prussians, and carried, after an obstinate resistance. The enemy then formed a new line near the village of Lenten, where they defended themselves for some time with great bravery, but were at length obliged to give way, the the Prussians continuing to advance with that slow and regular pace for which they were remarkable, without once stopping or giving ground a single instant. During all these different attacks, the right of the Austrian cavalry and infantry came up, when the left of the Prussian cavalry charged theirs, and broke them; after which the regiment of Bareut took the Austrian infantry, which was posted on an eminence, in the rear, at the same time that the left of our infantry attacked them in front.

At length the enemy gave way on all sides; and after having by a quick retreat got at some distance, recovered themselves three times, animated by their officers and by the superiority of their numbers. Every time they made a stand, the Prussians attacked them with fresh vigour, and every time with success. Towards night the Austrians fell into disorder: their two wings fled in confusion: one of them, closely pressed by the king, ran towards Breslau, and took shelter under the cannon of that city: the other, pursued by the greatest part of the light cavalry, fled towards Canth and Schweidnitz. The action began at one o'clock in the afternoon, and ended at four. If day-light had lasted another hour, the defeat of the enemy would have been still greater: as it was, six thousand Austrians fell in this engagement; and the Prussians, who had only five hundred men killed and two thousand wounded, made twenty-one thousand of the enemy prisoners, among whom were two hundred and ninety officers; took one hundred and sixty-eight cannon, fifty-one colours and standards, and four thousand waggons of ammunition and baggage. In short, so great was the consternation of the fugitives, that a cornet of Zieten's regiment, with a party of ten men only, took, disarmed, and brought one hundred of them prisoners to the king of Prussia's head-quarters; for which gallant action his majesty advanced him to the rank of a captain, and honoured him with the Order of Merit. Never was a more complete, a more decisive victory; and future times cannot but read with astonishment, that the same man who, on the fifth of November, triumphed over France and the empire at Rossbach, was on the fifth of December at Lissa, where he defeated likewise the whole force of Austria.

The consequences that followed this victory sufficiently declared the greatness of it. The siege of Breslau was immediately undertaken, and with such success, that it surrendered on the twentieth of the same month. The garrison, consisting of thirteen thousand men, were made prisoners of war. Among these were fourteen officers of distinction. The military chest, a vast treasure, with eighty pieces of cannon, fell into the hands of the victors, who lost only about twenty men in their approaches. The season being now far advanced, and the weather too severe to undertake any enterprise of consequence, his Prussian majesty contented himself with retaking some few towns of which the Austrians had possessed themselves in Silesia; and having fixed his head-quarters at Breslau, put the rest of his army which was not out upon excursions into winter-quarters, where we shall leave them till the next campaign brings them into the field again.

As to the remains of the Austrian army under prince Charles of Lorraine and count Daun, soon after their defeat at Lissa they returned into Bohemia, where they entered into quarters of cantonments, the head-quarters being fixed at Konigsgratz; and as soon as every possible measure was taken for their security, prince Charles repaired to Vienna.

The reader will easily recollect, that upon the signing of the convention of Closter Seven with the French, and the negotiating a neutrality for the electorate of Hanover, the king of Prussia wrote a letter to his Britannic majesty, complaining of such a step as abandoning him to the mercy of his enemies, &c. &c. and that the king of Great Britain, in answer to this remonstrance, published a declaration, disavowing the said convention, and all thoughts of a neutrality, and promising vigorously to support the king of Prussia. This inclination to afford assistance to an ally in such distress he was soon enabled effectually to gratify, by the shameful conduct of the French in Hanover, who, if not by the express order, at least by the apparent countenance, of the duke de Richelieu, their commander, exercised every imaginable act of pillage, rapacity, and insolence; and perceiving that the Hanoverians, though subjected to the yoke of the capitulation, were still formidable, in order to prevent any resistance on their part to the oppressions laid upon them, the French general resolved to add one violation more to the many they had already committed of the late treaty, and actually attempted to deprive the Hanoverians and Hessians of their arms. In this distressed situation, into which they had undoubtedly been brought solely by their connections with England, the regency of Hanover demanded immediate succours from the British nation.

The court of London did not pretend to contravert the justice of the Hanoverian plea, but were willing to try, before they had recourse to extremities, what might be effected by pacific measures, and proposed an extension of the convention of Closter Seven to a general armistice, and to found thereon a negotiation for a general peace: but this could not be brought about, the French being resolved to keep territories so dear to his Britannic majesty in their possession, to turn to their advantage, according as the occurrences of the war should direct. These tentatives towards a compromise failing, it was resolved that the Hanoverian army should immediately assemble, resume their arms, and stand in the defence of their country against all invaders: and it was farther resolved, to put in motion, maintain, and keep together, an army of observation, and to recommend a vigorous execution of this measure to the ensuing parliament.

By this time his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, disgusted with the treatment he had received from Mr. Pitt and his colleagues in the ministry, who had absolutely refused, to his most earnest solicitations, the transporting six thousand troops to Hanover to strengthen the army of observation, had quitted the command of that army and returned to England, and, determined never more to engage in public affairs, resigned into the hands of his royal father all his military employments. Hereupon his Britannic majesty immediately, at the instance of his Prussian majesty, nominated and appointed prince Ferdinand of Brunswick (brother to the duke of Brunswick) already distinguished for his military abilities, commander in chief chief of the army of observation. This promotion was followed with a declaration of his majesty's motives for breaking the convention of Closter Seven on his part, as elector of Hanover; which, as it contains a candid and impartial relation of the facts on which this resolution of the king of Great Britain was founded, I shall here insert in the words and order as it stood.

"It is notorious, that in September of this present year, 1757, a convention was respectively agreed upon at Bromervorde and Closter Seven, between his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, and the marshal duke de Richelieu; but the court of France was no sooner informed of this, than she plainly signified that she neither could nor would acknowledge the validity of the said convention, but on this condition only, namely, that the Hanoverian troops should formally engage not to serve again, during the present war, against France or her allies. And not content even with this claim, she positively insisted, that the auxiliary troops should, upon returning into their own country, be disarmed.

"His royal highness the duke of Cumberland, who had on his part honestly fulfilled all the conditions of the convention, and caused part of the troops destined for the county of Lawenbourg to begin their march, could not consider this new demand otherwise than as a manifest contravention; the marshal duke de Richelieu having not only engaged to let the auxiliary troops depart freely, but the convention also setting forth in express terms, that they should not be regarded as prisoners of war, under which quality alone the condition of laying down their arms could take place. Upon this his royal highness sent orders to the said troops to halt.

"Every method was tried to reconcile the difference. Expedients were proposed, which left no shadow of pretext to the opposite party; but all in vain: the French would never be brought to give up their mortifying demand: it is but lately they begun to soften their language a little. In the mean time the troops, pent up in the narrow district which was assigned them, were exposed to the rigour of the season, and deprived of necessities and conveniences of any kind.

"The French, at present, pretend to treat the convention as a military regulation only. And indeed it was at first, and originally, nothing more. But on account of the above declaration of the court of France, which expressly suspended its validity, and in consequence of the negotiation for disarming the auxiliaries, in which the French general would never answer categorically, but waited always for an answer from the court of Versailles; the nature of that act is totally changed, and what was at first a matter between general and general, is now become an affair of state between the two courts.

"However hard the conditions of the convention might be for the troops of his Britannic majesty, as elector of Hanover, the king would have acquiesced in them, had not the French glaringly discovered their design of totally ruining his army and his dominions. It is they themselves who, by the most evident contraventions, and most outrageous conduct, have set the king free from every obligation under which he was laid by the convention.

"The great end of the conventional act (an end in itself of the very nature and essence of every provisional armistice) was to pave the way for entering immediately on a negotiation of peace, in order to prevent the total ruin of the countries which composed the electorate of Brunswick-Lunebourg, and procure an accommodation for his majesty's allies. The court of France yielding a deaf ear to the propositions offered for that end, not only declared, time after time, that she would not lend a hand towards a definitive pacification with his majesty, in quality of elector, but has shewed too plainly, by her continual violences, excesses, and insupportable exactions since the signing of the convention, that her resolution is to complete the ruin of the king's electoral estates, as well as those of his allies.

"In the midst of a truce, the most open hostilities have been committed. The castle of Scharzfels has been forcibly seized and pillaged, and the garrison made prisoners of war. The prisoners made by the French before the convention, have not been restored, though this was a point expressly stipulated between the generals who settled the detail, and was exactly fulfilled on our part, by the immediate release of the French prisoners. The bailies of those districts, into which the French troops were on no pretence to enter, have been summoned, under pain of military execution, to appear before the French commissary, in order to compel them to deliver up the public revenue in their hands. The French have appropriated to themselves part of these magazines, which by express agreement were to be left to the electoral troops; and they still go on with seizing the houses, revenues, and corn belonging to his majesty, in the city of Bremen, in spite of the reciprocal engagement entered into, to consider that city as a place absolutely free and neutral. And, lastly, they have proceeded to menaces, unheard of among a civilized people, of burning, sacking, and destroying all before them, if at present, when they find their account in executing the convention, the least hesitation be made about observing it.

"All these violent and unjust proceedings, (which are so many incontestable proofs, that the French will not admit the convention as obligatory, any farther than as it may prove ruinous to his Britannic majesty; whilst they pretend to be tied to nothing, and claim a power of acting at will) have been carried to an insupportable height, and exhausted the king's patience, who holds himself, before God and the whole impartial world, not only entitled, but obliged, without further regard to the convention, so often and so openly violated by the French, to have recourse to arms, as the means which the Almighty has put into his hands for delivering his faithful subjects and allies from the oppressions and vexations which they now groan under.

"As his majesty (conformable to his solemn declaration made and repeated to all nations, and to the Germanic body in particular, from the very beginning of the present unhappy war) has never thought of arming offensively against any power whatever, but solely with a view of defending himself and his allies, he reposes his confidence in God, and hopes for his benediction on the justness of his enterprizes."

The duke de Richelieu no sooner was apprised of the king of Great Britain's resolutions, and that the Hanoverians were in motion, and repairing to the command of prince Ferdinand, than he sent a letter to that general, intimating his surprize at the late movements of the Hanoverians, which, he said, seemed to indicate a design to break the articles of the convention of Closter Seven, which, for his own part, he was resolved to fulfil exactly in all points; but at the same time declared, that if the Hanoverians should proceed to take any step contrary thereto, or commit any act of hostility, he should instantly retaliate, by destroying every dwelling in the electorate by fire, from the royal palace to the smallest cabin, and make this country feel all the most dreadful horrors of war.

To this letter, which was enforced by the count de Lynar, the Danish ambassador, who had mediated the convention, prince Ferdinand returned a very laconic answer, importing, that he would give the duke de Richelieu an answer in person at the head of his army.

Every thing now bespoke a renewal of the war between the two parties. The Hanoverians, spirited up with resentment for the oppressive treatment they had experienced, were eager to come to blows with the French, and deliver their country from these merciless invaders. About the latter end of November they were wholly assembled at Stade, under the gallant leader prince Ferdinand, who immediately took the field, and marched with all expedition against the enemy, to drive them out of the electorate. Indeed no conjuncture could have been more favourable than the present to the Hanoverians, for taking revenge on these open violators of the most solemn treaties, and recovering their own liberty: for Richelieu, intent only on increasing his own fortune by the indiscriminate plunder of friends and foes, had extended his oppression to the very army which he commanded, whose pay, subsistence, and cloathing, he is said to have converted into money for his own use; so that those troops which were in so fine and respectable a condition, when M. d'Etrées resigned the command, were now diminished in their numbers, decayed in their health and spirits, destitute of necessaries, without arms, and without order. Add to this, that Richelieu had been guilty of a capital error in dividing his forces into such distant quarters of cantonment, that they might easily be attacked separately, and reduced by a much inferior army, before they could give each other any assistance.

Hostilities were now commenced, by the Hanoverians seizing upon some waggons of wood designed for the French garrison of Harbourg: soon after which there were several skirmishes between them and the enemy; the most considerable of which was that on the fourth of December, when a division of prince Ferdinand's army, under count Schuylemberg, came up with two thousand of the French, who were marching back to Zell, whom he attacked in the bailiwick of Ebstorff, and entirely defeated, twelve of their officers and one hundred and eighty soldiers being made prisoners, and about one hundred and thirty killed and wounded. There was another on the fourteenth of the same month upon the Aller, between a body of seven or eight thousand Hanoverians, and one of about ten thousand French; wherein the former, under general Zastrow, remained masters of the field of battle.

These skirmishes and advantages animated the Hanoverian army, and struck such a panic into the enemy, that they offered little or no resistance; so that the former recovered possession of Lunenburg, Zell, and all that part of the Brunswic dominions next to Prussia; but their operations were considerably retarded by the resolute defence of the French governor of Harbourg. When the Hanoverian troops made themselves masters of the town, he retired into the castle, which he continued to defend against a considerable detachment of the allied army, by whom it was invested, till at length, the fortifications being entirely destroyed, he submitted by capitulation. This delayed the march of the Hanoverians, and gave the French time to recall their distant parties. The severity of the season, however, now forced both parties to put their forces into winter-quarters, prince Ferdinand occupying Ultzen and Lunenburgh, and the duke de Richelieu retreating into Hanover, in whose capital he fixed his head-quarters; though there continued to be frequent skirmishes, with various success, between the out parties.

Richelieu, who by no means expected so vigorous an exertion on the part of the oppressed Hanoverians, gave a cloose to the most inhuman and unmanly sentiments of revenge: he not only delivered up the city of Zell to be plundered by his troops, against all the rules of war, but also reduced the suburbs to ashes, and even gave orders to set fire to the orphan house of helpless children, who miserably perished amongst the flames. These were, however, but a small part of the calamities that the poor inhabitants suffered in the countries in subjection to the conquerors in the late war: wherever the French, the Austrians, or Russians had gained the ascendancy, the most horrible barbarities were committed by them: the French troops in particular have, on divers occasions, acted in a manner which is not easily reconcileable to the character of a nation famed for sentiment and civility.

The empress-queen was no sooner informed of these transactions, which she considered as infractions of the treaty of neutrality, than she sent a messenger to the baron de Steinberg, minister to the king of Great-Britain as elector of Hanover, acquainting him, that he should appear no more at court, or confer with her ministers; and that his residing at Vienna, he might easily conceive, could not be very agreeable: in consequence of which intimation he retired, after having procured the necessary passports for his departure.

The conduct of the Dutch, during the whole course of the war that now raged in Europe, was pusillanimous to the last degree. They had, with surprizing facility, granted the French a free passage through Namur and Maestricht, for their provisions, ammunition, and artillery, in the beginning of this very campaign; and they had beheld the towns of Ostend and Nieuport put into the hands of the same nation, with the most perfect indifference. The former step had already exposed them to a sharp remonstrance from the court of London; and the latter now drew upon them another representation no less spirited from the same quarter, delivered by colonel Yorke, his Britannic majesty's minister at the Hague. It was conceived in the following terms.

Con-

"Considering the critical situation which Europe has been in during the course of this year, in consequence of measures concerted to embroil all Europe, the king of Great Britain was willing to flatter himself, that the courts of Vienna and Versailles, out of regard to the circumspect conduct observed by your High Mightinesses, would have at least informed you of the changes they have thought proper to make in the Austrian Netherlands.

"It was with the utmost surprize the king heard, that, without any previous consent of yours, and almost without giving you any notice, the court of Vienna had thought proper to put the towns of Ostend and Nieuport into the hands of the French troops, and to withdraw her own, as well as her artillery and stores, whilst France continues to send thither a formidable quantity of both.

"The conduct of the court of Vienna towards his majesty, is indeed so unmerited, and so extraordinary, that it is difficult to find words to express it: but whatever fallacious pretexts she may have made use of to palliate her behaviour towards England, it doth not appear that they can be extended so far as to excuse the infringement, in concert with France, of the most solemn treaties between her and your High Mightinesses.

"The king never doubted, that your High Mightinesses would have made proper representations to the two courts, newly allied, to demonstrate the injustice of such a proceeding, and the danger that might afterwards result from it.

"Your High Mightinesses will have perceived, that your silence on the first step, encouraged the two courts, newly allied, to attempt others; and who can say where they will stop? The pretext at first was, the need which the empress-queen stood in of the troops for the war kindled in the empire, and the necessity of providing for the safety of those important places, and afterwards of their imaginary danger from England.

"But, high and mighty lords, it is but too evident, that the two powers, who have taken these measures in concert, have other projects in view, and have made new regulations with regard to that country, which cannot but alarm the neighbouring states.

"The late demand made to your High Mightinesses, of a passage for a large train of warlike implements thro' some of the barrier towns, in order to be sent to Ostend and Nieuport, could not fail to awaken the king's attention. The sincere friendship, and parity of interests, of Great Britain and Holland, require that they should no longer keep silence, lest in the issue, it should be considered as a tacit consent, and as a relinquishment of all our rights.

"The king commands me, therefore, to recall to your High Mightinesses the two-fold right you have acquired to keep the Austrian Netherlands under the government of the house of Austria; and that no other has a title to make the least alteration therein, without the consent of your High Mightinesses; unless the new allies have resolved to set aside all prior treaties, and to dispose at pleasure of every thing that may suit their private interest.

"In the treaty between your High Mightinesses and the crown of France, signed at Utrecht on the eleventh of April, 1713, in the fifteenth article, are these words: "It is also agreed that no province, fort, town, or city of the said Netherlands, or of those which are given up by his Catholic majesty, shall ever be ceded, transferred, or given, or shall ever devolve to the crown of France, or any prince or princess of the house or line of France, either by virtue of any gift, exchange, marriage contract, succession by will, or by any other title whatever, to the power and authority of the most Christian king, or of any prince or princess of the house or line of France."

"In the barrier-treaty these very stipulations are repeated in the first article: "His Imperial and Catholic majesty promises and engages, that no province, city, town, fortress, or territory of the said country shall be ceded, transferred, given, or devolved to the crown of France, or to any other but the successor of the German dominions of the house of Austria, either by donation, sale, exchange, or marriage contract, heritage, testamentary succession, nor under any other pretext whatsoever; so that no province, town, fortress, or territory of the said Netherlands shall ever be subject to any other prince, but to the successor of the states of the house of Austria alone, excepting what has been yielded by the present treaty to the said lords the States-general."

"A bare reading of these two articles is sufficient to evince all that I have just represented to your High Mightinesses: and whatever pretext the courts of Vienna and Versailles may allege, to cover the infraction of these treaties, the thing remains nevertheless evident, while these two courts are unable to prove, that the towns of Ostend and Nieuport are not actually in the power of France. If their designs are just, or agreeable to those treaties, they will doubtless not scruple, in the least, to make your High Mightinesses easy on that head, by openly explaining themselves to a quiet and pacific neighbour, and by giving you indisputable proofs of their intentions to fulfil the stipulations of the said two treaties, with regard to the Netherlands.

"The king hath so much confidence in the good sense, prudence, and friendship of your High Mightinesses, that he makes not the least doubt of your taking the most efficacious measures to clear up an affair of such importance; and of your being pleased, in concert with his majesty, to watch over the fate of a country, whose situation and independence have, for more than a century, been regarded as one of the principal supports of your liberty and commerce."

However strong these arguments, so powerful was the French faction in Holland, that no regard was paid to them by the States-general. It should seem indeed, that they were not only unprepared for a rupture with France. but unwilling to forego the commercial advantages they continued to derive from observing a neutrality.

The intrigues of the French ministry seem to have been no less successful at the court of Spain, which at this time discovered such evident marks of partiality for that nation, as convinced the more discerning part of the English, that the Spaniards would seize the first favourable opportunity of joining with their enemies. In the course of this year the Antigallican, a private ship of war, equipped by a society of gentlemen who assumed that name, took the Duke de Penthièvre Indiaman off the port of Corunna, and carried her into Cadiz. The prize was estimated worth two hundred thousand pounds; and immediate application was made by France to the court of Spain, for restitution, while the proprietors of the Antigallican were squandering in mirth, festivity, and riot, the imaginary wealth so easily and unexpectedly acquired. Such were the remonstrances made to his Catholic majesty, with respect to the illegality of the prize, which the French East India company asserted was taken within shot of a neutral port, that the Penthièvre was first violently wrested out of the hands of the captors, then detained as a deposit with sealed hatches, and a Spanish guard on board till the claims of both parties could be examined, and at last adjudged to be an illegal capture, and consequently restored to the French, to the great disappointment of the owners of the privateer.

I shall now proceed to lay before the reader the other transactions of this year, in which the nation was more immediately interested.

The accumulated losses and disappointments of the preceding year having made it absolutely necessary to retrieve the credit of the British arms and councils by some vigorous and spirited enterprize, Mr. Pitt and his friends, willing to approve themselves worthy of the honours the people had conferred on them, determined to make a vigorous descent on the coast of France. They imagined, that should such a measure prove successful, it would probably give a decisive blow to the marine of that kingdom; and at the same time effect a powerful diversion in favour of the Prussian monarch and our other allies in Germany, by converting the attention of the French to the defence and protection of their own coasts. The English ministry likewise foresaw, that by destroying the enemy's shipping, all succours would be cut off from America, whither they were daily transporting troops; the British commerce secured, without those convoys so inconvenient to the board of admiralty, and to the merchants; and those ideal fears of an invasion, that had in some measure affected the public credit, wholly dispelled. From these considerations a powerful fleet was ordered to be got in readiness to put to sea on the shortest notice, and ten regiments of foot were marched to the Isle of Wight. The naval armament, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, bomb-ketches, and transports, was put under the command of sir Edward Hawke, an officer whose faithful services recommended him, above all others, to this command. Sir John Mordaunt was preferred to take the command of the land forces; and both strictly enjoined to act with the utmost unanimity and harmony.

Europe beheld with astonishment these mighty preparations. The destination of the armament was wrapped in the most profound security: it exercised the penetration of politicians, and filled France with very serious alarms. Various were the impediments which obstructed the embarkation of the troops for several weeks, while Mr. Pitt expressed the greatest uneasiness at the delay, and repeatedly urged the commander in chief to expedite his departure; but a sufficient number of transports, owing to some blunder in the contractors, had not yet arrived. The troops expressed an eager impatience to signalize themselves against the enemies of the liberties of Europe; but the superstitious drew unfavourable presages from the dilatoriness of the embarkation.

At last the transports arrived, the troops were put on board with all expedition, and the fleet got under sail on the eighth day of September, attended with the prayers of every man warmed with the love of his country, and solicitous for her honour. The public, big with expectation, dubious where the stroke would fall, but confident of its success, were impatient for tidings from the fleet; but it was not till the fourteenth that even the troops on board began to conjecture that a descent was meditated on the coast of France near Rochfort, or Rochelle.

On the evening of the fifteenth orders were issued that confirmed their suspicions, and spread the utmost joy and alacrity among the men. Regulations were made with respect to the manner of landing; and the corps directed to attack, had injunctions to march up vigorously to the enemy, reserving their fire till they came very near, and then running in upon them with their bayonets: orders which had all the air of a resolution to do business.

The seventeenth farther orders, respecting the debarkation, were issued; but on the nineteenth the whole fleet was surprized with a signal to lay-to, though the wind was fair, the night clear, and the headland distance about twenty leagues; in which situation eight hours, a space of time invaluable in such a conjuncture, were lost, before the signal was made to proceed on their course.

On the twentieth the fleet made the Isle of Oleron, and then sir Edward Hawke sent an order to vice-admiral Knowles, requiring him, if the wind permitted the fleet, to proceed to Basque road, to stand in as near to the Isle of Aix as the pilot would carry him, with such ships of his division as he thought necessary for the service, and to batter the fort till the garrison should either abandon or surrender it. But the immediate execution of this order was frustrated by a French man of war's standing in to the very middle of the fleet, and continuing in that station for some time before she discovered her mistake, or any of the captains had a signal thrown out to give chase. Admiral Knowles, when too late, ordered the Magnanime, captain Howe, and Torbay, captain Keppel, on that service, and thereby retarded the attack upon which he was immediately sent.

While the above ships, with the addition of the Royal William, were attending the French man of war safe into the river Garonne, the remainder of the fleet was beating to the windward off the Isle of Oleron; and the commander in chief publishing orders and regulations which did credit to his judgment, and would have been highly useful had there ever been occasion to put them in execution.

On the twenty-third, the van of the fleet, led by captain Howe in the Magnanime, stood towards Aix, a small island situated in the mouth of the river Charente, leading up to Rochfort, the fortifications half finished, and mounted with about thirty cannon and mortars, the garrison composed of six hundred men, and the whole island about five miles in circumference. As the Magnanime approached, the enemy fired briskly upon her; but captain Howe, regardless of their faint endeavours, kept on his course, till having gained the length of the fort, he dropt his anchors close to the walls, and poured out so incessant a fire as soon silenced them. It was, however, near an hour before the fort struck, when some forces were landed to take possession of so important a conquest, with orders to demolish the fortifications, the care of which was entrusted to vice-admiral Knowles.

Inconsiderable as this success might appear, it greatly elated the troops, and was deemed an happy omen of further advantages; but instead of embarking the troops that night, as was universally expected, several successive days were spent in councils of war, soundings of the coast, and deliberations whether the king's express orders were practicable, or to be complied with. Eight days were elapsed since the first appearance of the fleet on the coast, and the alarm was given to the enemy. Sir Edward Hawke, indeed, proposed laying a sixty gun ship against Fouras, and battering that fort, which it was thought would help to secure the landing of the troops, and facilitate the enterprise on Rochfort. This, a French pilot on board (Thierry) undertook; but after the ship had been lightened for that purpose, vice-admiral Knowles reported that a bomb ketch had run aground at above the distance of two miles from the fort; upon which the project of battering or bombarding the fort was abandoned. The admiral likewise proposed to bombard Rochelle; but this overture was over-ruled for reasons which we need not mention. It was at length determined in a council of war, held on the eighth, to make a descent, and attack the forts leading to and upon the mouth of the river Charente. An order, in consequence of this resolution, was immediately issued for the troops to be ready to go from the transports to the boats precisely at twelve o'clock at night. A number of men of war's boats, under the command of a lieutenant, were appointed to attend each regiment, and to receive the grenadiers picquet companies, and in a number proportioned to their bulk; but with great caution not to overcrowd the boats. The colonel of each regiment was directed to land with the first detachment, if it amounted to three companies. The troops were ordered to proceed silently and quietly to the place of rendezvous appointed for the division, and then to receive their commands from a captain of a ship of war, which they were enjoined scrupulously to obey. It was strongly recommended to the soldiers to imitate the example so lately before them, the cool and determined valour that appeared in the attack of the Isle of Aix. They were required to form and attack whatever appeared before them on their first landing; and colonel, now general Kingsley, was directed to march with the grenadiers on their landing; with lieutenant-colonel sir William Boothby, and major Farquhar.

However judicious and agreeable to military rules these orders might appear, they did not fail to raise astonishment in the troops. The transports were at that time above four miles from shore, the enemy alarmed for eight days, and putting themselves in a posture of defence; several battalions had been seen marching along the coast from Rochelle; the shore, it was probable, was now lined with batteries; the sea was rough and the weather boisterous; the first body of men landed, which could not amount to eighteen hundred, must defend themselves for the space of six hours before a second disembarkation could be effected, and that without the hopes of a retreat, as the boats were ordered immediately to row back to the transports to take in more forces. All these, with a variety of other difficulties, were too obvious to escape the most unobserving soldier on board. Notwithstanding the dangers, but too apparent, there was the utmost alacrity among the troops; and every thing was pursued with so much spirit and expedition, that all the boats were filled an hour sooner than the time appointed. Here they remained beating against each other, and the sides of the ships, for the space of four hours, while the council were determining whether, after all the trouble given, they should land: when at length an order was published for the troops to return to their respective transports, and all thoughts of a descent, to appearance, wholly abandoned.

The succeeding days were employed, in blowing up and demolishing the fortifications of Aix; after which, in consequence of a letter from sir Edward Hawke, the land officers took the final resolution of returning to England without any farther attempts, fully satisfied they had done all in their power to execute the designs of the ministry, and chusing rather to oppose the frowns of an angry sovereign, the murmurings of an incensed nation, and the contempt of mankind, than fight a handful of dastardly militia. Such was the issue of an expedition that raised the expectation of all Europe, threw the coasts of France into the utmost confusion, and cost the people of England little less than a million of money!

The fleet was no sooner returned than the whole nation was in a ferment. The public expectation had been wound up to the highest pitch, and now the disappointment was proportioned to the sanguine hopes conceived that the pride of France would have been humbled by so formidable an armament. The ministry, and with them the national voice, exclaimed against the commanding officers, and the military men retorted the calumny, by laying the blame on the projectors of the enterprise, who had put the nation to great expences before they obtained the necessary information. Certain it was, the blame must fall somewhere, and the ministry resolved to acquit themselves, and fix the accusation, by requesting his majesty to appoint a board of officers of character and ability to enquire into the causes of the late miscarriage. This alone it was that could appease the public clamours, and afford general satisfaction.

The enemies of Mr. Pitt endeavoured to wrest the miscarriage of the expedition to his prejudice; but the whispers of faction were soon drowned in the voice of the whole people of England, who never could persuade themselves that a gentleman, raised to the height of power and popularity by mere dint of superior merit, integrity, and disinterestedness, would now sacrifice his reputation by a mock armament; or hazard incurring the derision of Europe, by neglecting to obtain all the necessary previous information, or doing whatever might contribute to the success of the expedition. It was asked, whether reason or justice dictated, that a late unfortunate admiral should be capitally punished for not trying and exerting his utmost ability to relieve Fort St. Philip's, invested by a powerful army, army, and surrounded with a numerous fleet, while no charge of negligence or cowardice was brought against those who occasioned the miscarriage of a well-concerted and well-appointed expedition? The people, they said, were not to be quieted with the resolutions of a council of war, composed of men whose inactivity might frame excuses for declining to expose themselves to danger. It was publicly mentioned that such backwardness appeared among the general officers before the fleet reached the isle of Oleron, as occasioned the admiral to declare with warmth, that he would comply with his orders, and go into Basque road, whatever might be the consequence. It was asked why the army did not land on the night of the twenty-third or twenty-fourth; and whether the officers sent out to reconnoitre had returned with such intelligence as seemed to render a descent impracticable? It was asked, whether the commander in chief had complied with his majesty's orders, "To attempt, as far as should be found practicable, a descent on the coast of France, at or near Rochefort, in order to attack, and, by a vigorous impression, force that place; and to burn and destroy, to the utmost of his power, all docks, magazines, arsenals, and shipping, as shall be found there?" Such rumours as these, every where propagated, rendered an enquiry no less necessary to the reputation of the officers on the expedition, than to the minister who had projected it.

Accordingly a board, consisting of three officers of rank, reputation, and ability, were appointed by his majesty, pursuant to the following warrant, to inquire into the reasons why the fleet should have returned without having executed his majesty's orders. "Whereas we were pleased, in August last, to send a number of troops on an expedition against France, with orders and instructions to attempt, as far as should be found practicable, a descent on the French coast, at or near Rochefort; in order to attack, if practicable, and by a vigorous impression, force that place; and to burn and destroy, to the utmost of their power, all docks, magazines, arsenals, and shipping, that should be found there; and to exert such other efforts as should be judged most proper for annoying the enemy, as by our several instructions to the commander of the said forces does more fully appear: and whereas the troops sent for these purposes are returned to Great Britain, no attempt having been made to land on the coast of France; concerning the causes of which inaction, we think it necessary that enquiry should be made by the general officers herein after named, in order that they may report those causes to us, for our better information: our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby nominate and appoint our right trusty and entirely beloved cousin and counsellor Charles duke of Marlborough, lieutenant-general; our trusty and well-beloved George Sackville, commonly called lord George Sackville, and John Waldegrave, major-generals of our forces, to examine and inquire touching the matters aforesaid. And you are to give notice to the said general-officers when and where they are to meet for the said examination: and the said general-officers are hereby directed to cause you to summon such persons (whether the generals or other officers employed in the expeditions or others) as are necessary to give information touching the said matters, or shall be desired by those who were employed in the expedition. And the said general-officers are hereby farther directed to hear such persons as shall offer to give them information touching the same: and they are authorized, impowered, and required, strictly to examine into the matters before mentioned, and to report a state thereof as it shall appear to them, together with their opinion thereon. All which you are to transmit to our secretary at war, to be by him laid before us for our consideration."

This warrant, dated on the first day of November, was directed to Thomas Morgan, esq. his majesty's judge-advocate; and in consequence of it, the three general-officers met on the twenty-first of the same month. To judge of the practicability of executing his majesty's orders, it was necessary to inquire into the nature of the intelligence upon which the expedition was projected. The first and most important was a letter sent to sir John, now earl Ligonier, by lieutenant-colonel Clarke. This letter had been frequently examined in the privy council, and contained in substance, That colonel Clark, in returning from Gibraltar in the year 1754, had travelled along the western coast of France, to observe the condition of the fortifications, and judge how far a descent would be practicable, in case of a rupture between Great Britain and France. On his coming to Rochefort, where he was attended by an engineer, he was surprised to find the greatest part of a good rampart, with a revetment flanked only with redans; no outworks, no covert way, and in many places no ditch, so that the bottom of the wall was seen at a distance. He remembered, that in other places, where the earth had been taken out to form the rampart, there was left round them a considerable height of ground, whence an enemy might draw great advantage: that for above the length of a front, or two or three hundred yards, there was no rampart, or even entrenchment, but only small ditches, in the low and marshy grounds next the river, which however were dry at low water; yet the bottom remained muddy and slimy. Towards the river no rampart, no batteries, no parapet, on either side, appeared; and on the land side he observed some high ground, within the distance of one hundred and fifty or two hundred yards of the town; in which condition, the colonel was told by the engineer, the place had remained for above seventy years. To prevent giving umbrage, he drew no plan of the place, and even burnt the few sketches he had by him: however, as to utility, the colonel declared himself as much satisfied as if he had got a plan. He could not ascertain the direct height of the rampart; but thought it could not exceed twenty-five feet, including the parapet. The river might be about one hundred and thirty broad, and the entrance defended by two or three small redoubts. As to forces, none are ever garrisoned at Rochfort, except marines, which, at the time the colonel was on the spot, amounted to about one thousand.

This was the first intelligence the ministry received of the state of Rochefort, which afforded sufficient room to believe, that an attack by surprise might be attended with happy consequences. It was true, that colonel Clarke made his observations in time of peace; but it was likewise probable, that no great alterations were made, on account of the war, as the place had remained in the same condition during the two or three last wars with with France, when they had the same reasons as now to expect their coast would be insulted.

The next information was obtained from Joseph Thierry, a French pilot, of the protestant religion, who passed several examinations before the privy council. This person declared, that he had followed the business of a pilot on the coast of France for the space of twenty years, and served as first pilot in several of the king's ships: that he had, in particular, piloted the Magnanime, before she was taken by the English, for about twenty-two months, and had often conducted her into the road of the Isle of Aix; and that he was perfectly acquainted with the entrance, which, indeed, is so easy as to render a pilot almost unnecessary. The road, he said, afforded a good anchorage in twelve or fourteen fathom water, as far as Bayonne; the channel between the islands of Oleron and Rhe was three leagues broad, and the banks necessary to be avoided near the land, except one called the Boiard, which is easily discerned by the breakers. He affirmed, that the largest vessels might draw up close to the fort of Aix, which he would undertake the Magnanime alone could destroy: that the largest ships might come up to the vigerot, two miles distant from the mouth of the river, with all their cannon and stores: that men might be landed to the north of fort Fouras, out of sight of the fort, upon a meadow, where the ground is firm and level, under cover of the cannon of the fleet. This landing place he reckoned at about five miles from Rochefort, the way dry, and no where intercepted by ditches and morasses. Great part of the city was encompassed by a wall; but towards the river on both sides, for about sixty paces, it was inclosed only with pallisades, without a fosse.

To the intelligence of colonel Clark and Thierry, the ministry added a secret account obtained of the strength and distribution of the French forces; whence it appeared highly probable, that not more than ten thousand men could be allowed for the defence of the whole coast, from St. Valery to Bourdeaux.

In consequence of the above information the secret expedition was planned; instructions given to sir John Mordaunt and admiral Hawke to make a vigorous impression on the French coast, and all the other measures projected, which it was imagined would make an effectual diversion, by obliging the enemy to employ a great part of their forces at home, disturb and shake the credit of their public loans, impair the strength and resources of their navy, disconcert their extensive and dangerous operations of war, and finally, give life, strength, and lustre to the common cause and his majesty's arms.

The board of enquiry took next into consideration the several letters and explanatory instructions sent to sir John Mordaunt, in consequence of some difficulties which might possibly occur, stated by that general in letters to the minister, previous to his sailing. Then they examined the report made to sir Edward Hawke by admiral Broderick, and the captains of men of war sent to sound the French shore from Rochelle to fort Fouras, dated September the twenty-ninth; the result of the councils of war on the twenty-fifth and twenty-eighth; sir Edward Hawke's letter to sir John Mordaunt on the twenty-seventh, and the general's answer on the twenty-ninth: after which sir John Mordaunt was called upon to give his reasons for not putting his majesty's instructions and orders in execution. This he did in substance as follows: The attempt on Rochefort, he understood, was to have been on the footing of a coup-de-main, or surprise, which it would be impossible to execute, if the design was discovered, or the alarm taken. He also understood that an attempt could not be made; nay, that his majesty did not require it should, unless a proper place for debarking, and a safe retreat for the troops, was discovered; particularly where the ships could protect them, and a safe communication with the fleet, and conveyance of supplies from it, was found. His sentiments, he said, were confirmed by a paper to this purpose, delivered to him by sir John Ligonier, on his first being appointed to command the expedition. It was likewise probable, he thought, that although Rochefort should have remained in the situation in which colonel Clark and the pilot Thierry had seen it three years before, yet that a few days preparation could make it sufficiently defensible against a coup de main. Judging, therefore, the dependence on such an operation alone improper, he applied to the ministry for two more old battalions, and artillery for a regular attack to force the place, which from its construction appeared as difficult to be made defensible against the latter, as easily secured against the former. But this request being refused, he still thought it his duty to obey his orders on the footing the expedition was planned, especially as he understood his instructions were discretionary, regarding the circumstances of the time, the condition of the place, and the nature of the service. He recited the positive and credible intelligence received, as well before the embarkation as during the voyage, of the alarm given to France, and the preparations made along the French coasts from Brest and St. Malo's to Rochefort: the accidents that kept the fleet hovering along the coasts, and prevented the possibility of an attempt by surprise: the reports of all the gentlemen employed in sounding the coasts, so contrary to the intelligence given by Thierry the pilot: the opinion of the council of war, by which he was enjoined to act, and with which his own judgment concurred: the endeavours used, after the twenty-sixth, to find out some expedient for annoying the enemy, and executing his majesty's instructions: the attempt made to land, in consequence of the resolution of the second council of war, which was prevented by boisterous and stormy weather: and, lastly, the reasons that determined him, in concert with the other land-officers, to return to England.

Having considered all these circumstances, and examined several officers who served in the expedition, the court of enquiry gave in the following report to his majesty; a report, at that time, deemed equivocal, artful, and unsatisfactory.

"It appears to us, that one cause of the expedition having failed, is the not attacking fort Fouras by sea, at the same time that it could have been attacked by land, agreeable to the first design, which certainly must have been of the greatest utility towards carrying your majesty's instructions into execution. It was at first resolved by admiral Hawke (Thierry the pilot having undertaken the safe conduct of a ship to fort Fouras for that purpose) pose) but afterwards laid aside, upon the representation of vice-admiral Knowles, that the Barfleur, the ship designed for that service, was on ground, at the distance of between four and five miles from the shore: but as neither sir Edward Hawke or the pilot could attend to give any information upon that head, we cannot presume to offer any certain opinion thereupon.

"We conceive another cause of the failure of the expedition to have been, that instead of attempting to land, when the report was received, on the twenty-fourth of September, from rear-admiral Broderick, and the captains who had been sent out to sound and reconnoitre, a council of war was summoned and held on the twenty-fifth; in which it was unanimously resolved not to land, as the attempt on Rochefort was neither adviseable nor practicable: but it does not appear to us, that there were then, or at any time afterwards, either a body of troops or batteries on shore sufficient to have prevented the attempting a descent, in pursuance of the instructions signed by your majesty: neither does it appear to us that there were any reasons sufficient to induce the council of war to believe that Rochefort was so changed, in respect of its strength, or posture of defence, since the expedition was first resolved on in England, as to prevent all attempts of an attack upon the place, in order to burn and destroy the docks, magazines, arsenals, and shipping, in obedience to your majesty's command.

"And we think ourselves obliged to remark, in the council of war on the twenty-eighth of September, that no reason could have existed sufficient to prevent the attempt of landing the troops, as the council then unanimously resolved to land with all possible dispatch.

"We beg leave also to remark, that after its being unanimously resolved to land, in the council of war of the twenty-eighth of September, the resolution was taken of returning to England, without any regular or general meeting of the said council: but, as the whole operation was of so inconsiderable a nature, we do not offer this to your majesty as a cause of the failure of the expedition; since we cannot but look upon the expedition to have failed from the time the great object of it was laid aside, in the council of war of the twenty-fifth."

However vague, and even inconsistent, this report, signed by the general officers Marlborough, Sackville, and Waldegrave, might appear to many persons, it probably laid the foundation for the court-martial which sat soon after, upon the conduct of the commander in chief of the expedition. The enemies of the minister made a handle of it, to lessen him in the esteem of the public, by laying the whole blame on his forming a project so expensive to the nation, on intelligence not only slight at the first view, but false upon farther examination. But the people were still his advocates: they discerned something mysterious in the whole conduct of the commander in chief. They plainly perceived that caution took place of vigour, and that the hours for action were spent in deliberations and councils of war. Had he debarked the troops, and made such an attack as would have distinguished his courage, the voice of the people would have acquitted him, however unsuccessful, though prudence perhaps might have condemned him. Even Braddock's rashness they deemed preferable to Mordaunt's inactivity: the loss of so many brave lives was thought less injurious and disgraceful to the nation, than the too safe return of the present armament. The one demonstrated that the British spirit still existed; the other seemed to indicate the too powerful influence of wealth, luxury, and those manners which tend to debauch and emasculate the mind. A public trial of the commander in chief was expected by the people, and it was graciously granted by his majesty. It is even thought that sir John Mordaunt himself demanded to have his conduct scrutinized, by which method alone he was sensible his character could be re-established. His majesty's warrant for holding a court-martial was accordingly signed on the third day of December. The court was composed of nine lieutenant-generals, nine major-generals, and three colonels, who sat on the fourteenth, and continued by several adjournments to the twentieth.

Lieutenant-general sir John Mordaunt came prisoner before the court, and the following charge was exhibited against him; namely, "That he being appointed by the king commander in chief of his majesty's forces sent on an expedition to the coast of France, and having received orders and instructions relative thereto from his majesty, under his royal sign manual, and also by one of his principal secretaries of state, hath disobeyed his majesty's said orders and instructions." The proceedings of this court were nearly similar to those of the court of enquiry. The same evidences were examined, with the addition of sir Edward Hawke's deposition; and a defence, differing in no essential point from the former, made by the prisoner; but the judgment given was clear and explicit. Sir John Mordaunt was unanimously found Not guilty, and therefore acquitted, while the public opinion remained unaltered; and many persons inveighed as bitterly against the lenity of the present court-martial, as they had formerly against the severity of the sentence passed upon a late unfortunate admiral. The evidence of one gentleman in particular drew attention: he was accused of tergiversation, and of shewing that partial indulgence which his own conduct required. He publicly defended his character: his performance was censured, and himself dismissed the service by his sovereign.

The operations at sea during the course of this year were neither numerous nor important. The commerce of Great Britain sustained considerable damage from the activity and success of French privateers, of which a great number had been fitted out in the islands of Martinique and Guadalupe. The Greenwich ship of war, mounted with fifty guns, and a frigate of twenty, fell into the hands of the enemy, together with a very considerable number of trading vessels.

These losses, however, were more than compensated by the advantages obtained by the English commanders. The Duc d'Aquitaine, a large ship of fifty guns, was taken in the month of June by two British ships of war, after an obstinate engagement; and about the same time the Aquilon, of nearly the same force, was driven on shore and destroyed near Brest by the Antelope, one of the British cruisers. A French frigate of twenty-six guns, guns, called the Emeraude, was taken in the Channel, after a warm engagement, by an English ship of inferior force, under the command of captain Gilchrist, a brave and active officer, who distinguished himself in the sequel by very extraordinary feats of valour. All the sea officers seemed to be animated with a noble emulation to outvie each other in the service of their country; and the spirit descended even to the captains of privateers, who, instead of imitating the former commanders of that class, in avoiding ships of force, and converting their whole attention to advantageous prizes, now attacked the armed ships of the enemy, and fought with the most obstinate valour in the pursuit of national glory.

History perhaps cannot furnish a more remarkable instance of desperate courage than that which was exhibited in December of the preceding year, by the officers and crew of an English privateer, called the Terrible, under the command of captain William Death, armed with twenty-six carriage guns, and manned with two hundred sailors. On the twenty-third day of the month he engaged and took a large French ship from St. Domingo, after an obstinate battle, in which he lost his fourth lieutenant and three seamen: then he secured with sixteen men his prize, which contained a valuable cargo, and directed his course towards England; but in a few days he had the misfortune to fall in with the Vengeance, a privateer of St. Malo, carrying thirty-four large cannon, with a complement of three hundred and fifty men.

Their first step was to retake the prize, which was easily effected; then the two ships bore down upon the Terrible, whose main-mast was shot away by the first broadside. Notwithstanding this disaster, she maintained such a furious and desperate engagement against both as can hardly be equalled in the annals of Britain. The first and third captains of the Frenchman were killed, with two thirds of their company; but the gallant captain Death, with the greater part of his officers, and almost his whole crew, having met with the same fate, his ship was boarded by the enemy, who found no more than twenty-six persons alive, sixteen of whom were mutilated by the loss of leg or arm, and the other ten grievously wounded. The ship itself was so shattered that it could scarce be kept from sinking, and the whole displayed a most dreadful scene of blood, carnage, and desolation. Even the victor lay a wreck on the surface; and in this condition made shift, with great difficulty, to tow the Terrible into St. Malo, where she was not beheld without astonishment and terror. This adventure was no sooner known in England than a liberal subscription was raised for the support of Death's widow, and that part of the crew which survived the engagement.

In the month of November captain Lockhart, a young gentleman who had already rendered himself a terror to the enemy, as commander of a small frigate, now added considerably to his reputation, by taking the Melampe, a French privateer of Bayonne, greatly superior to his ship in number of men and weight of metal. This exploit was followed by another of the same nature, in his conquest of another French adventurer, called the Countess of Gramont; and a third large privateer of Bayonne was taken by captain Saumarez, commander of the Antelope. In a word, the Narrow Seas were so well guarded, that in a little time scarce a French ship durst stir out of their harbours, while the British traders carried on their traffic without molestation.

Let us now turn our eyes to the continent of America, where we shall see as disagreeable and disgraceful scenes as those exhibited, during the course of this year, by the British arms in Europe.

Whatever reasons the government had to expect the campaign should be vigorously pushed in America, almost every circumstance turned out contrary to expectation. Not all the endeavours of the earl of Loudon to quiet the dissensions among the different provinces, and to establish unanimity and harmony, could prevail. Circumstances required, that he should act the part of a mediator, in order to raise the necessary supplies for prosecuting the war, without which it was impossible he could appear in the character of a general.

The enemy, in the mean time, were pursuing the blow given at Oswego, and taking advantage of the distraction that appeared in the British councils. By their successes, in the preceding campaign, they remained masters of all the lakes. Hence they were furnished with the means of practising on the Indians in all the different districts, and obliging them, by rewards, promises, and menaces, to act in their favour. Every accession to their strength was a real diminution of that of the British commander; but then the ignorance or pusillanimity of some of the inferior officers in our back settlements was, in effect, more beneficial to the enemy than all the vigilance and activity of Montcalm. In consequence of the shameful loss of Oswego, they voluntarily abandoned to the mercy of the French general the whole country of the Five Nations, the only body of Indians who had inviolably performed their engagements, or indeed that had preserved any sincere regard for the British government. The communication with these faithful allies was now cut off, by the imprudent demolition of the forts we possessed at the great Carrying-place. A strong fort indeed was built at Winchester, and called Fort Loudon, after the commander in chief, and four hundred Cherokee Indians joined the English forces at Fort Cumberland: but this by no means counterbalanced the losses sustained in consequence of our having imprudently stopped up Wood Creek, and filled it with logs. Every person the least acquainted with the country, readily perceived the weakness of these measures, by which our whole frontier was left open and exposed to the irruption of the savages in the French interest, who would not fail to profit by our blunders, too notorious to escape them. By the removal of these barriers, a path was opened to our fine settlements on those grounds called the German Flats, and along the Mohawk's river, which the enemy destroyed with fire and sword before the end of the campaign.

In the mean time, lord Loudon was taking the most effectual steps to unite the provinces, and raise a force sufficient to give some decisive blow. The attack on Crown Point, which had been so long meditated, was laid aside, as of less importance than the intended expedition to Louisbourg, now substituted in its place, and undoubtedly a more considerable object in itself. Admiral

Holbourn

Holbourn arrived at Halifax with the squadron and transports under his command on the ninth of July; and it was his lordship's intention to repair thither with all possible diligence, in order to take upon him the command of the expedition; but a variety of accidents interposed. It was with the utmost difficulty he at length assembled a body of six thousand men, with which he instantly began his march to join the troops lately arrived from England. When the junction was effected, the whole forces amounted to twelve thousand men; an army that raised great expectations. Immediately some small vessels were sent out to examine and reconnoitre the condition of the enemy, and the intermediate time was employed in embarking the troops, as soon as the transports arrived. The return of the scouts totally altered the face of affairs: they brought the unwelcome news, that M. de Bois de la Mothe, who sailed in the month of May from Brest with a large fleet of men of war and transports, was now safe at anchor in the harbour of Louisbourg. Their intelligence was supported by the testimony of several deserters; yet still it wanted confirmation, and many persons believed their account of the enemy's strength greatly magnified. Such advices, however, could not but occasion extraordinary fluctuations in the councils of war at Halifax. Some were for setting aside all thoughts of the expedition for that season; while others, more warm in their dispositions, and sanguine in their expectations, were for prosecuting it with vigour, in spite of all dangers and difficulties. Their disputes were carried on with great vehemence, when a packet, bound from Louisbourg for France, was taken by one of his majesty's ships stationed at Newfoundland. She had letters on board, which put the enemy's superiority beyond all doubt, at least by sea. It clearly appeared there were at that time in Louisbourg six thousand regular troops, three thousand natives, and one thousand three hundred Indians, with seventeen ships of the line, and three frigates moored in the harbour; that the place was well supplied with ammunition, provision, and every kind of military stores; and that the enemy wished for nothing more than an attack, which it was probable would terminate to the disgrace of the assailants, and ruin of the British affairs in America. The commanders at Halifax were fully apprized of the consequences of an unsuccessful attempt: it was therefore almost unanimously resolved to postpone the expedition to some more convenient opportunity, especially as the season was now far advanced, which alone would be sufficient to frustrate their endeavours, and render the enterprize abortive.

This resolution seems indeed to have been the most eligible in their circumstances, whatever constructions might afterwards be given, with intention to prejudice the public against the commander in chief. Lord Loudon's departure from New York, with all the forces he was able to collect, afforded the marquis de Montcalm the fairest occasion of improving the successes of the former campaign. That general had, in the very commencement of the season, made three different attacks on Fort William-Henry, in all which he was repulsed by the vigour and resolution of the garrison. But his disappointment here was bal-lanced by an advantage gained by a party of regulars and Indians at Ticonderoga. Colonel John Parker, with a detachment of near four hundred men, went by water, in whale and bay-boats, to attack the enemy's advanced guard at that place. Landing at night on an island, he sent before dawn three boats to the main land, which the enemy way-laid and took. Having procured the necessary intelligence from the prisoners of the colonel's designs, they contrived their measures, placed three hundred men in ambush behind the point where he proposed landing, and sent three battoes to the place of rendezvous. Colonel Parker, mistaking these for his own boats, eagerly put to shore, was surrounded by the enemy, reinforced with four hundred men, and attacked with such impetuosity, that, of the whole detachment, only two officers and seventy private men escaped. Flushed with this advantage, animated by the absence of the British commander in chief, then at Halifax, and fired with a desire to revenge the disgrace he had lately sustained before Fort Henry, Montcalm drew together all his forces, with intention to lay siege to that place. Fort William-Henry stands on the southern coast of Lake George. It was built with a view to protect and cover the frontiers of the English colonies, as well as to command the lake. The fortifications were good, defended by a garrison of near three thousand men, and covered by an army of four thousand, under the conduct of general Webb, posted at no great distance. When the marquis de Montcalm had assembled all the forces at Crown Point, Ticonderoga, and the adjacent posts, together with a considerable body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in the whole to near ten thousand men, he marched directly to the fort, made his approaches, and with a good train of artillery began playing on the garrison.

On the very day he invested the place, he sent a letter to colonel Monro, telling him, he thought himself obliged, in humanity, to desire he would surrender the fort, and not provoke the great number of savages in the French army by a vain resistance. "A detachment of your garrison has lately, says he, experienced their cruelty: I have it yet in my power to restrain them, and oblige them to observe a capitulation, as none of them hitherto are killed; which will not be in my power in other circumstances. Your persisting in the defence of your fort can only retard its fate a few days, and must of necessity expose an unfortunate garrison, who can possibly receive no relief, considering the precautions taken to prevent it. I demand a decisive answer, for which purpose I have sent the sieur Funtbrune, one of my aid-de-camps. You may credit what he will inform you of, from Montcalm."

General Webb beheld his preparations with an indifference and security bordering on infatuation. It is credibly reported, that he had private intelligence of all the French general's designs and motions; yet, either despising his strength, or discrediting the information, he neglected collecting the militia in time, which, in conjunction with his own forces, would probably have obliged Montcalm to relinquish the attempt, or at least have rendered his success very doubtful and hazardous. The enemy, meeting with no disturbance from the quarter they most dreaded, prosecuted the siege with with vigour, and were warmly received by the garrison, who fired with great spirit, till they had burst almost all their cannon, and spent their ammunition. Neither Montcalm's promises or threats could prevail upon them to surrender, while they were in a condition to defend themselves, or could reasonably expect assistance from general Webb: they even persisted to hold out after prudence dictated they ought to surrender. Colonel Monro was sensible of the importance of his charge, and imagined that general Webb, though slow in his motions, would surely make some vigorous efforts either to raise the siege, or force a supply of ammunition, provision, and other necessaries into the garrison. At length necessity obliged him, after sustaining a siege from the third to the ninth day of August, to hang out a flag of truce, which was immediately answered by the French commander. Hostages were exchanged, and articles of capitulation signed by both parties; whereby the garrison of Fort William-Henry, and the troops in the retrenched camp, should march out with their arms, the baggage of the officers and soldiers, and all the usual necessaries of war; escorted by a detachment of French troops, or interpreters attached to the savages. It was agreed, that the gate of the fort should be delivered to the troops of the most Christian king, immediately after signing the capitulation; and the retrenched camp, on the departure of the British forces: that the artillery, warlike stores, provision, and in general every thing, except the effects of the soldiers, and officers, should, upon honour, be delivered to the French troops; for which purpose it was agreed there should be delivered, with the capitulation, an exact inventory of the stores, and other particulars specified: that the garrison of the fort, the troops in the retrenchment, and dependencies, should not serve for the space of eighteen months, from the date of the capitulation, against his most Christian majesty, or his allies: that with the capitulation there should be delivered an exact state of the troops, specifying the names of the officers, engineers, artilleryists, commissaries, and all employed: that the officers and soldiers, Canadians, women, and savages made prisoners by land since the commencement of the war in North America, be delivered in the space of three months at Carrilon; in return for which an equal number of the garrison of Fort William should be capacitated to serve, agreeable to the return given by the English officer, and the receipt of the French commanding officers, of the prisoners so delivered: that an officer remain as an hostage, till the safe return of the escort sent with the troops of his Britannic majesty: that the sick and wounded, not in a condition to be transported to Fort Edward, should remain under the protection of the marquis de Montcalm; who engaged to use them with tenderness and humanity, and to return them as soon as recovered: that provision for two days should be issued out for the British troops: that in testimony of his esteem and respect for colonel Monro and his garrison, on account of their gallant defence, the marquis de Montcalm should return one cannon, a six pounder.

Whether the marquis de Montcalm was really assiduous to have these articles punctually executed, we cannot pretend to determine; but certain it is, that they were perfidiously broke, in almost every instance. The savages, in the French interest, either paid no regard to the capitulation, or were permitted, from views of policy, to act the most treacherous, inhuman, and insidious part. They fell upon the British troops as they marched out, despoiled them of the few remaining effects, dragged the Indians in the English service out of their ranks, scalping, tomohawking, and again acting the tragedy at Oswego, with a thousand additional outrages and barbarities. The throats of many women, we are told, were cut, their bodies ript open, bowels torn out, and insultingly thrown in their faces, with such savage marks of rage and horrible cruelty, as, for the sake of humanity, ought to be discredited. Can posterity be brought to believe, that two thousand Britons, with arms in their hands, could be tame spectators of these, and more shocking barbarities? That they would permit a rabble of brutish savages to seize infants and children by the heels, and wantonly beat out their brains against trees and stones! Yet were these and other enormities, equally disgraceful to humanity, committed in sight of the French and British forces, if we may credit the testimony of credible evidences. However, the greatest part of the British garrison got safe, though in a miserable condition, to Fort Edward, after being pursued for seven miles by the Indians; and the rest, flying for protection to the marquis de Montcalm, were by him sent home. A little time after the enemy demolished the fort, carried off the effects, provision, artillery, and every thing else left by the garrison, together with the vessels preserved in the lake, and departed, without pursuing their success by any other attempt.

Thus ended the third campaign in America, where, with a vast increase of forces, a clear superiority over the enemy, an army of twenty thousand regular troops, a great number of provincial forces, and a prodigious naval power, not less than twenty ships of the line, we abandoned our allies, exposed our people, suffered them to be cruelly massacred, in sight of our troops, and relinquished a large and valuable tract of country, to the eternal reproach and disgrace of the British name.

We could not, without interrupting the principal operations, take notice of two occurrences which ought to have been mentioned.

In the month of July a stratagem, contrived by the enemy, had very nearly occasioned the loss of Fort Johnson. They proposed rushing into the fort in the evening, when the gate was open to admit the Negroe women, sent out every day to milk the cattle. Happening to be a few minutes too late, the gates were fortunately shut before their arrival: upon which they knocked for admission, were challenged, and fired upon by the sentinel. Immediately the cannon were fired to alarm the country, and the enemy, perceiving their scheme baffled, retired with precipitation.

The other occurrence we mention is of a civil nature. The governor and council of Nova Scotia, taking into consideration the most expedient methods for carrying into execution those parts of his majesty's commission and instructions, relative to the manner of holding the general assembly of that province, came to a resolution, that a house of representatives of the province should constitute the legislature of Nova Scotia, in conjunction with his his majesty's governor and commander in chief for the time being, and his majesty's council of the said province. It was further resolved, that the general assembly be elected and convened in the manner following, viz. Twelve members to be elected for the province at large, till such time as it is divided into counties. Halifax was appointed to send four members, and other towns and corporations in proportion to their bulk and value to the province, making in all twenty-two; the number of representatives to sit in the house.

As to the naval transactions in this country, though less infamous, they were not less unfortunate. Immediately on lord Loudon's departure from Halifax, admiral Holbourn, now freed from the care of the transports, set sail for Louisbourg, with fifteen ships of the line, one ship of fifty guns, three small frigates, and a fire ship. What the object of this cruize might have been, can only be conjectured. Some imagine curiosity was the admiral's sole motive, and the desire of informing himself with certainty of the enemy's strength; while others persuaded themselves, that he was in hopes of drawing M. de la Mothe to an engagement, notwithstanding his superiority in number of ships and weight of metal. Be this as it may, the British squadron appeared off Louisbourg on the twentieth day of August; and approaching within two miles of the batteries, saw the French admiral make the signal to unmoor. Mr. Holbourn was greatly inferior in strength; and it is obvious, that his design was not to fight the enemy, as he immediately made the best of his way to Halifax. About the middle of September, being reinforced with four ships of the line, he again proceeded to Louisbourg, probably with intention, if possible, to draw the enemy to an engagement; but he found de la Mothe too prudent to hazard an unnecessary battle, the loss of which would have greatly exposed all the French colonies. Here the English squadron continued cruising until the twenty-fifth, when they were overtaken in a terrible storm from the southward. When the hurricane began, the fleet was about forty leagues distant from Louisbourg; but were driven in twelve hours within two miles of the rocks, and breakers on that coast. Here the wind providentially shifting saved the whole squadron, except the Tilbury, shipwrecked upon the rocks, and half her crew drowned. Eleven ships were dismasted; others threw over their guns; and all returned in a very shattered condition to England, at a very unfavourable season of the year.

In this manner ended the expedition to Louisbourg, more unfortunate to the nation than the preceding designs upon Rochefort; less disgraceful to the commanders, but equally the occasion of ridicule and triumph to our enemies. Indeed, the unhappy consequences of the political disputes at home, the instability of the administration, and the frequent revolutions in our councils, were strongly manifested by that languor infused into all our military operations, and general unsteadiness in our pursuit. Faction in the mother country, produced divisions and misconduct in the colonies. No ambition to signalize themselves appeared among the officers, from the uncertainty whether their services were to be rewarded or condemned. Their attachment to particular persons weakened the love they ought to have entertained for their country in general, and destroyed that spirit of enterprize, that firmness and resolution, which constitutes the commander, and without which the best capacity, joined to the most uncorruptible integrity, can effect nothing.

In the East Indies the scene was changed greatly to the honour and advantage of Great Britain. Here the commanders acted with that harmony, spirit, and unanimity becoming Britons, zealous for the credit of their king and the interest of their country. We left admiral Watson and colonel Clive advancing to Calcutta, to revenge the cruel tragedy acted upon their countrymen the preceding year. On the thirty-first of January the admiral with two ships appeared before the town, and was received by a brisk fire from the batteries. This salute was returned so warmly that the enemy's guns were soon silenced; and in less than two hours the place and fort were abandoned. Colonel Clive, on the other side, invested the town, and made the attack with that vigour and intrepidity peculiar to himself, which greatly contributed to the sudden reduction of the settlement. As soon as the fort was surrendered, the brave and active captain Coote, with his majesty's troops, took possession, and found ninety-one pieces of cannon, four mortars, abundance of ammunition, stores, and provisions, with every requisite for sustaining an obstinate siege. Thus the English were re-established in the two strongest fortresses in the Ganges, with the inconsiderable loss of nine seamen killed, and three soldiers. A few days after, Hughly, a city of great trade, situated higher up the river, was reduced with as little difficulty, but infinitely greater prejudice to the nabob, as here his store-houses of salt, and vast granaries for the support of his army, were burnt and destroyed. Incensed at the almost instantaneous loss of all his conquests, and demolition of the city of Hughly, the viceroy of Bengal assembled an army of ten thousand horse and fifteen thousand foot, fully resolved to expel the English out of his dominions, and take ample vengeance for the disgraces he had lately sustained. He was seen marching by the English camp in his way to Calcutta on the second of February, where he encamped, about a mile from the town. Colonel Clive immediately made application to the admiral for a reinforcement; and six hundred men under the command of captain Warwick, were accordingly draughted from the different ships, and sent to assist his little army. Clive drew out his forces, advanced in three columns towards the enemy, and begun the attack so vigorously, that the viceroy retreated, after a feeble resistance, with the loss of a thousand men killed, wounded, and taken prisoners, five hundred horses, great numbers of draught bullocks, and four elephants. Though this advantage was less decisive than could be wished, yet did it sufficiently intimidate the Nabob into concessions much to the honour and advantage of the company. He promised not to disturb the English in any of those privileges or possessions specified in the phirmand granted by the Mogul: and that all merchandize belonging to the company should pass and repass in every part of the province of Bengal, free of duty: that all the English factories seized the preceding year, or since, would be restored, with the money, goods, and effects appertaining; that all damages sustained by the English should be repaired.

paired, and their losses repaid: that the English should have liberty to fortify Calcutta, in whatever manner they thought proper, without interruption: that they should have the liberty of coining all the gold and bullion they imported, which should pass current in the province: that he would remain in strict friendship and alliance with the English, use his utmost endeavours to heal up the late divisions, and restore the former good understanding between them. All which several articles were solemnly signed and sealed with the Nabob's own hand.

Such were the terms obtained for the company by the spirited and gallant conduct of the two English commanders. They had, however, too much discernment to rely on the promises of a barbarian, who had so perfidiously broke former engagements: but they prudently dissembled their sentiments, until they had thoroughly reinstated the affairs of the company, and reduced the French power in this province. The chief object of their designs was the reduction of Chandernagore, a French settlement, higher up the river than Calcutta, of considerable strength, and the chief in importance of any possessed by that nation in the bay. Colonel Clive, being reinforced by three hundred men from Bombay, began his march to Chandernagore, at the head of seven hundred Europeans and one thousand six hundred Indians, where on his first arrival, he took possession of all the out-posts, except one redoubt mounted with eight pieces of cannon, which he left to be silenced by the admiral. On the eighteenth of March the admirals Watson and Pocock arrived within two miles of the French settlement, with the Kent, Tiger, and Salisbury men of war; and found their passage obstructed by booms laid across the river, and several vessels sunk in the channel. These difficulties being removed, they advanced early on the twenty-fourth, and drew up in a line before the fort, which they battered with great fury for three hours; while colonel Clive was making his approaches on the land side, and playing vigorously from the batteries he had raised. Their united efforts soon obliged the enemy to submission. A flag of truce was waved over the walls, and the place surrendered by capitulation. The keys were delivered to captain Latham of the Tiger, and in the afternoon colonel Clive with the king's troops took possession. Thus the reduction of a strong fortress, garrisoned by five hundred Europeans, and one thousand two hundred Indians, defended by one hundred and twenty-three pieces of cannon, and three mortars, well provided with all kinds of stores and necessaries, and of very great importance to the enemy's commerce in India, was accomplished with a loss not exceeding forty men on the side of the conquerors.

By the treaty of capitulation the director, counsellors, and inferior servants of the settlement, were allowed to depart with their wearing apparel: the Jesuits were permitted to take away their church-ornaments, and the natives to remain in the full exertion of their liberties; but the garrison were to continue prisoners of war. The goods and money found in the place were considerable; but the principal advantage arose from the ruin of the head settlement of the enemy on the Ganges, which could not but interfere with the English commerce in these parts.

Success had hitherto attended all the operations of the British commanders, because they were concerted with foresight and unanimity; and executed with that vigour and spirit which have deservedly raised them high in the esteem of their country. They reduced the Nabob to reasonable terms of accommodation, before they alarmed the French; and now, when the power of the latter was destroyed, they entered upon measures to oblige the treacherous viceroy to a strict performance of the treaty he had so lately signed. However specious his promises were, they found him extremely dilatory in the execution of several articles of the treaty, which, in effect, was the same to the English commerce as if none had been concluded. The company's goods were loaded with high duties, and several other infractions of the peace committed, upon such frivolous pretences as evidently demonstrated that he sought to come to an open rupture as soon as his projects were ripe for execution. As recommencing hostilities against so powerful a prince was in itself dangerous, and, if possible, to be avoided, the affair was laid before the council of Calcutta, and canvassed with all the circumspection and caution that a measure required, on which depended the fate of the whole trade of Bengal. During these deliberations a most fortunate incident occurred, that soon determined the council to come to an open rupture. The leading persons in the viceroy's court found themselves oppressed by his haughtiness and insolence. The same spirit of discontent appeared among the principal officers of his army: they were well acquainted with his perfidy, saw his preparations for war, and were sensible that the peace of the country could never be restored, unless either the English were expelled, or the Nabob deposed. In consequence, a plan was concerted for divesting him of all his power; and the conspiracy was conducted by Jaffier Ali Khan, his prime minister and chief commander, a nobleman of great influence and authority in the province. The project was communicated by Ali Khan to Mr. Watts, second in council at Calcutta, and so improved by the address of that gentleman as in a manner to insure success.

When the plan was fully concerted between the disaffected Indians and the council, colonel Clive was ordered to take the field with his little army. Admiral Watson undertook the defence of Chandernagore, and the garrison was detached to reinforce the colonel, together with fifty seamen, to be employed as gunners, and in directing the artillery. On the nineteenth of June a detachment was sent to attack Cutwa fort and town, situated on that branch of the river forming the island Calsimbuzar. This place surrendered at the first summons; and here the colonel halted with the army for three days, expecting advices from Ali Khan. Disappointed of the hoped-for intelligence, he crossed the river on the twenty-second, and the same day attacked the viceroy at the head of twenty thousand men with his own forces only, Ali Khan declining as yet to declare himself openly. After a short contest the enemy were put to flight, the Nabob's camp, baggage, and fifty pieces of cannon taken, and a most complete victory obtained. The colonel, pursuing his advantage, marched to Muxadavat, the capital of the province, and was there joined by Ali Khan and the malcontents.

It was before concerted, that this nobleman should be invested with the dignity of Nabob: accordingly, the colonel proceeded solemnly to depose the Sulajud Dowla, and, with the same ceremony, to substitute Ali Khan in his room, who was publicly acknowledged by the people as suba, or viceroy of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orixa. Soon after the late viceroy was taken, and put to death by his successor, who readily complied with all the conditions of his elevation. He conferred on his allies such liberal rewards, and granted the company so extraordinary privileges, as fully demonstrated how justly he merited their assistance. By this alliance, and the reduction of Chandanagore, the French were entirely excluded the commerce of Bengal and its dependencies; the trade of the English company was restored, and increased beyond the most sanguine hopes; a new ally was acquired, whose interest obliged him to remain firm to his engagements; above two millions sterling paid to the company and the sufferers at Calcutta, to indemnify their losses; the soldiers and seamen gratified with the sum of six hundred thousand pounds, as a reward for the courage and intrepidity they exerted; and a variety of other advantages gained, which it would be unnecessary to enumerate. In a word, in the space of fourteen days a great revolution was effected, and the government of a vast country, superior in wealth, fertility, extent, and number of inhabitants, to most European kingdoms, transferred by a handful of troops, conducted by an officer untutored in the art of war, and a general rather by intuition than instruction and experience. But the public joy at these signal successes was, however, considerably diminished by the death of admiral Watson, and the loss of Vizagapatam, an English settlement on the Coromandel coast. The admiral fell a victim to the unwholesomeness of the climate on the sixteenth of August, universally esteemed and regretted; and the factory and fort at Vizagapatam were surrendered to the French a few days after colonel Clive had defeated the Nabob.

Having now particularized all the foreign transactions of this year, I shall, previous to my entering upon the history of the next session of parliament, as well as to prevent the narrative of parliamentary affairs being interrupted, mention a few domestic occurrences which happened during the year 1757, and which deserve to be recorded, however desultory, unconnected, and incapable of historical embellishment they may appear. Among the most interesting we may reckon those tumults and riots of the populace in Kent, Hertfordshire, Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire, Bedfordshire, York city and county, to oppose the execution of the militia bill. Many disorders were committed on these occasions; and the people, incensed at the irregularity of the proceedings of those gentlemen appointed to carry the act into execution, and with certain defects in the act, seemed wholly to neglect the real advantages which in time must necessarily flow from a measure the most constitutional and salutary that can be imagined, for the defence and protection of public liberty.

His majesty having taken into consideration the incredible damage sustained by the commerce of these kingdoms, for want of proper harbours and forts on the western coast to receive and protect merchantmen, was graciously pleased to order that a temporary security should be provided for the shipping which might touch at Milford-haven, until the fortifications voted in parliament could be erected. How far his majesty's directions have been complied with, the number of merchantmen taken by the enemy's privateers upon that coast, sufficiently indicates. His majesty likewise, reflecting on the late hardships sustained by the innholders in the county of Kent, by the constant quartering of soldiers in their houses, was pleased to direct the sum of three thousand pounds to be transmitted to them, and distributed by Mr. Austen, clerk of the peace for that county: a well-timed act of liberality, that fully evinced his majesty's extreme affection and tender regard for the interest and happiness of his people.

On the first day of December his majesty opened the session of parliament with a speech, in which he declared, that it would have given him a most sensible pleasure to acquaint them, at the beginning of the session, that his success in carrying on the war had been equal to the justice of his cause, and the extent and vigour of the measures formed for that purpose: that, for his own part, he had the firmest confidence that the spirit and bravery of the nation, so renowned in all times, and which had formerly surmounted so many difficulties, were not to be abated by a few disappointments which, he trusted, might be retrieved, by the blessing of God, and the zeal and ardour of his parliament for his majesty's honour and the advantage of their country: that it was his determined resolution to apply his utmost efforts for the security of his kingdoms, and for the recovery and protection of the possessions and rights of his crown in America, and elsewhere, as well by the strongest exertion of his naval force as by all other methods: that another great object which he had at heart was, the preservation of the protestant religion and the liberties of Europe; and, with that view, to encourage and adhere to his allies: that, for this cause, he would decline no inconveniences; and, in this cause, he confidently expected their hearty concurrence and vigorous assistance: that the late signal success in Germany had given a happy turn to affairs, which it was incumbent on them to improve; and that, in such a critical conjuncture, the eyes of all Europe were upon them: that he hoped they would be of opinion, that his good brother and ally the king of Prussia ought to be supported in such a manner as his magnanimity and active zeal for the common cause deserved: that it gave him, indeed, the most sensible concern, that the large supplies they had already granted had not produced all the good fruits they had reason to expect; but he had so great a reliance on their wisdom, as not to doubt of their perseverance: that he desired only such supplies as should be necessary for the public service; and they might rest assured that the best and most faithful oeconomy should be used: that, notwithstanding his firm conviction of the loyalty and good affections of his faithful subjects, he could not help taking notice of that spirit of disorder which had lately shewn itself among the common people in some parts of the kingdom; he hoped they would use their utmost endeavours for discouraging and suppressing such abuses, and for maintaining the laws and lawful authority:

authority: and, finally, that nothing would so effectually conduce to the defence of all that was dear to the nation, as well as to the reducing their enemies to reason, as union and harmony among themselves."

Addressees of thanks having been presented by both houses, the commons proceeded to settle the supply. They granted for the sea service of the ensuing year sixty thousand men, including fourteen thousand eight hundred and forty-five marines; and the standing army, comprehending four thousand invalids, was fixed at fifty-three thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven effective men, commission and non-commission officers included. For the maintenance of these forces, by sea and land, the charge of guards and garrisons at home and abroad, the expence of the ordnance, and in order to make good the sum which had been issued by his majesty's orders, in pursuance of the address from the commons, they now allotted four millions twenty-two thousand eight hundred and seven pounds seven shillings and three-pence. They unanimously granted, as a present supply in the then critical exigency, towards enabling his majesty to maintain and keep together the army formed last year in his electoral dominions, and then again put in motion, and actually employed against the common enemy, in concert with the king of Prussia, the sum of one hundred thousand pounds: for the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to the sea-officers, they allowed two hundred twenty-four thousand four hundred twenty-one pounds five shillings and eight-pence: towards the building and support of the three hospitals for seamen at Gosport, Plymouth, and Greenwich, thirty thousand pounds: for the reduced officers of the land-forces and marines, pensions to the widows of officers, and other such military contingencies, forty thousand nine hundred and twenty-six pounds seventeen shillings and eleven pence: towards building, rebuilding, and repairs of his majesty's ships for the ensuing year, the sum of two hundred thousand pounds: for defraying the charge of two thousand one hundred and twenty horse, and nine thousand nine hundred infantry, together with the general and staff-officers, the officers of the hospital and the train of artillery, being the troops of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel in the pay of Great Britain for sixty days, together with the subsidy for the said time, pursuant to the treaty, they assigned thirty-eight thousand three hundred and sixty pounds nineteen shillings and ten pence three farthings.

To the Foundling-hospital they gave forty thousand pounds, for the maintenance and education of deserted young children, as well as for the reception of all such as should be presented under a certain age, to be limited by the governor and guardians of that charity. Three hundred thousand pounds were given towards discharging the debt of the navy; and two hundred eighty-four thousand eight hundred and two pounds for making up the deficiency of the grants for the service of the preceding year. The landgrave of Hesse Cassel was, moreover, gratified with the further sum of two hundred and three thousand five hundred and thirty-six pounds four shillings and nine pence one farthing for the maintenance of his forces, and the remainder of his subsidy.

They granted six hundred and seventy thousand pounds for enabling his majesty to make good his engagements with the king of Prussia, pursuant to a convention lately concluded with that potentate. For defraying the charge of thirty-eight thousand men of the troops of Hanover, Wolfenbuttle, Saxe Gotha, and the count of Buckbourg, together with that of general and staff-officers, actually employed against the common enemy, in concert with the king of Prussia, from the twenty-eighth day of November in the last, to the twenty-fourth day of December in the present year inclusive, to be issued in advance every two months, they allotted the sum of four hundred and sixty-three thousand eighty-four pounds six shillings and ten pence: and furthermore, they granted three hundred and eighty-six thousand nine hundred and fifteen pounds thirteen shillings and two pence, to defray the charges of forage, bread-waggons, train of artillery, provisions, wood, straw, and all other extraordinary expences, contingencies, and losses whatsoever incurred, or to be incurred on account of his majesty's army, consisting of 38,000 men, actually employed against the common enemy, in concert with the king of Prussia, from November last to next December inclusive.

For the extraordinary expences of the land forces, and other services, incurred in the course of the last year, and not provided for by parliament, they allowed one hundred forty-five thousand four hundred and fifty-four pounds fifteen shillings and one farthing. They provided eight hundred thousand pounds to enable his majesty to defray the like sum raised in pursuance of an act made in the last session of parliament, and charged upon the first aids and supplies to be granted in the current session. Twenty-six thousand pounds were bestowed on the out-pensioners of Chelsea-hospital; above twenty thousand for the expence of maintaining the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia: for reimbursing to the province of Massachusetts Bay and the colony of Connecticut, their expence in furnishing provisions and stores to the troops raised by them for his majesty's service in the campaign of the year 1756, the sum of forty-one thousand one hundred seventeen pounds seventeen shillings and sixpence halfpenny; to be applied towards the rebuilding of London-bridge, carrying on the works for fortifying and securing the harbour of Milford, and repairing the parish-church of St. Margaret in Westminster, they allotted twenty-nine thousand pounds.

The East India company were indulged with twenty thousand pounds upon account, towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their settlements, to be maintained by them in lieu of the battalion of his majesty's forces withdrawn from those settlements: the sum of ten thousand pounds was given, as usual, for maintaining and supporting the British forts and settlements on the coast of Africa: and eleven thousand four hundred and fifty pounds were granted as an augmentation to the salaries of the judges in the superior courts of judicature. They likewise provided one hundred thousand pounds for defraying the charge of pay and cloathing to the militia; and advanced eight hundred thousand pounds to enable his majesty to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred, or to be incurred for the service of the the current year; and to take all such measures as might be necessary to disappoint or defeat any enterprizes or designs of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs might require. The whole supplies of this session amounted to the sum of ten millions four hundred eighty-six thousand four hundred fifty-seven pounds and one penny.

The funds established by the committee of ways and means, in order to make good these liberal grants, consisted of the malt-tax, the land-tax at four shillings in the pound, sums remaining in the Exchequer produced from the sinking fund, four millions five hundred thousand pounds to be raised by annuities, at three pounds ten shillings per cent. per ann. and five hundred thousand pounds by a lottery, attended with annuities redeemable by parliament, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum: these several annuities to be transferable at the Bank of England, and charged upon a fund to be established in this session of parliament for payment thereof, and for which the sinking fund should be a collateral security; one million six hundred and six thousand seventy-six pounds five shillings and one penny farthing, issued and applied out of such monies as should or might arise from the surplusses, excesses, and other revenues composing the sinking fund; a tax of one shilling in the pound to be annually paid from all salaries, fees, and perquisites of offices and employments in Great Britain, and from all pensions and other gratuities payable out of any revenues belonging to his majesty in Great Britain, exceeding the yearly value of one hundred pounds; an imposition of one shilling annually upon every dwelling-house inhabited within the kingdom of Great Britain, over and above all other duties already chargeable upon them, to commence from the fifth day of April; an additional tax of six-pence yearly for every window or light in every dwelling-house inhabited in Britain, which shall contain fifteen windows or upwards; a continuation of certain acts near expiring, with respect to the duties payable on foreign sail-cloth imported into Great Britain, the exportation of British gunpowder, the securing and encouraging the trade of his majesty's sugar colonies in America, and the empowering the importers and proprietors of spirits from the British sugar plantations, to land them before payment of the duties of excise, and to lodge them in warehouses at their own expence; an annual tax of forty shillings for a licence to be taken out by every person trading in, selling, or vending gold or silver plate, in lieu of the duty of six-pence per ounce on all silver plate, made or wrought, or which ought to be touched, assayed, or marked in this kingdom, which duty now ceased and determined; a cessation of all drawbacks payable on the exportation of silver plate; a law prohibiting all persons from selling by retail any sweets or made wines, without first having procured a licence for that purpose; and a loan, by Exchequer bills, for eight hundred thousand pounds, to be charged on the first aids to be granted in the next session of parliament. These provisions amounted to the sum of eleven millions seventy-nine thousand seven hundred and twenty-two pounds six shillings and ten-pence, exceeding the grants in the sum of five hundred and ninety-three thousand two hundred and sixty-five pounds six shillings and nine-pence; the surplus being intended to supply the deficiencies that might happen in collecting the several duties.

The supply granted by the commons for maintaining the Hanoverian army was, in consequence of a message, communicated by Mr. secretary Pitt, intimating, that the king had ordered his electoral army to be put again into motion, that it might act with vigour against the common enemy, in concert with his good brother and ally the king of Prussia; and that the exhausted and ruined state of the electorate, having rendered it incapable of maintaining that army, until the further necessary charge thereof, as well as the more particular measures then concerting for the effectual support of his Prussian majesty, could be laid before the house, the king relying on the constant zeal of his faithful commons, for the support of the protestant religion, and of the liberties of Europe, against the dangerous designs of France and her confederates, found himself, in the mean time, under the absolute necessity of recommending to the house the speedy consideration of such a present supply as might enable his majesty in this critical conjuncture to subsist and keep together the said army. This message was no sooner read by the speaker than it was referred to the committee of supply, who immediately granted the sum above-mentioned.

At the same time, in order the more effectually to provide for the security of Hanover, and the support of the protestant cause in Germany, the ministry concluded a new treaty or convention with his Prussian majesty; which, that it might have the firmer consistence and the greater authority, was, on the part of Great Britain, transacted and signed by almost all the privy-counsellors who had any share in the administration*. This treaty, which was signed at Westminster on the eleventh day of April, imported, That the contracting powers having mutually resolved to continue their efforts for their mutual defence and security, for the recovery of their possessions, the protection of their allies, and the support of the liberties of the Germanic body; his Britannic majesty had, from these considerations, determined to grant to his Prussian majesty an immediate succour in money, as being the most ready and efficacious method; and their majesties having judged it proper, that thereupon a convention should be made for declaring and fixing their intentions upon this head, they had nominated and authorized their respective ministers, who, after having communicated their full powers to one another, agreed to the following stipulations: that the king of Great Britain should pay in the city of London, to such person as should be authorized to receive it by his Prussian majesty, the sum of four millions of German crowns, amounting to six hundred and seventy thousand pounds sterling, to be payed at once, and in one whole sum, immediately after the exchange of ratifications, upon being demanded by his Prussian majesty: that this prince, on his part, should apply that sum to the maintaining and augmenting his forces, which should act in the best manner for the good of the common cause, and for the purpose of reciprocal defence and mutual security proposed by their said majesties: that the high contracting parties should conclude no treaty of peace, truce, or neutrality, nor any other sort of convention or agreement, with the powers engaged in the present war, but in concert and by mutual agreement, wherein both should be nominally comprehended: and, finally, that this convention should be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged on both sides, within the terms of six weeks, to be computed from the day of signing this present convention, or sooner, if possible.

* These were, sir Robert Henley, lord-keeper of the privy-seal; John earl Granville, president of the council; Thomas Holles, duke of Newcastle, first commissioner of the Treasury; Robert earl of Holderness, one of the principal secretaries of state; Philip earl of Hardwicke; and William Pitt, esq. an-

All the resolutions to which the committee of ways and means agreed were executed by bills, or clauses in bills, which afterwards received the royal assent. The militia still continued to be an object of parliamentary care and attention; but the scheme was not yet prosecuted with any kind of spirit, because seemingly discouraged by the remnant of the old ministry, which still enjoyed a considerable share in the government, and indeed almost wholly ingrossed the distribution of pensions and places.

The commons having presented an address to his majesty, with respect to the harbour of Milford-haven, a book of plans and estimates for fortifying that harbour was laid before the house, and a committee appointed to examine the particulars. They gave it as their opinion, that the mouth of the harbour was too wide to admit of any fortification or effectual defence; but that the passage called Nailand-point, lying higher than Hubberstone-road, might be fortified so as to afford safe riding and anchorage to the trade and navy of Great Britain: that, if it should be thought proper hereafter to form a yard and dock for building and equipping fleets at Milford, no place could, from the situation, nature, soil, and a general concurrence of all necessary local circumstances, be more fitted for such a design: that if proper use were made of this valuable, though long-neglected, harbour, the distressful delays, so often embarrassing and disappointing the nation in her naval operations, might be in a great measure happily removed, to the infinite relief and advantage of the kingdom in the means of improving its naval force; the necessary progress and free execution of which was now so unhappily and frequently restrained and frustrated, by the want of an harbour like that of Milford-haven, framed by nature for such a convenience. This report appeared to be so well founded, in fact, that a bill was prepared and passed into a law, for granting ten thousand pounds towards carrying on the works for fortifying and securing the harbour of Milford in the county of Pembroke.

Other laws of national importance were enacted in the course of this session, with little or no opposition. On the very first day of their sitting, the commons received a petition from the mayor, magistrates, merchants, and inhabitants of Liverpool, complaining of the high price of wheat and other grain; expressing their apprehension that it would continue to rise, unless the time for the importation of foreign corn, duty free, should be prolonged, or some other salutary measure taken by parliament, to prevent dealers from engrossing corn; submitting to the wisdom of the house a total prohibition of distilling and exporting grain, while the high price should continue; and praying they would take the premises into consideration, and grant a seasonable relief to the petitioners, by a continuance of a free importation, and taking such other effectual means to reduce the growing price of corn, as to them should seem necessary and expedient.

This being a public grievance that equally affected the nation in general, and the manufacturers in particular, it was canvassed and discussed with remarkable dispatch. In a few days a bill was passed through both houses, and enacted into a law, continuing till the twenty-fourth day of December, in the present year, the three acts of last session; prohibiting the exportation of corn, restraining the distillation of spirits, and permitting the importation of corn duty free.

A second law was established, regulating the price and assize of bread, and subjecting those to severe penalties who should be concerned in its adulteration. In consequence of certain resolutions taken in a committee of the whole house, a bill was prepared for prohibiting the payment of the bounty upon the exportation of corn, unless sold at a lower price than is allowed in an act passed in the first year of the reign of king William and queen Mary: but this bill, after having been twice read and committed, was first postponed and finally let fall.

In pursuance of a motion made by Mr. Grenville, a humane bill was framed and brought in for the encouragement of seamen employed in the royal navy, establishing a regular method for the punctual, frequent, and certain payment of their wages; enabling them more easily and readily to remit money for the support of their wives and families, and preventing frauds and abuses attending such payments. This bill being passed by the commons, was sent up to the lords, who examined the matter with great attention, and, by divers messages to the lower house, desired the attendance of several of its members. These messages were no sooner communicated than several precedents were produced; and a debate arose about the propriety of complying with their contents.

The house therefore unanimously resolved, that a message should be sent to the lords, acquainting them, that the house of commons, not being sufficiently informed by their messages upon what grounds, or for what purposes, their lordships desired the house would give leave to such of their members as were named in the said messages to attend the house of lords, in order to be examined upon the second reading of the bill; the commons hoped their lordships would make them acquainted with their intention.

The lords, in answer to this request, gave the commons to understand, that they desired the attendance of the members mentioned in their messages, sages, that they might be examined as witnesses upon the second reading of the bill. This explanation being deemed satisfactory, the members attended the house of lords, where they were carefully and fully examined, as persons conversant in sea affairs, touching the inconveniencies which had formerly attended the sea-service, as well as the remedies now proposed; and the bill having passed through their house, though not without warm opposition, was finally confirmed by the royal sanction.

The militia act, as it passed in the last session, being found upon trial defective, Mr. Townshend moved for leave to bring in a new bill to explain, amend, and enforce it: this was accordingly allowed, prepared, and passed into a law, which still continues in force.

The great number of houses upon London-bridge, and the narrowness of the passage as well over as under it, had frequently been the cause of many accidents, and had always been considered as a public nuisance. Some steps had already been taken, and certain sums of money allotted for removing this inconvenience; but these being deemed by no means sufficient, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, presented a petition to the house of commons, alleging, that the toll upon loaded vessels, and other craft passing through the arches of London-bridge, granted by a former act passed in the year 1750, for improving, widening, and enlarging the passage both under and over the said bridge, was altogether precarious and insufficient to defray the expence, including that of a temporary wooden bridge already erected; and praying that a bill might be prepared for explaining and rendering that act effectual.

A committee was appointed to examine the contents, and a bill brought in according to their request. This, however, was opposed by a petition from several persons, owners of barges and other craft navigating the river Thames, who affirmed, that if the bill should pass into a law as it then stood, it would be extremely injurious to the petitioners in particular, and to the public in general. These were heard by their counsel before the committee, but no report was yet given, when the temporary bridge was reduced to ashes.

Then the mayor, aldermen, and commons of London, delivered another petition, representing, that, in pursuance of the powers vested in them by act of parliament, they had already demolished a good number of the houses on London-bridge, and directed the rest that were standing to be taken down with all convenient expedition, that two of the arches might be laid into one for the improvement of the navigation; that they had, at a very great expence, erected a temporary wooden bridge, to preserve a public passage to and from the city, until the great arch could be finished; which temporary bridge being consumed by fire, they must rebuild it with the greatest expedition, at a farther considerable expence: that the sum necessary for carrying on and completing this great and useful work, including the rebuilding of the said temporary bridge, was estimated at four-score thousand pounds; and as the improving, widening, and enlarging London-bridge, was calculated for the general good of the public, for the advancement of trade and commerce, for making the navigation upon the river Thames more safe and secure; they therefore prayed the house to take the premises into consideration.

This petition being recommended by his majesty to the consideration of the house, was referred to the committee of supply, and produced the resolution of granting fifteen thousand pounds towards the rebuilding of London-bridge. A bill was prepared, under the title of, An act to improve, widen, and enlarge the passage over and through London-bridge, enforcing the payment of the toll imposed upon loaded vessels, which had been found extremely burthensome to trade; but this incumbrance was prevented by another petition of several merchants, tradesmen, and other inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, taking notice of the fifteen thousand pounds granted towards the repair of London-bridge, and, as they were informed, intended to make the said bridge free for all his majesty's subjects: they said, they hoped to partake of this public bounty; but afterwards, hearing that the bill then depending was confined to the tolls formerly granted for repairing the said bridge, they represented the hardships which they and all traders would continue to labour under.

They alleged, that the surveyors and workmen then employed upon this work had discovered the true principles on which the bridge was built: that the foundation of the piers consisted of hard durable stone, well cemented together, and now as strong and firm as when first built: that when the bridge should be finished, great savings would be made in keeping it in repair, from the sums formerly expended, on a mistaken opinion that the foundation was of wood: that there were very considerable estates appointed solely for the repairs of the bridge, which they apprehended would be sufficient to maintain it without any toll; or if they should not be thought adequate to that purpose, they hoped the deficiency would not be made up by a toll upon trade and commerce, but rather by an imposition on coaches, chariots, chaises, and saddle-horses. This remonstrance made such an impression on the house, that several amendments were made to the bill, and an express clause added, that none of the tolls imposed by the act of the twenty-ninth year of his present majesty should be exacted after next Midsummer. Thus altered and amended, it passed through both houses, and obtained the royal assent.

The interest of the manufactures was promoted by an act encouraging the growth of madder, a plant essentially necessary in dying and printing calicoes, which may be raised in England without the least inconvenience. It was found upon enquiry, that the most effectual means to encourage the growth of this commodity would be to ascertain the tythe of it; and a bill was brought in for that purpose. The rate of the tythe was established at five shillings an acre; and it was enacted that this law should continue in force for fourteen years, and to the end of the session of parliament next ensuing after the expiration of that term.

The laws relating to the poor, though equally numerous and oppressive to the subject, having been found defective, a new clause relating to the settlement of servants and apprentices, was now added to an act passed in the twentieth year of the present present reign, intituled, An act for the better adjusting and more easy recovery of the wages of certain servants and of certain apprentices.

No country in the world can boast such a number of laws made in behalf of the poor, as those that are daily enacted in England: in no other country is there so much money raised for their support, by private charity as well as by public taxation; yet this, as much as any country, swarms with vagrant beggars, and teems with objects of misery and distress; a sure sign either of the insufficiency of the laws, or the most shameful neglect in the execution of them.

Such scenes of corruption, perjury, riot, and intemperance, had lately been acted at all the elections for members of parliament, that it was found absolutely necessary to provide some remedy for this growing evil. Accordingly, sir John Philips, a gentleman of Wales, who had long distinguished himself by his free and independent spirit, moved for leave to bring in a bill that should obviate any doubts which might arise concerning the electors of knights of the shire to serve in parliament for England, and further regulate the proceedings of such elections. He was permitted to bring in such a bill, in conjunction with Mr. Townshend, Mr. Cornwall, the lords North and Carysfort: and in the usual course the bill being prepared, was enacted into a law under the title of "An act for further explaining the laws touching the electors of knights of the shire to serve in parliament for that part of Great Britain called England."

The preamble declared, That though, by an act passed in the eighteenth year of the present reign, it was provided, that no person might vote at the election of a knight or knights of a shire, within England and Wales, without having a freehold estate in the county for which he votes, of the clear yearly value of forty shillings, over and above all rents and charges, payable out of or in respect to the same; nevertheless, certain persons who hold their estates by copy or court-roll, pretend to a right of voting, and have at certain times presumed to vote at the election of any knight or knights of a shire within England or Wales; but every such vote should be void, and the person so voting should forfeit fifty pounds to any candidate for whom such vote should not have been given, and who should first sue for the same, to be recovered with full costs, by action of debt, in any court of judicature. For the more easy recovery of this forfeit, it was enacted, That the plaintiff in such action might only set forth in the declaration or bill, that the defendant was indebted to him in the sum of fifty pounds, alledging the offence for which the suit should be brought, and that the defendant had acted contrary to this act, without mentioning the writ of summons to parliament, or the return thereof; and upon trial of any issue, the plaintiff should not be obliged to prove the writ of summons to parliament, or the return thereof, or any warrant or authority to the sheriff upon any such writ: that every such action should be commenced within nine months after the fact committed; and that if the plaintiff should discontinue his action, or be nonsuited, or have judgment given against him, the defendant should recover treble costs.

So far the act, thus procured, may be attended with salutary consequences; but, in all probability, the intention of its first movers and patrons was not fully answered, inasmuch as no provision was made for putting a stop to that spirit of licence, drunkennels, and debauchery, which prevails at almost every election, and throws the whole nation, at the commencement of a parliament, into a state of the most brutal intoxication.

The proprietors of the privateer called the Antigallican, which had taken a rich French ship homeward-bound from China, and carried her into Cadiz, where the Spanish government had wrested her by violence from the captors, and restored her to the French owners, now presented a petition to the house of commons, complaining of this interposition as an act of partiality and injustice; representing the great expence at which the privateer had been fitted out, the legality of the capture, the loss and hardships which they the petitioners had suffered, and imploring such relief as to the house seem reasonable.

Though these allegations were supported by a number of concurrent evidences, and it might be thought incumbent on the parliament to vindicate the honour of the nation, when thus insulted by a foreign power, the house, upon this occasion, paid little or no regard to the petition, either disbelieving the assertions it contained, or unwilling to take any step which might at this juncture embroil the nation with the court of Spain on such a frivolous subject. True it is, the Spaniards alleged, as an excuse for their own conduct, that the prize was taken under the guns of Corunna, inasmuch that the shot fired by the privateer entered that place, and damaged some houses; but this circumstance was never sufficiently proved, and the prize was certainly condemned as legal by the court of admiralty at Gibraltar.

The African trade being justly considered as a matter of great importance to the nation, an annual sum had for some years been granted for the support of the settlements in that part of the world, and for the maintenance and repairs of castles and factories. While a committee was employed in perusing the accounts relating to the sum granted in the preceding session for this purpose, a petition from the African company, recommended in a message from his majesty, was presented to the house, soliciting farther assistance for the ensuing year.

In opposition to this petition, a remonstrance was offered by certain planters and merchants interested in and trading to the British sugar colonies in America, alleging, that the price of negroes was greatly advanced since the forts and settlements on the coast of Africa had been under the direction of the committee of the company of merchants trading to that coast; a circumstance that greatly distressed and alarmed the petitioners, prevented the cultivation of the British colonies, and was of great detriment to the trade and navigation of the kingdom: that this misfortune, they believed, was in some measure owing to the ruinous state and condition of the forts and settlements: that, in their opinion, the most effectual method for maintaining the interest of that trade on a respectable footing, next to that of an incorporated joint-stock company, would be the putting those forts and settlements under the sole direction of the comcommissioners for trade and plantations: that the preservation or ruin of the American sugar colonies went hand in hand with that of the slave-trade to Africa; and that, by an act passed in the year 1750, for extending and improving this trade, the British subjects were debarred from lodging their slaves and merchandize in the forts and settlements on the coast.

They therefore prayed that this part of the act might be repealed: that all commanders of British and American vessels, free merchants, and all other of his majesty's subjects who were settled, or might at any time thereafter settle in Africa, should have free liberty, from sun-rise to sun-set, to enter the forts and settlements, and to deposit their goods and merchandize in the warehouses thereunto belonging; to secure their slaves or other purchases, without paying any consideration for the same; but the slaves to be victualled at the proper cost and charges of their respective owners. The house having taken this petition into consideration, enquired into the proceedings of the company, and revised the act for extending and improving the trade to Africa, resolved, That the committee of the African company had faithfully discharged the trust reposed in them; and granted ten thousand pounds for maintaining the British forts and settlements in that part of the world.

Some attempts were made in the course of this session to revive the act for triennial parliaments; but as this measure had been found, by former experience, to be attended with more bad than good consequences, it was rejected, on a division, by a considerable majority.

Several committees were likewise appointed to enquire into the expence incurred by new lines and fortifications raised at Gibraltar; to examine the original standards of weights and measures used in England, consider the laws relating to them, and report their observations, together with their opinion of the most effectual means for ascertaining and enforcing uniform standards, to be used for the future. The commons were perfectly satisfied with the new works which had been raised at Gibraltar; and with respect to the weights and measures, the committee agreed to certain resolutions; but no further progress was made in this enquiry except an order for printing these resolutions, with the appendix: however, as the boxes containing the standards were ordered to be locked up by the clerk of the house, it seemed as if they had some intention to resume the subject in the ensuing session.

On the ninth day of June several bills received the royal assent by commission, his majesty being indisposed; and on the twentieth day of the same month the lords commissioners closed the session with a speech to both houses, expressing his majesty's deep sense of their loyalty and good affection demonstrated in their late proceedings; in their zeal for his honour and real interest in all parts; in their earnestness to surmount every difficulty; and their ardour to maintain the war with the utmost vigour: circumstances which must convince mankind, that the ancient spirit of the British nation still subsisted in its full force. They were given to understand, that the king had taken all such measures as appeared the most conducive to the accomplishment of their public-spirited views and wishes: that, with their assistance, crowned by the blessing of God upon the conduct and bravery of the combined army, his majesty had been enabled not only to deliver his dominions in Germany from the oppressions and devastations of the French, but also to push his advantages on this side the Rhine: that he had cemented the union between him and his good brother the king of Prussia, by new engagements: that the British fleets and armies were now actually employed in such expeditions as appeared likely to annoy the enemy in the most sensible manner, to promote the welfare and prosperity of these kingdoms; in particular, to preserve the British rights and possessions in America, and to make France feel in those parts the real strength and importance of Great Britain. The commons were thanked for the ample supplies which they had so freely and unanimously given; and assured on the part of his majesty, that they should be managed with the most frugal œconomy. They were desired, in consequence of the king's earnest recommendation, to promote harmony and good agreement amongst his faithful subjects; to make the people acquainted with the rectitude and purity of his intentions and measures; and to exert themselves in maintaining the peace and good order of the country, by enforcing obedience to the laws and lawful authority.

The king, it must be owned, had great reason to be satisfied with the conduct of his ministers, and the spirit of his people. The whole nation reposed the most unlimited confidence in the courage and discretion, as well as in the integrity of the minister, who seemed bent upon prosecuting the war with such vigour and activity as might soon bring the enemy to reasonable terms. New levies were made, new ships equipped, fresh expeditions planned, and fresh conquests projected. Such was the credit of the administration, that people subscribed to the government loans with surprising alacrity. An uncommon spirit of courage and intrepidity seemed to animate all the individuals that composed the army and navy; and the passion for military fame diffused itself through all ranks in the civil department of life, even to the very lowest of the populace. Such a remarkable change from indolence to activity, from indifference to zeal, from timorous caution to undaunted resolution, was effected by the influence and example of an intelligent and intrepid minister, who, chagrined at the losses and disgraces of the preceding campaign, had on a very solemn occasion lately declared his belief, that there was a fixed resolution, both in the naval and military commanders, against any vigorous exertion of the national power in the service of their country.

He affirmed, that though his majesty appeared ready to embrace every measure proposed by his ministers for the honour and interest of his British dominions, yet scarce a man could be found with whom the execution of any one plan, in which there was the least appearance of danger, could with confidence be trusted. He mentioned in particular, the inactivity of one general in North America, from whose abilities and personal bravery the nation had conceived the greatest expectations. He complained, that this commander had expressed the most contemptuous disregard for the civil power, from which he derived his authority, by neglecting neglecting to transmit, for a considerable length of time, any other advice of his proceedings but what appeared on a written scrap of paper. He observed, that, with a force by land and sea greater than ever the nation had heretofore maintained; with a king and ministry ardently desirous of redeeming her glory, succouring her allies, and promoting her true interest; a shameful dislike to service every where prevailed; and few seemed affected with any other zeal than that of aspiring to the highest posts, and grasping the largest salaries.

The censure pointed at the commander in America seems, in a great measure, to have been founded on mistake: the inactivity of that able general was principally, if not entirely, owing to the spirit of discord and dissension that prevailed among the English provinces in America; and which, while it continued to subsist in its full force, effectually prevented the accomplishment of any enterprise of importance.

Having thus brought the history of this session of parliament to a conclusion, I shall now, agreeable to the method I have hitherto pursued, open the military transactions of this year with recording the progress of the war in Germany; observing, first, however, that the beginning of the year was a little clouded by a general concern for the death of his majesty's third daughter, the princess Caroline, a lady of the most exemplary virtue and amiable endowments, who died at the age of forty-five, sincerely regretted as a pattern of unaffected piety and unbounded benevolence.

When the Russian general, Apraxin, retreated from Pomerania, marshal Lewald, who commanded the Prussians in that country, was left at liberty to turn his arms against the Swedes; and he accordingly drove them before him almost without opposition. By the beginning of January they were entirely expelled from the Prussian Pomerania, and Lewald, in his turn, invaded their dominions. He in a little time subdued all the Swedish Pomerania, except Stralsund and the isle of Rugen, and possessed himself of several magazines which the enemy had established.

The Austrian army, after their defeat at Breslau, had retired into Bohemia, where they were cantoned, the head quarters being fixed at Koningsgratz. The king of Prussia having recovered all his part of Silesia, except the town of Schweidnitz, which he straitened with a blockade, sent detachments from his army cantoned in the neighbourhood of Breslau, to invade the Austrian or southern part of that province, where they reduced Troppau and Jaggorsdorf; while he himself remained at Breslau, entertaining his officers with concerts of music: not that he suffered these amusements to divert his attention from more important objects. He laid Swedish Pomerania under contribution, and made a fresh demand of five hundred thousand crowns from the electorate of Saxony. Having received information that the duke of Mecklenbourg was employed in providing magazines for the French army, he detached a body of troops into that country, who not only took possession of the magazines, but levied considerable contributions; and the duke retired to Lubeck, accompanied by the French minister.

In order to give the reader a more distinct idea of the transactions of this campaign in Germany, it may not be improper to acquaint him, that the forces brought into the field by the empress-queen of Hungary, the states of the empire, the czarina, and the kings of France and Sweden, fell very little short of three hundred thousand men; whereas the armies maintained by the kings of Great Britain and Prussia, the only powers that acted on the other side, did not amount to above two hundred and twenty thousand. The consequence of this inequality was, that the confederates of the former party gained many advantages over those of the opposite side, by invading, and even conquering their dominions, particularly Hanover, the government of which was now entirely changed.

In the month of December of the preceding year, a farmer of the revenues from Paris arrived at Hanover, where he established his office, in order to act by virtue of powers from one John Faigy, to whom the French king had granted the direction, receipt, and administration of all the duties and revenues of the electorate. This director was, by a decree of the council of state, empowered to receive the revenues not only of Hanover, but also of all other countries that should be subjected to his most Christian majesty in the course of the campaign; and to remove the receivers who had been employed in any part of the direction, receipt, and administration of the duties and revenues of Hanover, and appoint others in their room.

The French king, by the same decree, ordained, that all persons who had been intrusted under the preceding government with titles, papers, accounts, registers, or estimates, relating to the administration of revenues, should communicate them to John Faigy or his attornies; that the magistrates of the towns, districts, and commonalties, as well as those who directed the administration of particular states and provinces, should deliver to the said John Faigy, or his attornies, the produce of six years of the duties and revenues belonging to the said towns, districts, and provinces, reckoning from the first of January in the year 1751, together with an authentic account of the sums they had paid during that term to the preceding sovereign, and of the charges necessarily incurred.

It appears from the contents of this decree, which was dated on the eighteenth day of October, that immediately after the conventions of Closter Seven and Bremeworden*, the court of Versailles had determined to change the government and system of the electorate, contrary to an express article of the capitulation granted to the city of Hanover, when it surrendered on the ninth day of August; and that the crown of France intended to take advantage of the cessation of arms, in seizing places and provinces which were not yet subdued; for, by

* Six days after the convention was signed at Closter Seven, another act of accommodation was concluded at Bremeworden, between the generals Sporcken and Villemur, relating to the

the decree above-mentioned, the administration of John Faigy extended to the countries which might hereafter be conquered. With what regard to justice, then, could the French government charge the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover, with the infraction of articles? or what respect to good faith and humanity did the duke de Richelieu observe, in the order issued from Zell, towards the end of the year, importing, that as the treaty made with the country of Hanover had been rendered void by the violation of the articles signed at Closter Seven, all the effects belonging to the officers, or others employed in the Hanoverian army, should be confiscated for the use of his most Christian majesty?

The landgrave of Hesse Cassel, being desirous of securing his dominions against the like calamities, not only promised to renounce all connection with the kings of Great Britain and Prussia, but even solicited the court of France to receive him into the number of its dependants; for, on the eighteenth day of October, the minister of the duc de Deuxponts delivered at Versailles, in the name of the landgrave, the plan of a treaty, to be founded on the following conditions: That the landgrave should enter into no engagement against the French king and his allies, nor give any assistance, directly or indirectly, to the enemies of his majesty and the other confederates: that he should never give his vote, in the general or particular assemblies of the empire, against his majesty's interest; but, on the contrary, employ his influence, jointly with France, to quiet the troubles of the empire; and that, for this end, his troops which had served in the Hanoverian army should engage in the service of France, on condition that they should not act in the present war against his Britannic majesty: that, immediately after the ratification of the treaty, his most Christian majesty should restore the dominions of the landgrave in the same condition they were in when subdued by the French forces: that these dominions should be exempted from all further contributions, either in money, corn, forage, wood, or cattle, though already imposed on the subjects of Hesse; and the French troops pay for all the provision with which they might be supplied; in which case the landgrave should exact no toll for warlike stores, provisions, or other articles of that nature which might pass through his dominions: that the king of France should guaranty all his estates, all the rights of the house of Hesse Cassel, particularly the act of assurance, signed by his son the hereditary prince, with regard to religion; use his interest with the emperor and the empress-queen, that, in consideration of the immense losses and damages his most serene highness had suffered since the French invaded his country, and of the great sums he should lose with England in arrears and subsidies by this accommodation, he might be excused from furnishing his contingent to the army of the empire, as well as from paying the Roman months granted by the diet of the empire; and if, in resentment of this convention, the estates of his serene highness should be attacked, his most Christian majesty should afford the most speedy and effectual succours.

This treaty, it must be confessed, exhibits but a very indifferent specimen of the fidelity of a German ally. The landgrave of Hesse Cassel had been retained as a subsidiary of England, even in time of peace, when his friendship could not avail, nor his enmity prejudice, the interests of Great Britain: but he had been retained in that season of tranquillity as a friend, on whose services the most implicit dependence might be placed in any future storm or commotion. How little he merited this confidence and favour appeared too plainly by his present conduct, when the cause of Hanover seemed to be on the decline; and his own dominions having suffered so much by the fate of war, he not only discovered an inclination to abandon his benefactor and ally, but even sued to be enlisted into the service of his adversary. This intended defection was, however, prevented by a sudden turn of fortune which he could not possibly foresee; and his troops continued to act in conjunction with the Hanoverians.

Nor was the landgrave of Hesse Cassel the only prince that acted this ungrateful and disingenuous part towards the king of Great Britain. The duke of Brunswic, still more nearly connected with that monarch, used such uncommon expedition in detaching himself from the sinking fortune of Hanover, that, in ten days after the convention of Closter Seven, he concluded a treaty with the courts of Vienna and Versailles; so that, in all probability, the negotiation must have been begun before that convention took place. On the twentieth day of September his minister at Vienna, by virtue of full powers from the duke of Brunswic, accepted and signed the conditions which the French king and his Austrian ally thought proper to prescribe.

These imported, That his most Christian majesty should keep possession of the cities of Brunswic and Wolfenbuttle during the war, and make use of the artillery, arms, and military stores deposited in their arsenals: that the duke's forces, on their return from the camp of the duke of Cumberland, should be disbanded and disarmed; and take an oath that they should not, during the present war, serve against the king or his allies: that the duke should be permitted to maintain a battalion of foot, and two squadrons of horse, for the guard of his person and castles; but the regulations made by the mareschal Richelieu and the intendant of his army should subsist on their present footing: that the duke should furnish his contingent in money and troops, agreeably to the laws of the empire: that his forces should immediately join those which the Germanic body had assembled; and that he should order his minister at Ratisbon to vote conformably to the resolutions of the dyet, approved and confirmed by the emperor.

In return for all these concessions the duke was restored to the favour of the French king, who graciously promised that neither his revenues nor his treasure should be touched, nor the administration of justice invaded; and that nothing further should be demanded but winter-quarters for the regiments which should pass that season in the country of Brunswic.

How faithfully soever the duke might have intended to perform the articles of this treaty, his intentions were defeated by his brother prince Ferdinand, who, being invested with the command of the Hanoverian army, and ordered to resume the operations of war against the enemy, detained the troops troops of Brunswic, as well as his nephew the hereditary prince, notwithstanding the treaty which his brother had signed, and the injunctions which he had laid upon his son to retire from the army, and make a tour to Holland. The duke either was, or affected to be, so offended at this step in his brother, that he wrote him with his own hand the following letter :

“ S I R,

“ I know you too well to doubt that the situation in which we stand at present, with respect to each other, gives you abundance of uneasiness: nor will you doubt that it gives me equal concern: indeed it afflicts me greatly. Mean while, I could never, my dearest brother, have believed that you would be the person who should carry away from me my eldest son. I am exceedingly mortified to find myself under the hard necessity of telling you, that this step is contrary to the law of nations and the constitutions of the empire; and that, if you persist in it, you will disgrace your country, which you pretend to serve.

“ The hereditary prince, my son, was at Ham-burgh by my order, and you have carried him to Stade. Could he distrust an uncle? an uncle who hath done so much honour to his family? Could he believe that this uncle would deprive him of liberty, a liberty never refused to the lowest officer? I ordered him to make a tour to Holland:
could not the lowest officer have done as much?
Let us suppose, for a moment, that my troops, among whom he served, were to have stayed with the Hanoverians; would it not still have been in my power to give an officer leave of absence, or even leave to resign his commission? and would you hinder your brother, the head of your family, and of such a family as ours, to exercise this right with regard to a son, who is the hereditary prince, of whose rights and prerogatives you cannot be ignorant? It is impossible you could have conceived such designs, without the suggestion of others. Those who did suggest them have trampled on the rights of nature, of nations, and of the princes of Germany: they have induced you to add to all these the most cruel insults on a brother whom you love, and who always loved you with the warmest affection.

“ Would you have your brother lay his just complaints against you before the whole empire, and all Europe? Are not your proceedings without example? What is Germany become? What are its princes become, and our house in particular? Is it the interest of the two kings, the cause of your country, and my cause, that you pretend to support? I repeat it, brother, that this design could never have been framed by you. I again command my son to pursue his journey; and I cannot conceive you will give the least obstruction: if you should (which I pray God avert) I solemnly declare that I will not be constrained by such measures, nor shall I ever forget what I owe to myself.

“ As to my troops, you may see what I have written on that head to the Hanoverian ministry.
The duke of Cumberland, by the convention of Closter Seven, dismissed them, and sent them home: the said ministry gave me notice of this convention, as a treaty by which I was bound.

The march of the troops was settled; and an incident happening, they halted: that obstacle being removed, they were to have continued their march.
The court of Hanover will be no longer bound by the convention; while I not only accepted their word, but have also, in conformity with their instructions, negociated at Versailles and at Vienna.
After all these steps, they would have me contradict myself, break my word, and entirely ruin my estate, as well as my honour. Did you ever know your brother guilty of such things?

“ True it is, I have, as you say, sacrificed my all; or rather, I have been sacrificed. The only thing left me is my honour; and, in the unhappy contrast of our situations, I lament both you and myself, that it should be from you, my dear brother, I should receive the cruel advice to give up my honour. I cannot listen to it: I cannot recede from my promise. My troops therefore must return home, agreeably to what the duke of Cumberland and the Hanoverian ministry stipulated with regard to me in the strongest manner. I am afraid that the true circumstances of things are concealed from you. Not to detain your express too long, I shall send you, by the post, copies of all I have written to the Hanoverian ministry. It will grieve your honest heart to read it. I am, with an heart almost broken, yet full of tenderness for you, your, &c.”

Notwithstanding this warm remonstrance, prince Ferdinand detained the troops and the hereditary prince, who being fond of the service, in a little time distinguished himself by very extraordinary acts of bravery and conduct; and means were found to reconcile his father to measures that were more contrary to his engagements than his inclinations.”

The defeat of the French army at Rosbach, and the retreat of the Russians from Pomerania, had entirely altered the face of affairs in Germany. The French king was soon obliged to abandon his conquests on that side of the Rhine, and his threats founded no longer terrible in the ears of the Hanoverian and Prussian allies. As little formidable were the denunciations of the emperor, who had, by a decree of the Aulic council, communicated to the dyet certain mandates, issued in the month of August in the preceding year, on pain of the ban of the empire, with avocatory letters annexed, against the king of Great Britain, elector of Hanover, and the other princes acting in concert with the king of Prussia.

The French court published likewise a scurrilous memorial, after the convention of Closter Seven had been violated and set aside, drawing an in-vidious comparison between the conduct of the French king and the proceedings of his Britannic majesty; in which the latter is charged with breach of faith, and almost every meanness that could stain the character of a monarch. In answer to the emperor's decree, and this virulent charge, baron Gim-mengen, the electoral minister of Brunswic Lunenbourg, presented to the dyet, in November, a long memorial, recapitulating the important services his sovereign had performed to the house of Austria, and the ungrateful returns he had reaped, in the queen's refusing to assist him when his dominions were threatened with an invasion. He enumerated

merated many instances in which she had countenanced, encouraged, and even joined the enemies of the electorate, in violation of her former engagements, and directly contrary to the constitution of the empire. He refuted, to the satisfaction of the whole world, every article of the charge which the French court had brought against him in their virulent libel, retorted the imputations of perfidy and ambition, and, with respect to France, justified every particular of his own conduct.

While the French and Hanoverian forces continued in their winter-quarters, the former at Zell, and the latter at Lunenbourg, divers petty encounters happened between the detached parties of the two armies. The Hanoverian general, Juncheim, having taken post at Halberstadt and Quedlimburg, from whence he made excursions even to the gates of Brunswic, and kept the French army in continual alarm, he was attacked by a large body of the enemy, who compelled him to retire to Ackersleben, committed great outrages in the town of Halberstadt and its neighbourhood, and carried off hostages for the payment of contributions.

General Hardenberg, another Hanoverian officer, having dislodged the French detachments that occupied Burgh, Vogelsack, and Ritterhude, and cleared the whole territory of Bremen, in the month of January the duke of Broglie collected a considerable corps of troops that were cantoned at Ottersburg, Rothenburg, and the adjacent country; and advancing to Bremen, demanded admittance, threatening that, in case of a refusal, he would proceed to extremities, and punish the inhabitants severely, should they make the least resistance. When their deputies waited upon him to desire a short time for deliberation, he answered, "Not a moment; the duke de Richelieu's orders are peremptory, and admit of no delay."

He accordingly ordered the cannon to be brought up, the wall was scaled, and the gates would have been forced open, had not the magistrates, at the earnest importunity of the people, resolved to comply with his demand. A second deputation was immediately dispatched to the duke of Broglie, signifying their submission; and the gates being opened, he marched into the city at midnight, after having promised, upon his honour, that no attempt should be made to the prejudice of its rights and prerogatives, nor any outrage offered to the privileges of the regency, to the liberty, religion, or commerce of the inhabitants.

This conquest, however, was of short duration. Prince Ferdinand being joined by a body of Prussian horse, under the command of prince George of Holstein Gottorp, the whole army began its march, and advanced to the country of Bremen about the middle of February. The enemy were driven from Rottenburg, Ottersburg, and Verden; and they abandoned the city of Bremen at the approach of the Hanoverian general, who entered it without opposition.

By this time the court of Versailles, being dissatisfied with the conduct of the duke de Richelieu, had recalled that general from Germany, and bestowed the command of the army upon the count de Clermont, to the general satisfaction of the army, as well as to the joy of the Hanoverian subjects, among whom Richelieu had committed many flagrant acts of cruelty and oppression. The new commander found his master's forces reduced to a deplorable condition, by the accidents of war, the relaxation of discipline, the severity of the weather, and the want of almost every necessary. As he could not pretend with such a ruined army to oppose the designs of prince Ferdinand in the field, or even preserve the ground which his predecessor had gained, he found himself under the necessity of retiring with all possible expedition towards the Rhine. As the allies advanced, his troops retreated from their different quarters with such precipitation as to leave behind them all their sick, together with a great part of their baggage and artillery, besides a great number of officers and soldiers that fell into the hands of those parties by whom they were pursued.

The inhabitants of Hanover, hearing that the French intended to evacuate their city, were filled with apprehensions of being subjected to every species of violence and abuse: but their fears were happily disappointed, by the honour and integrity of the duke de Randan, the French governor, who not only took effectual measures for restraining the soldiers within the bounds of the most rigid discipline, but likewise exhibited a noble proof of generosity and moderation. Instead of destroying his magazine of provisions, according to the usual practice of war, he ordered the whole to be either sold at a low price, or distributed among the poor of the city, who had been long exposed to the horrors of famine: an act of godlike humanity, which ought to dignify the character of that worthy nobleman above all the titles that military fame can deserve, or arbitrary monarchs bestow.

The two grand divisions of the French army, quartered at Zell and Hanover, retired in good order to Hamelen, where they assembled all their forces, except those that were left in Hoya, and about four thousand men placed in garrison at Minden, to intercept the progress of the combined army. Towards the latter end of February, prince Ferdinand of Brunswic having received intelligence that the count de Chabot was posted with a considerable body of troops at Hoya upon the Weser, detached the hereditary prince of Brunswic with four battalions, and some light troops and dragoons, to oblige him to retire from that neighbourhood. This enterprize was executed with equal spirit and success. The hereditary prince crossed the Weser at Bremen with part of his detachment, while the rest advanced on this side of the river; and the enemy, being attacked in front and rear, were in a little time forced and thrown into confusion.

The bridge being abandoned, and near seven hundred men taken prisoners, the count de Chabot threw himself with two battalions into the castle, where he resolved to defend himself in hope of being supported. The regiment of Bretagne and some detachments of dragoons were actually on the march to his assistance. The hereditary prince being informed of this circumstance, being also destitute of heavy artillery to besiege the place in form, and apprehending at the same time that he should not be able to maintain the post after it might be taken, thought proper to listen to the terms of capitulation proposed by the French general, whose garrison was suffered to march out with the honours of war; but their cannon, stores, and merated many instances in which she had countenanced, encouraged, and even joined the enemies of the electorate, in violation of her former engagements, and directly contrary to the constitution of the empire. and ammunition, were delivered to the victor. This was the first exploit of the hereditary prince, who distinguished himself on many subsequent occasions by the most signal acts of valour and activity. He had no sooner subdued Hoya than he advanced to the attack of Minden, which he invested on the fifth of March, and on the fourteenth the garrison surrendered themselves prisoners of war.

After the reduction of this city, the allied army proceeded towards Hamelen, where the French general had established his head quarters: but these he abandoned at the approach of the allies; and leaving behind him all his sick and wounded, with part of his magazines, retreated without halting to Paderborn, and from thence to the Rhine, recalling in his march the troops that were in Embden, Cassel, and the landgraviate of Hesse, all which places were now evacuated. The French were terribly annoyed in their march by the Prussian hussars and a body of light horse, distinguished by the name of Hanoverian hunters, who took a great number of prisoners, together with many baggage-waggons, and some artillery. Such was the precipitation of the enemy's retreat, that they could not find time to destroy all their magazines of provision and forage, and even forgot to call in the garrison of Vechte, a small fortress in the neighbourhood of Diepholt, who were made prisoners of war; and here was found a complete train of battering cannon and mortars.

The count de Clermont having arrived on the banks of the Rhine, distributed his forces into quarters of refreshment in Wesel and the adjoining country, while prince Ferdinand quartered the allied army in the bishopric of Munster. Here however he did not long remain inactive. In the latter end of May he detached colonel Scheither across the Rhine with a small detachment, which attacked and defeated three battalions of the enemy, and took five pieces of cannon. In the beginning of June the whole army passed the Rhine on a bridge built for the purpose, defeated a body of French cavalry, and obtained several other advantages in their march towards Wesel. Keiserworth was surprised, the greater part of the garrison either taken or killed; and prince Ferdinand began to make preparations for the siege of Dusseldorp. In the mean time the count de Clermont, being unable to stop the rapidity of his progress, was obliged to secure his troops with strong entrenchments until he should be properly reinforced.

The court of Versailles was equally mortified and confounded at this sudden turn of their affairs in Germany. Their ministers had been long the sport of female caprice: it was their power of pleasing a mistress, who governed their king, that alone enabled them to obtain posts under the government. Some of the most able men were turned out of their employments with disgrace; others retired from the public service with indignation; and a certain low character had, for a long time, appeared in all the proceedings of the French, both in the field and the cabinet.

Even in their domestic disputes, where something of a free and manly spirit appeared, this spirit evaporated, and spent itself upon unworthy and despicable objects. These contests, which involved the church, the law, and the crown, weakened the whole nation; and the state felt all the ill effects of a disunion of its orders, without seeing an augmentation of power thrown into the scale of any.

But now, taught by their misfortunes and disgraces, they were obliged to adopt an alteration in their conduct: they were forced to call men to the public service upon public principles; at a time, indeed, when in many respects things could only be altered, not mended; and when wise and able ministers could do little more by their penetration and public spirit than to see and lament the ruin caused by the want of those virtues in their predecessors.

The duke de Belleisle, known to all Europe for his great abilities and his great exploits, was at length placed at the head of the military department, as secretary at war. On this occasion he delivered himself in the presence of his sovereign in council, with a spirit of patriotism that does honour to his name.

"I know, said he, the state of our armies. It gives me great grief, and no less indignation: for, besides the real evil of the disorder in itself, the disgrace and infamy which it reflects on our government and on the whole nation is more to be apprehended. The choice of officers ought to be made with mature deliberation. I know but too well to what length the want of discipline, pillaging and robbing have been carried on by the officers and common men, after the example set them by their generals.

"It mortifies me to think I am a Frenchman: my principles are known to be very different from those which are now followed. I had the satisfaction to retain the esteem, the friendship, and regard of all the princes, noblemen, and even of all the common people, in all parts of Germany, where I commanded the king's forces. They lived there in the midst of abundance: every one was pleased: it fills my soul with anguish to find, that at present the French are held in execration; that every body is dispirited; and that many officers publicly say things that are criminal and highly punishable.

"The evil is so great that it demands immediate redress. I can easily judge, by what passes in my own breast, of what our generals feel from the speeches they must daily hear in Germany, concerning our conduct: which indeed would lose much to be compared with that of our allies. I must particularly complain of the delays and irregularity of the posts; a service for which there has not yet been made any sufficient provision. I am likewise displeased with the negligence of our generals in returning answers, which is a manifest breach of their duty.

"Had I commanded the army, a thousand things which are done would not have been done; and others which have been neglected would have been executed. I would have multiplied my communications; I would have had strong posts on the right, on the left, and in the center, lined with troops. I would have had magazines in every place. The quiet and satisfaction of the country people should have been equal to their present dissatisfaction at being harassed and plundered; and we should have been as much beloved as we are at present abhorred. The consequences are too apparent to need being mentioned. I must insist on these things, because late redress is better than the continuation of the evil."

This

This spirited harangue was followed by no less spirited resolutions. A large body of troops was assembled at Hanau, under the direction of the prince of Soubise, who, it was said, had orders to penetrate by the way of Donawert, Ingoldstadt, and Arneberg, into Bohemia. The army on the Rhine was likewise augmented; troops were every-where drawn from the interior parts of the kingdom, towards the seat of action; and the fortifications on the frontiers were put into the best posture of defence that the disordered state of the finances could possibly admit.

At the same time the duke de Belleisle wrote a letter, directed to all the colonels of infantry, threatening them, in the king's name, with the loss of their regiments, should they connive any longer at the scandalous practice of buying commissions; an abuse which had crept into the service under various pretexts, to the discouragement of merit, the relaxation of discipline, and the total extinction of laudable emulation.

The prince of Clermont having abandoned his strong camp at Rhinefeldt, retired to Nuys a little higher up the river, and detached a considerable corps, under the command of the count de St. Germain, to take post at Crevelt, situated in a plain between his army and the camp of the allies, which fronted the town of Meurs. After several motions on both sides, prince Ferdinand determined to attack the enemy, and forthwith made a disposition for this purpose.

He assigned the command of the whole left wing, consisting of eighteen battalions and twenty-eight squadrons, to lieutenant-general Sporcken; the conduct of the right wing, composed of sixteen battalions and fourteen squadrons, was intrusted to the hereditary prince and major-general Wangenheim; the squadrons, with the addition of two regiments of Prussian dragoons, were under the immediate direction of the prince of Holstein; while the hereditary prince commanded the infantry. The light troops, consisting of five squadrons of hussars, were divided between the prince of Holstein and lieutenant-general Sporcken. Major Luckner's squadron, together with Scheither's corps, were ordered to observe the flank of the enemy's right, and with this view were posted in the village of Papendeick; and a battalion of the troops of Wolfenbuttle were left in the town of Hülste, to cover the rear of the army. Prince Ferdinand's design was to attack the enemy on their left flank; but the execution was rendered extremely difficult by the woods and ditches that encumbered the road, and the numerous ditches that intersected this part of the country.

On the twenty-third day of June, at four in the morning, the army began to move; the right advancing in two columns as far as St. Anthony, and the left marching up within half a league of Crevelt. The prince having surveyed the situation of the enemy from the steeple of St. Anthony, procured guides; and having obtained all the necessary hints of intelligence, proceeded to the right, in order to charge the enemy's left flank by the villages of Worst and Anrath; but, in order to distract their attention, and keep them in suspense with regard to the nature of his principal attack, he directed the generals Sporcken and Oberg to advance against them by the way of Crevelt and

St. Anthony; and in particular to ply with vigour their artillery; that being employed in three different places at once, they might be prevented from sending any reinforcement to the left, where the chief attack was intended.

This disposition being made, prince Ferdinand putting himself at the head of the grenadiers of the right wing, prosecuted his march in two columns to the village of Anrath, where he fell in with an advanced party of the French, which, after a few discharges of musquetry, retired to their camp and gave the alarm. In the mean time, both armies were drawn up in order of battle; the troops of the allies in the plain between the villages of Anrath and Willich, opposite to the French forces, whose left was secured by a wood. The action began about one in the afternoon with a severe cannonading on the part of prince Ferdinand, which, though well served, was not able to draw the enemy from their cover: he therefore determined to dislodge them from the wood by dint of small arms. The hereditary prince immediately advanced with the whole front, and a very obstinate action ensued.

Mean while, the cavalry on the right in vain endeavoured to penetrate the wood on the other side, where the enemy had raised two batteries, which were supported by forty squadrons of horse. After a terrible fire had continued on both sides till five in the afternoon, the grenadiers forced the intrenchments in the wood, which were lined by the French infantry. These giving way, abandoned the wood in the utmost disorder; but the pursuit was checked by the conduct and resolution of the enemy's cavalry, which, notwithstanding a dreadful fire from the artillery of the allies, maintained their ground, and covered the foot in their retreat to Nuys.

The success of the day was in a good measure owing to the artillery on the left and in the centre, under the direction of the generals Sporcken and Oberg, who plied the enemy with great vigour, and effectually employed their attention on that side, while prince Ferdinand prosecuted his attack on the other. It must be owned, however, that their right wing and centre retired in good order to Nuys, though the left was defeated with the loss of several standards, colours, and pieces of cannon, and six thousand men, killed, wounded, or taken prisoners.

This victory, however important, was far from being decisive. True it is, the enemy were obliged to take refuge under the cannon of Cologne, and tamely to behold the reduction of Dusseldorp, which was subdued by prince Ferdinand after a siege of a few days: nevertheless, they were soon joined by such a number of fresh troops as not only enabled them to make head against the allies, but even to send a considerable detachment to the assistance of Soubise.

It was at this period that the command of the French army was taken from the count de Clermont, and bestowed upon M. de Contades, who seemed determined to attack prince Ferdinand in his turn, and even made some motions for that purpose. This scheme, however, he was prevented from carrying into execution, by the little river Erff, behind which the prince resolved to lie quiet until he should be joined by the body of British troops troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough, the first division of which had just landed at Embden. He flattered himself that the prince of Ysenbourg, at the head of the Hessian troops, would find employment for the prince de Soubise, who had marched from Hanau with a design to penetrate into the landgraviate of Hesse-Cassel: his vanguard had been already surprised and defeated by the militia of the country; and the prince of Ysenbourg was at the head of a considerable body of regular forces, assembled to oppose his further progress.

Prince Ferdinand therefore hoped that the operations of the French general would be effectually checked, until he himself, being reinforced by the British troops, should be able to pass the Meuse, transfer the seat of the war into the enemy's country, thus make a diversion from the Rhine, and perhaps oblige the prince of Soubise to come to the assistance of the principal French army, commanded by M. de Contades.

He had formed a plan which would have answered these purposes effectually, and in prosecution of it advanced to Ruremond on the Maese, when his measures were totally disconcerted by a variety of incidents which he could not foresee. The prince of Ysenbourg was, on the twenty-third day of July, defeated at Sangershausen by the duke de Broglie, whom the prince de Soubise had detached against him with a number of troops greatly superior to that which the Hessian general commanded. The duke de Broglie, who commanded the vanguard of Soubise's army, having received intelligence that the Hessian troops under the prince of Ysenbourg were retiring towards Munden, he marched on the twenty-third of July with a body of eight thousand men to the village of Sangershausen, where he found them drawn up in order of battle, and forthwith made a disposition for the attack. At first his cavalry were repulsed by the Hessian horse, which charged the French infantry, and were broke in their turn.

The Hessians, though greatly inferior in number to the enemy, made a very desperate resistance, by favour of a rock in the Fulde that covered their right, and a wood by which their left was secured. The dispute was so obstinate that the enemy's left was obliged to give ground; but the duke de Broglie ordering a fresh corps to advance, changed the fortune of the day. The Hessians, overpowered by numbers, were forced to recoil; part plunged into the river, where many perished; and part threw themselves into the wood, through which they escaped from the pursuit of the hussars, who took above two hundred soldiers and fifty officers, including the count de Canitz, who was second in command.

They likewise found on the field of battle seven pieces of cannon, and eight at Munden: but the loss of the enemy was much greater than that of the allies, above two thousand of the former being either killed or wounded in the action. The prince of Ysenbourg having collected the remains of his little army, took post at Eimbeck, where he soon was reinforced, and found himself at the head of twelve thousand men; but, in consequence of this advantage, the enemy became masters of the Weser, and opened to themselves a free passage into Westphalia.

The operations of prince Ferdinand upon the Maese had been interrupted by a long succession of heavy rains, which broke up the roads, and rendered the country impassable; and now the certain information of this unlucky defeat reduced him to the necessity of either retiring across the Rhine, or of coming to a battle; the latter was carefully declined by the enemy: the first resolution therefore he found himself unavoidably obliged to embrace. In his present position he was hemmed in by the French army on one wing, on the other by the fortrefs of Gueldre, the garrison of which had been lately reinforced, as well as by divers other posts, capable of obstructing the convoys and subsistence of the combined army: besides, he had reason to apprehend that the prince de Soubise would endeavour to intercept the British troops in their march from Embden.

Induced by these considerations, he resolved to repass the Rhine, after having offered battle to the enemy, and made several motions for that purpose. Finding them averse to an engagement, he made his dispositions for forcing the strong pass of Wachtendonck, an island surrounded by the Niers, of very difficult access, and situated exactly in his route to the Rhine. This scheme was executed by the hereditary prince of Brunswic, who perceiving the enemy had drawn up the bridge, rushed into the river at the head of his grenadiers, who drove them away with their bayonets, and cleared the bridges for the passage of the army towards Rhinebergen.

At this place prince Ferdinand was informed that M. de Chevert, one of the best officers in the French service, had crossed the Lippe with fourteen battalions and several squadrons, to reinforce the garrison of Wesel, and fall upon lieutenant-general Imhoff, who commanded a detached corps of the combined army at Meer, that he might be at hand to guard a bridge which the prince had thrown over the Rhine at Rees. His serene highness was extremely desirous of giving some assistance to general Imhoff; but the troops were too much fatigued to begin this march before morning, and the Rhine had overflowed its banks in such a manner as to render the bridge at Rees impassable; so that Mr. Imhoff was left to the resources of his own conduct and the bravery of his troops, consisting of six battalions and four squadrons, already weakened by the absence of different detachments.

This general having received intelligence, on the fourth day of August, that the enemy designed to pass the Lippe that same evening with a considerable train of artillery, in order to burn the bridge at Rees, set out with a view to secure this place, and join two battalions which had passed the Rhine in boats, under the command of general Zastrow, who reinforced him accordingly; but the enemy, not appearing, he concluded the information was false, and determined to resume his advantageous post at Meer. Of this he had no sooner regained possession than he saw his out-guards engaged with the enemy, who had marched to the attack from Wesel, under the command of lieutenant-general de Chevert, consisting of the whole corps intended for the siege of Dusseldorp.

Imhoff's front was secured by coppices and ditches, there being a rising ground on his right, from from whence he could plainly perceive the whole force that advanced against him, together with the manner of their approach. Observing them engaged in that difficult ground, he posted one regiment in a coppice, with orders to attack the left flank of the enemy, which appeared quite uncovered; and as soon as their fire began, he advanced with the rest of his forces to charge them in front. The bayonet was used on this occasion, and the attack made with such impetuosity and resolution, that after a short resistance the enemy was thrown into confusion, and fled towards Wesel, leaving on the spot eleven pieces of cannon, with a great number of waggons and other carriages. Besides the killed and wounded, who amounted to a pretty considerable number, the victor took three hundred and fifty-four prisoners, including eleven officers; and this advantage was gained with little or no loss on the side of the allies.

Immediately after this action general Wangenheim crossed the Rhine with several squadrons and battalions to join general Imhoff, and enable him to improve the victory he had gained, while prince Ferdinand proceeded with the rest of the army to Santen; from whence he continued his march to Rhineberg, where he intended to pass; but the river had overflowed its banks to such a degree, that here, as well as at Rees, the shore was inaccessible; so that he found it necessary to march farther down the river, and lay a bridge at Griethuizen. The enemy had constructed four vessels for the destruction of this bridge; but they were all happily taken before they could be executed, and the whole army passed on the tenth day of August, without any loss or further interruption. At the same time the prince withdrew his garrison from Dusseldorp, of which the French immediately took possession. Soon after his passage he received a letter from the duke of Marlborough, informing him that the British troops had arrived at Lingen, in their way to Coesfeldt; to which place general Imhoff was sent with a strong detachment to receive them: but notwithstanding this junction, the two armies on the Rhine were so equally matched, that no stroke of importance was struck on either side during the remaining part of the campaign.

M. de Contades seeing no prospect of gaining any advantage over prince Ferdinand, detached prince Xaverius of Saxony with a strong body of troops to reinforce the prince de Soubise, who had seized Gottingen, and seemed resolved to attack the prince of Ysenbourg at Eimbeck. That this officer might be the better able to stand his ground, prince Ferdinand detached general Oberg with ten thousand men to Lipstadt; from whence, should occasion require, they might continue their march, and join the Hessians. The whole body, when thus united, did not exceed twenty thousand men, of whom general Oberg now assumed the command; whereas the troops of Soubise amounted to no less than thirty thousand.

The allies had intrenched themselves upon the river Fulde at Sandershausen, where they hoped the French would attack them; but the design of Soubise was first to dislodge them from that advantageous situation. With this view he made a motion as if he had intended to pass the camp of the allies by the road of Munden. In order to prevent the execution of this supposed design, general Oberg decamped on the tenth of October, and, passing by the village of Landwernhagen, proceeded towards Luttenberg, where, being informed the enemy were at his heels, he forthwith drew up his troops in order of battle, his right to the Fulde, and his left extending to a thicket upon an eminence, where he planted five pieces of artillery. The cavalry covered the wings in a third line, the village of Luttenberg was in the rear, and four pieces of cannon were mounted on a rising ground that flanked this village.

The French having likewise passed Landwernhagen, posted their left towards the Fulde, their right extending far beyond the left of the allies, and their front being secured by above thirty pieces of cannon. At four in the afternoon the enemy began the battle with a severe cannonading, and at the same time the first line of their infantry attacked major-general Zastrow, who was posted on the left wing of the allies. This body of the French was repulsed; but in the same moment a considerable line of cavalry advancing, charged the allies in front and flank. These were sustained by a fresh body of infantry with cannon, which, after a warm dispute, compelled the confederates to give ground; and general Oberg, in order to prevent a total defeat, made a disposition for a retreat, which was performed in tolerable order; not but that he suffered greatly, in passing through a defile, from the fire of the enemy's cannon, which was brought up and managed under the direction of the duke de Broglie. Having marched through Munden by midnight, the retiring army lay till morning under arms in the little plain near Grupen, on the other side of the Weser; but at day-break continued their march, after having withdrawn the garrison from Munden, until they arrived in the neighbourhood of Gunterstheim, where they encamped.

In this engagement about fifteen hundred of the allies were either killed or wounded, though the loss of the enemy was much more considerable. General Oberg, however, was obliged to abandon a magazine of hay and straw at Munden, and leave part of his wounded men in that place to the humanity of the victor. Nevertheless, the French general reaped very little advantage from his victory.

By this time prince Ferdinand had retired into Westphalia, and fixed his head quarters at Munster, while M. Contades encamped near Ham upon the Lippe: so that, notwithstanding the great increase of the French army, they were not able to make any farther progress during the remaining part of the season. The British troops had joined the allies so late in the year, that they had no opportunity to distinguish themselves in the field; yet the fatigues of the campaign, which they severely felt, proved fatal to their commander the duke of Marlborough, who died of a dysentery at Munster, universally regretted.

Having thus related the operations of the allied army during this campaign, we shall now endeavour to trace the steps of the king of Prussia, from the period at which his army was assembled for action. Having collected his forces as soon as the season would permit, he invested the town of Schweidnitz in form on the twenty-first day of March, and carried on his attacks with such unremitting vigour, that in thirteen days the garrison surrendered themselves prisoners of war, after having lost one half of their number in the defence of the place.

While one part of his troops were employed in this service, he himself at the head of another advanced to the eastern frontier of Bohemia, and detached a strong body as far as Trawtenaw, garrisoned by a party of Austrians, who, after an obstinate defence, abandoned the place and retreated towards their grand army. By this conquest he opened to himself a passage into Bohemia, by which he poured in detachments of light troops, to levy contributions and annoy the out-posts of the enemy. At the same time the baron de la Mothe Fouquet marched with another body against the Austrian general Jahnus, posted in the county of Glatz, whom he compelled to abandon all the places he possessed in that country, and pursued as far as Nachod, within twenty miles of Koninggratz, where the grand Austrian army was encamped, under the command of marshal Daun, who had lately arrived from Vienna.

Over and above these operations, the king ordered a body of thirty thousand men to be assembled, to act under the command of his brother prince Henry, an accomplished general, against the army of the empire, which the prince of Deuxponts had with great difficulty made shift to collect once more in the district of Franconia.

The king of Prussia being bent upon prosecuting the campaign with the utmost vigour, resolved to change the theatre of the war, and penetrate into Moravia, a fertile country, which had hitherto been kept free from all kinds of hostility. Having formed an army of fifty thousand choice troops near Neiss in Silesia, he divided them into three columns; the first commanded by marshal Keith, the second by himself in person, and the third conducted by the prince of Anhalt Dessau.

In the latter end of April they began their march towards Moravia; and general De la Ville, who commanded a body of Austrians in that country, retired as they approached, after having reinforced the garrison of Olmutz, which the king was determined to besiege. The place accordingly was immediately invested; orders were issued to hasten up the heavy artillery; and marshal Keith was appointed to superintend and direct the operations of the siege.

Mean while, count Daun being informed of his Prussian majesty's motions and intentions, decamped with his army from Leutomysfel in Bohemia, and entered Moravia by the way of Billa. Being still too weak to oppose the Prussians in the field, he extended his troops in the neighbourhood of the king's army, between Gewitz and Littau, in a mountainous situation, where he ran little or no risque of being attacked. Here he continued for some time in quiet, with the fertile country of Bohemia in his rear, from whence he received supplies of provision, and was daily joined by fresh reinforcements.

His design was to relieve the besieged occasionally, to annoy the besiegers, and to cut off their convoys from Silesia; and this scheme succeeded to his wish. Olmutz is so extensive in its works, and so advantageously situated on the river Morava, that it could not be completely invested without weakening the posts of the besiegers, by extending them to a prodigious circuit; so that in some parts they were easily forced by detachments in the night, who fell upon them suddenly; and seldom failed to introduce into the place supplies of men, provision, and ammunition. The forage in the neighbourhood having been previously destroyed, the Prussian horse were obliged to make excursions at a distance for this necessary article; by which means they were exposed to fatigue, and liable to surprize.

Count Daun knew how to take advantage of these circumstances, without trying the chance of a battle, to which the king provoked him in vain. While the garrison by repeated sallies interrupted the operations of the besieged, the Austrian general annoyed their foraging parties, fell upon different quarters of their army in the night, and kept them in continual alarm. Nevertheless the king completed his first parallel; and proceeded with such vigour as seemed to promise a speedy reduction of the place, when his design was entirely defeated by one untoward incident.

Marshal Daun having received intelligence that a large convoy had set out from Silesia for the Prussian camp, determined to lay hold of this opportunity to compel the king to relinquish his enterprize. For this purpose he sent general Jahnus with a strong body of troops towards Bahrn, and another detachment to Stadtoliebe, with instructions to attack the convoy on different sides, while he himself marched up to the besiegers, as if he intended to give them battle. The king of Prussia, far from being deceived by this feint, could easily, from the motion of the Austrian general, discover his design, and immediately dispatched general Ziethen with a strong reinforcement to protect the convoy, which was escorted by eight battalions, and about four thousand men who had been sick and were just recovered. Before this officer had joined them, the convoy had been attacked on the twenty-eighth day of June; but the assailants were repulsed with considerable loss.

Marshal Daun, however, took care that they should be immediately reinforced; and the next day the attack was renewed with redoubled vigour. Four hundred waggons, guarded by four battalions and about one thousand troopers, had just passed the defiles of Domstadt, when the Austrians charged them furiously on every side: the communication between the head and the rest of the convoy was cut off; and general Ziethen, after having exerted all his efforts for its preservation, being obliged to abandon the waggons, retired to Troppau. Thus the whole convoy fell into the hands of the enemy, who took above six hundred prisoners, together with general Putkammer; and the king of Prussia was obliged to abandon his enterprize.

This was a mortifying necessity to a prince of his high spirit, at a time when he saw himself on the point of reducing the place, notwithstanding the gallant defence made by the garrison under general Marshal, the governor. Nothing now remained but to raise the siege, and retire without loss in the face of a vigilant enemy, prepared to seize every opportunity of advantage: a task which, however difficult and dangerous, he executed with a wonderful dexterity. Instead of withdrawing into Silesia, he resolved to avert the war from his own dominions, nions, and take the route of Bohemia, the frontiers of which were left quite open by marshal Daun's last motion, when he advanced with his troops to Pofnitz, in order the more effectually to relieve Olmutz.

After the king had concerted his measures, he carefully concealed his design from the enemy, and notwithstanding the loss of his convoy, continued the operations of the siege with redoubled vigour till the first day of July, when he decamped in the night, and began his march to Bohemia. He himself with one division took the road of Konitz; and marshal Keith having brought away all the artillery, except four mortars and one disabled cannon, pursued his march by the way of Littau to Muglitz and Tribau.

Although his Prussian majesty had gained an entire march upon the Austrians, their light troops, commanded by the generals Buccow and Laudohn, did not fail to harass him in his retreat; but their endeavours were in a great measure defeated by the conduct and circumspection of the Prussian commanders. After the rear of the army had passed the defiles of Krenau, general Laschi, who was posted at Gibau with a large body of Austrians, took possession of the village of Krenau with a detachment of grenadiers, who were soon dislodged; and the Prussians continued their march by Zwitzau to Leutomysfel, where they seized a magazine of meal and forage. In the mean time, general Retzow, who conducted the provisions and artillery, found the hills of Hollitz occupied by the enemy, who cannonaded him as he approached; but marshal Keith advancing, ordered them to be attacked in the rear, and they fled into a wood with precipitation, with the loss of six officers and three hundred men, who were taken prisoners.

While the marshal was thus employed, the king proceeded from Leutomysfel to Koningsgratz, where general Buccow, who had got the start of him, was posted with seven thousand Austrians behind the Elbe, and in the intrenchments which they had formed all around the city. The Prussian troops immediately crossed the little river Adler; and as the enemy had destroyed the bridges over the Elbe, the king ordered them to be repaired with all expedition, being firmly resolved to force the Austrian intrenchments: but general Buccow did not wait his approach. He abandoned his intrenchments, and withdrew with his troops to Clumetz; so that the king took possession of the most important post of Koningsgratz without farther opposition.

An Austrian corps having taken post between him and Hollitz, in order to interrupt the march of the artillery, he advanced against them in person; and having dislodged them from the place, all his cannon, military stores, provision, with fifteen hundred sick and wounded men, arrived in safety at Koningsgratz, where the whole army encamped. His intention was to remove the seat of war from Moravia to Bohemia, where he should be able to preserve a more easy communication with his own dominions; but a more powerful motive soon obliged him to alter his resolution.

After the Russian troops, under marshal Apraxin, had retired from Pomerania in the course of the preceding year, and the czarina seemed inclined to adopt new measures, the courts of Vienna and Versailles had, by dint of subsidies, promises, presents, and intrigues, attached her in all appearance more firmly than ever to the confederacy; and even prevailed with her to increase the number of troops destined to act against the Prussian monarch. She not only signed her accession in form to the quadruple alliance with the empress-queen and the kings of France and Sweden; but, in order to demonstrate her zeal for the common cause, she disgraced her chancellor count Bestuchef, who was thought to be averse to the war: she divided her troops into separate bodies, under the command of the generals Fermer and Brown, and ordered them to begin their march in the middle of winter.

Fermer accordingly put his army in motion in the beginning of January, and on the twenty-second his light troops took possession of Koningsberg, the capital of Prussia, without opposition; for the king's forces had left that country, in order to prosecute the war in the western parts of Pomerania. They did not, however, continue long in this part of the country; but after having pillaged some districts, returned to the main body, which halted on the Vistula, to the no small disturbance of the city of Dantzick, where the resident of the czarina actually demanded that the magistrates should admit a Russian garrison: a demand which they not only peremptorily refused, but ordered all the citizens to arms, and took every other method to oppose force by force.

At length, after some negociation with general Fermer, the affair was compromised; he desisted from the demand, and part of his troops crossed the Vistula, seemingly with a view to invade Pomerania, in the eastern part of which count Dohna had collected a strong body of Prussians to put a stop to their progress. But after they had plundered the open country, they rejoined their main body; and general Fermer returning to the left, proceeded towards Silesia, in order to act in concert with the other Russian army commanded by Brown, who had taken his route through Poland, and already passed the Posna. By the first of July both armies had reached the frontiers of Silesia, and some of the Cossacks penetrating into that province, had committed dreadful ravages, and filled the inhabitants with terror and consternation.

Count Dohna, with the Prussian army under his command, had carefully observed their motions, and even crossed the Oder at Frankfort, as if he intended to attack them: but he was too much inferior in number to hazard such a step, which became an object of his sovereign's own personal attention.

With this view the king made his dispositions for retreating from Bohemia, and on the twenty-fifth day of July quitted the camp of Koningsgratz. He was harassed in his march by three thousand Austrian light troops detached by count Daun, who had followed him into Bohemia: but notwithstanding these impediments, he passed the Mittau, proceeded on his route, and on the ninth day of August arrived at Landshut.

From thence he hastened with a detachment towards Franckfort on the Oder, and joined the army commanded by lieutenant-general Dohna at Gorgas. Then the whole army crossed the Oder by a bridge laid over it at Gatavise; and having rested one day, advanced to Dertmitzel, where they encamped.

encamped. The Russians under general Fermer were posted on the other side of the little river Mitzel, their right reaching to the village of Zwicker, and their left to Quertchem.

The king being determined immediately to attack them, crossed the Mitzel on the twenty-fifth in the morning, and passing the left flank of the enemy, drew up his army in order of battle in the plain between the little river and the town of Zorn-dorf. The Russians, who were superior to him in number, did not decline the engagement; but as the ground would not allow them to extend themselves in length, they were ranged in four lines, forming a front on every side, defended by cannon and chevaux de frise, their right flank being secured by the village of Zwicker. After a severe cannonade, the Prussian infantry were ordered to attack the village, and a body of grenadiers advanced to the assault; but this brigade unexpectedly giving way, occasioned a considerable opening in the line, and left the whole left flank of the infantry uncovered.

Before the enemy could profit by this disorder, the interval was filled up by the cavalry under the command of general Seydelitz; and the king with his usual presence of mind, substituted another choice body of troops to carry on the attack. This began about noon, and continued for some time, during which both sides fought with equal courage and perseverance: at length, general Seydelitz having routed the Russian cavalry, attacked the flank of the infantry with such impetuosity, that being also dreadfully annoyed by the Prussian artillery, they abandoned the village, together with their military chest and great part of their baggage. Notwithstanding this loss, which had greatly disordered their right wing, they continued to stand their ground; and dreadful havock was made among them, not only with the sword and bayonet, but also by the cannon, which was loaded with grape-shot, and being excellently served, did great execution.

Towards evening they were thrown into such terrible confusion, that in all probability they would have been intirely routed, had they not been favoured by the approaching darkness, as well as by a particular operation which was performed with equal spirit and success. One of the Russian generals perceiving the fortune of the day turned against them, rallied a select body of troops, and made a vigorous impression on the right wing of the Prussians. This effort diverted their attention so strongly to that quarter, that the right of the Russians enjoyed a respite, during which they retired in tolerable order, and occupied a new post in the night, where the rest of their forces were the more easily assembled.

In this battle they are said to have lost above twenty thousand men, thirty-seven colours, five standards, twelve mortars, the greater part of their baggage, and above one hundred pieces of cannon. Among the prisoners that fell into the hands of the victor, there were several general officers, and a good number lost their lives on the field of battle. The loss of the king did not amount to above two thousand men, including some officers of distinction, particularly two aids-du-camp, who attended his own person, which he exposed without scruple in the hottest parts of the battle. The carnage in all probability would not have been so great, had not the Prussians been in a peculiar manner exasperated against this enemy, because they had laid waste the country, burned the villages, ruined the peasants, and committed many other horrid acts of barbarity which the practice of war could not authorize.

The Prussian army remained all night under arms, and next morning renewed the cannonading against the enemy, who nevertheless maintained their post without flinching. On the twenty-seventh they seemed determined to hazard another action, and even to attack the conquerors in their turn: instead of advancing, however, they took the route of Landsberg; but afterwards wheeled off towards Vietzel, and intrenched themselves in a strong camp between the river Warta and that village.

Never was prince involved in greater difficulties than was his Prussian majesty at this juncture; and though no prince ever exerted himself with greater spirit and activity, yet was he not able to guard against the dangers which threatened him from every quarter. At his departure from Bohemia, marshal Daun, with the Austrian army, and the prince de Deux-ponts, who commanded the forces of the empire, advanced to the Elbe, in order to surround the king's brother prince Henry, who, without immediate assistance, must have been entirely ruined. The Prussian monarch therefore determined to support him with equal vigour and expedition. In a few days after the battle of Zorn-dorf, he began his march from Custrin with a reinforcement of twenty-four battalions and great part of his cavalry, and prosecuted his route with such uncommon celerity, that by the fifth of September he arrived at Torgau, and on the eleventh joined his brother.

Marshal Daun had taken post at Stolpen, to the eastward of the Elbe, in order to maintain a free communication with the army of the empire, encamped in the neighbourhood of Konigstein; to favour the operations of general Laudohn, who had advanced through the Lower Lusatia to the frontiers of Brandenburg; to draw the attention of the Russians from the southern parts of Silesia, where a body of Austrian troops acted under the command of the generals Harrache and de Ville; and to interrupt the communication between prince Henry and the capital of Saxony. On the fifth day of September the strong fortrefs of Konigstein surrendered, after a very feeble resistance, to the prince de Deux-ponts, who immediately took possession of the advantageous camp at Pirna. When the king of Prussia therefore arrived at Dresden, he found the army of the empire in this position, and marshal Daun in a still stronger situation at Stolpen, with bridges of communication thrown over the Elbe; so that he could not attack them without the most imminent danger of a repulse.

He had no other resolution to take but that of endeavouring to intercept their supplies of provision; and with this view he advanced to Bautzen, which he immediately seized. This motion obliged the Austrian general to abandon his post at Stolpen; but he chose another of equal strength at Libau; yet he afterwards proceeded to Rittitz, that he might be at hand to take the first opportunity tunity of executing the resolution he had formed to attack the Prussians. The king having detached general Retzow on his left to take possession of Weissenberg, advanced with the main body of his army, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Hochkirchen, after having dislodged the Austrians from that village. Matters were now brought to such a crisis, that a battle seemed altogether unavoidable, and indeed was equally desired by both parties, as an event that would determine whether the Austrians should be obliged to retreat for winter quarters into Bohemia, or be enabled to preserve their footing in Saxony.

In this situation marshal Daun resolved to act offensively, and formed a scheme for attacking, by surprize, the right flank of the Prussians. This measure was suggested to him by an oversight of the Prussians, who had neglected to secure the heights that commanded the village of Hochkirchen, which was only possessed by a few free companies. He determined to take the advantage of a very dark night, and to employ the flower of his whole army on this important service; fully convinced that, should they succeed in this attempt, the designs of his Prussian majesty would be disconcerted, and in all probability entirely defeated.

Having taken his measures with equal secrecy and expedition, he began his march in the night between the thirteenth and fourteenth of October, favoured by a thick fog, which contributed greatly to increase the darkness. His first care was to make himself master of the hill that commanded Hochkirchen, from whence his troops poured down upon the village, of which they took possession, after having cut in pieces the free companies posted there. The action began in this quarter about four in the morning, and continued several hours with great fury: for notwithstanding the impetuosity of the Austrian troops, and the confusion occasioned among the Prussians by the surprize, a vigorous stand was made by some general officers, who with wonderful spirit and presence of mind, assembled and marshalled the troops as they could take to their arms, and led them up to the attack without distinction of regiment, place, or precedence.

While the action was desperately maintained in this quarter, the king exerted himself in the other parts of the field with uncommon vigour and activity, in drawing order from confusion, arranging the different corps, altering positions, reinforcing weak posts, encouraging the soldiery, and opposing the efforts of the enemy; for although they made their chief impression upon the right by the village of Hochkirchen, marshal Daun, in order to divide the attention of the king, made another attack on the left, which was very hard pressed, and effectually prevented him from sending reinforcements to the right, where marshal Keith, under the greatest disadvantages, bore the brunt of the enemy's chief endeavours. Thrice was he repulsed from the village of Hochkirchen, and as often did he regain possession of it; till at last, being overpowered by numbers, he was finally obliged to abandon it about nine in the morning, when, to the irreparable loss of his sovereign, he fell by a musquet-ball. Prince Francis of Brunswic had his head carried off by that of a cannon: prince Maurice of Anhalt was wounded and taken prisoner; and many others were either slain or disabled.

As the right wing had been surprized, the tents continued standing, and greatly incommoded them in their motions. The soldiers had never been properly marshalled: the enemy still persevered in their attack with successive reinforcements and redoubled fury; and a considerable slaughter was made by their artillery, which they had brought up to the heights of Hochkirchen. All these unhappy circumstances could not fail to increase the confusion and disaster of the Prussians; so that about ten the king was obliged to retire to Dobreschutz, with the loss of three thousand men, though that of the enemy was much more considerable; nor could his Prussian majesty be said to have sustained any damage which he could not easily repair, except the death of marshal Keith, which was doubtless an irreparable misfortune.

He took post with his army about half a league from the field of action, where he continued ten days; during which he endeavoured to bring the enemy to a fresh engagement. This invitation, however, the Austrian general thought proper to decline, and kept his forces advantageously encamped on eminences planted with artillery. His design having been defeated at Hochkirchen, where he fought with many advantages on his side, he would not hazard another battle, upon equal terms, with such an enterprising enemy, rendered more vigilant by the check he had sustained, already reinforced from the army of prince Henry, and eager for an opportunity to wipe out the disgrace which had been fixed upon his arms.

Count Daun having nothing farther to hope from the active operations of his own army, contented himself with amusing the Prussian monarch in Lusatia; while the Austrian generals, Harsche and De Ville, should carry on the siege of Neiss and Cosel in Silesia, which they now actually invested. As the Prussian monarch could not spare detachments to oppose every different corps of his enemies that acted against him in different parts of his dominions, he resolved to make up in activity what he wanted in number, and, if possible, to relieve the city of Neiss in person. With this view he set out from Dobreschutz, and in sight of the enemy advanced to Gorlitz without the least interruption. From thence he continued his march towards Silesia with his usual rapidity, notwithstanding all the endeavours of general Laudohn, who harassed the rear of the Prussians, and obtained over them some petty advantages.

Count Daun not only sent this considerable corps to retard them in their march, but at the same time, by another route, detached a strong body to reinforce the besiegers. In the mean time, having received intelligence that the army of prince Henry in Saxony was greatly weakened, he himself marched thither, in hopes of driving the prince from that country, and reducing the capital in the king's absence. Indeed his design was still more extensive; for he proposed to reduce Dresden, Leipzig, and Torgau, at the same time; the first, with the main body under his own command; the second, by the army of the empire, under the prince de Deux Ponts; and the third, by a corps under general Haddick; while the forces conducted by Laudohn should exclude the king from Lusatia.

In prosecution of this plan, he proceeded directly to the Elbe, which he crossed at Pirna, and advanced to Dresden, which he hoped he should be able to take by assault. The army of prince Henry had already retired to the westward of this capital, before the prince de Deux-Ponts, who had found means to cut off his communication with Leipzig, and even invested that city. During these transactions, general Haddick advanced against Torgau.

The field-marshal count Daun appearing on the sixth day of November within sight of Dresden, at the head of sixty thousand men, encamped next day at Lockowitz, and on the eighth his advanced troops attacked the Prussian hussars and independent battalions, which were posted at Striessen and Gruenewiese. Count Schmettau, who commanded the garrison, amounting only to twelve thousand men, was sensible, that considering the weakness and extent of the suburbs, it would be absolutely impossible for him to prevent the enemy from making themselves masters of them by a single assault; and that if they succeeded in this attempt, the great height of the houses, which were generally six or seven stories, and entirely commanded the ramparts, would render the reduction of the body of the place equally easy and certain. These considerations unavoidably determined him to set the suburbs immediately on fire.

The suburbs of Dresden, it is well known, compose one of the finest towns in Europe, and are greatly superior to that part of the city which lies within the walls. Here the most substantial inhabitants reside, and here are carried on those curious manufactures for which Dresden is so deservedly famous.

Count Daun, foreseeing this consequence of his attempt, endeavoured to intimidate the governor from a measure, to which he knew he would be necessarily driven by the cruel necessity of war. With this view he sent a messenger to Schmettau, whom he threatened to make personally responsible for whatever steps he should take; but the governor replied, with the firmness that became a man of honour and a soldier, that he would boldly answer for whatever he should do; and in case marshal Daun advanced, would not only burn the suburbs, but likewise defend the city itself from street to street, and at last even take shelter in the royal palace, should he be reduced to that extremity.

The magistrates were no sooner apprized of this resolution than they fell at the feet of count Schmettau, and implored him to change his mind, and to have mercy on that devoted part of their city. Such of the royal family as remained in Dresden joined their supplications to those of the magistrates, beseeching him to spare that last refuge of distressed royalty, and to allow at least a secure residence to those who had been deprived of every thing else.

All their entreaties were of no avail. Schmettau continued firm in his resolution. He told them that their safety depended on themselves and on marshal Daun; that, if that general made no attempts, the suburbs should be still secure; but that if he took any farther steps, the necessity of his master's service and his own honour would compel him to act in a manner very disagreeable to the lenity of his disposition. The magistrates retired in despair. Combustibles were laid in all the houses.

Marshal Daun renewing his attacks, the signal for firing the suburbs was given next morning; and in a moment, a place so lately the seat of ease and luxury, flourishing in traffic, in pleasures, and in ingenious arts, was involved in flames. Dreadful however as was the calamity, it was attended with as little mischief as the nature of the thing could possibly admit. Very few lost their lives, but many their whole substance. The Prussian troops abandoned the flaming suburbs, and retired in good order into the city.

Marshal Daun seeing the fire, which at once laid waste the capital of his ally, and effectually prevented him from taking it by assault, sent some empty threats to the governor. The Saxon minister too, at Ratisbon, made grievous complaints to the diet of the empire, exclaiming loudly against the burning of the suburbs, as the most unparalleled act of wanton and unprovoked cruelty that had ever been committed. The emissaries of the court of Vienna spread the same reports; nor did they scruple to invent and alter facts in such a manner as to excite the greatest pity towards the sufferers, and the highest indignation against his Prussian majesty.

All these, however, were in a short time abundantly refuted, by the authentic certificates of the magistrates of Dresden, and of the officers of that court, who were perfectly acquainted with the transaction. From these certificates it appeared, that no more than two hundred and fifty houses were consumed; and though this, it must be owned, was a terrible calamity, yet was it nothing in comparison of the accounts that were confidently published in the Austrian gazettes. It was likewise proved that the people were not surprised, as was falsely pretended; but that they had sufficient notice of the governor's intentions, to enable them to provide for their safety. In a word, all the charges of cruelty alleged against the Prussian governor and garrison were fully and satisfactorily overthrown.

While count Daun was employed in making this fruitless attempt upon the capital of Saxony, the king of Prussia proceeded in his march to Neiss, which was completely invested on the third day of October. The operations of the siege were prosecuted with great vigour by the Austrian general, de Harsche, and the place was as gallantly defended by the Prussian governor, Theskau, till the first day of November, when the Prussian monarch arrived, and compelled the besiegers to relinquish their enterprize. M. de Harsche having raised the siege, the king detached general Fouquet with a body of troops across the river Neiss, and immediately the blockade of Cosel was likewise abandoned. De Harsche withdrew into Bohemia, and De Ville hovered about Jagernsdorf.

The fortress of Neiss was no sooner relieved, than the king of Prussia set out on his return to Saxony, where his presence was become indispensably necessary. At the same time the two bodies under the generals Dohna and Wedel entered by different routes into that country. The former had been left at Custrin to attend the motions of the Russians, who had by this time retreated to the Vistula, and even passed that river at Thorn; the other had, during the campaign, made head against the Swedes, who had now entirely withdrawn from the Prussian territories; so that Wedel was at liberty to act in concert with his majesty.

He accordingly advanced to Torgau, which had been lately invested by the Austrian general Haddick, who was obliged to raise the siege, and even pursued to the neighbourhood of Eulenburg. Wedel being afterwards joined by Dohna, drove him from thence with considerable loss, and then relieved the city of Leipzig. Mean while the king continued his march towards the capital of Saxony, the Austrians flying before him with the utmost precipitation. On the tenth of November count Daun retired from Dresden, and with the army of the empire fell back towards Bohemia; and on the twentieth the king arrived in that city, where he approved of the governor's conduct.

The Russian general, apprehensive that he should not be able to preserve his footing during the winter in Pomerania, unless he could secure some sea-port on the Baltic, by which he might be supplied with provisions, detached general Palmbach with fifteen thousand men to besiege the town of Colberg, an inconsiderable place, very poorly fortified. It was accordingly invested on the third day of October; but the besiegers were either so totally destitute of proper implements, or so entirely ignorant of the art of attack, that the garrison, though feeble, bid defiance to all the attempts of the enemy, who, after a siege of twenty-six days, relinquished their enterprize, and cruelly ravaged the open country in their retreat. Thus by the activity and valour of the Prussian monarch, his generals and officers, six sieges were raised almost at the same period, namely, those of Colberg, Neiss, Cosel, Torgau, Leipzig, and Dresden.

The king of Prussia, at his first entrance into Saxony, declared that he had no design to make a conquest of the electorate, but only to keep it as a sacred depositum for the security of his own dominions, until he could oblige his enemies to agree to reasonable terms of accommodation: but upon his last arrival at Dresden, he thought proper to adopt new maxims.

In the beginning of December the Prussian directory of war issued a decree to the deputies of the states of the electorate, demanding a certain quantity of flour and forage, according to the convention formerly settled; at the same time signifying, that though the king of Prussia had hitherto treated the electorate as a country taken under his special protection, the face of affairs was now changed in such a manner, that for the future he would consider it in no other light than that of a conquered country.

The Russians had seized in Prussia all the estates and effects belonging to the king's officers: a retaliation was now made upon the effects of the Saxon officers who served in the Russian army. Seals were put on all the cabinets containing papers belonging to the privy counsellors of his Polish majesty, and they themselves ordered to depart for Warsaw at a very short warning. Though the city had been impoverished by former exactions, and very lately subjected to military execution, the king of Prussia demanded fresh contributions, and even extorted them by dint of severities, which can by no means be justified. He surrounded the exchange with soldiers, and confining the merchants to straw beds and naked apartments, compelled them to draw bills for very large sums on their foreign correspondents.

Having related all the transactions of the campaign, except those in which the Swedes were concerned, it now remains that I should describe the progress which was made in Pomerania by the troops of that nation, under the command of count Hamilton. I have already observed, that in the beginning of the year the Prussian general, Lehwald, had constrained them to evacuate the whole province, except Stralsund, which was likewise invested. This, in all probability, would have been besieged in form, had not Lehwald resigned the command of the Prussians, on account of his great age and infirmities, and his successor count Dohna been obliged to retire from that quarter, in order to make head against the Russian army on the other side of Pomerania.

The blockade of Stralsund being consequently raised, and that part of the country entirely abandoned by the Prussians, the Swedish troops advanced again from the isle of Rugen, to which they had retreated: but the supplies and reinforcements they expected from Stockholm were delayed in such a manner, either from a deficiency in the subsidies stipulated by France, or from the management of those who were in the Prussian interest, that great part of the season was elapsed before they undertook any thing of importance. Indeed, while they lay encamped under the cannon of Stralsund waiting for these supplies, their operations were retarded by the explosion of a whole ship-load of gun-powder intended for their use; an event owing, in all likelihood, to accident, but maliciously imputed by the enemy to the practices of the Prussian party in Sweden, which at this period seemed to gain ground, and even threatened a change in the ministry. At length the reinforcement arrived about the latter end of June, and their general determined to resume his operations.

In the beginning of July, his army being put in motion, he sent a detachment to dislodge the few Prussian troops that were left at Anclam, Demmin, and other places, to guard that frontier; and they retreated accordingly. Count Hamilton meeting with no farther resistance in the field, recovered in a little time the whole of the Swedish Pomerania, and even made frequent incursions into the Prussian territories. Mean while, a combined fleet of thirty-three Russian and seven Swedish ships of war appeared in the Baltic, and anchored between the islands of Dragoë and Amagh; but they neither landed troops nor committed hostilities. The Swedish general advanced as far as Fehrbellin, sent out parties that raised contributions in the adjacent country, and even struck terror into the capital of Brandenburg.

The king of Prussia being apprised of their progress, detached general Wedel from Dresden with a body of troops that were augmented on their route; so that on the twentieth of September he found himself at Berlin with eleven thousand effective men, at the head of whom he marched against count Hamilton, while the prince of Bevern with five thousand advanced on the other side from Stettin. At their approach the Swedish commander retired, after having left a garrison of fourteen hundred men at Fehrbellin, in order to retard the Prussians, and secure the retreat of his army. The place was immediately assaulted by general Wedel; and though the Swedes made a most obstinate resistance, sistance, he at last compelled them to surrender with the loss of one half of their number either killed or taken prisoners. The body of the Swedish army, without attempting any thing farther, immediately evacuated the Prussian territories, and returned to the neighbourhood of Stralsund, intending to take winter quarters in the isle of Rugen. Count Hamilton, either dissatisfied with the restrictions imposed on him, or finding himself unable to act in such a manner as might encrease his reputation, threw up his command, retired from the army, and resigned all his other employments.

The cause of his Prussian majesty was not only espoused by a strong party in Sweden, but was also supported by a great many in Poland, especially by such of the Palatines as had always opposed the measures of the reigning family. These were now joined by several patriots, who dreaded the vicinity, and suspected the designs of the Russian army. The dyet of the republic was opened on the second day of November, and after warm debates, M. Malachowski was unanimously chosen marshal; but no sooner had the chamber of nuncios begun their deliberations, than a number of voices were raised against the encroachment of the Russian troops, who had taken up their quarters in Poland, and heavy complaints were made of the damages occasioned by their cruelty and rapine.

Great pains were taken to appease these clamours, and many were persuaded to refer their grievances to the king in senate: but when this difficulty seemed almost overcome, Padhorski, the nuncio of Volhinia, stood up and declared, that he would not allow any other point to be debated in the dyet, while the Russians preserved the least footing within the territories of the republic. The other courtiers exerted their utmost influence to cajole and mollify this stubborn patriot; but all their endeavours were absolutely ineffectual. He solemnly protested against their proceedings, and withdrew; so that the marshal was obliged to dissolve the assembly, and recourse was had to a senatus concilium, to concert such measures as seemed at present necessary.

The scheme which his Polish majesty had formed of procuring the dukedom of Courland for his son prince Charles, was likewise attended with great clamour and dissension. He had been recommended by the court of Russia, and even approved by the states of that country; but two difficulties remained. The states alleged, that they could not proceed to a new election during the life of their former duke, count Biron, who was still alive, though a prisoner in Siberia, unless their duchy should be declared vacant by the king and republic of Poland; and that, according to the laws of that country, no prince could be elected until he should have solemnly subscribed to the Augsbourg confession of faith. His Polish majesty, however, being determined to carry his point at all adventures, ordered count Malachowski, high-chancellor of Poland, to deliver to prince Charles a diploma, by which the king granted permission to the states of Courland, to chuse that prince for their duke; and appointed the day for his election and instalment, which accordingly took place in the month of January, notwithstanding the clamour of many Polish grandees, who persisted in asserting that the king had no right to grant such permission without the consent of the dyet.

The events of the campaign, however various, had produced no change in the political systems adopted by the several courts of Europe. The czarina, who in the month of June had expressed her sentiments with regard to the king of Prussia, in a declaration delivered to all the foreign ministers at Petersburg, seemed now more bent than ever on prosecuting her designs against that monarch. The queen of Hungary distributed, among the imperial ministers at the several courts of the empire, copies of a rescript, explaining the conduct of her generals since the commencement of the campaign, and concluding with expressions of self-approbation, to the following effect: "Though the issue of the campaign be not as yet entirely satisfactory, and such as might be desired, the imperial court enjoys at least the sincere satisfaction of reflecting, that, according to the change of circumstances, it instantly took the most vigorous resolutions; that it was never deficient in any thing that might contribute to the good of the common cause; and that it is now employed in making preparations from which the most happy consequences may be expected."

I have already taken notice of a decree of the Aulic council, published in the month of August, enjoining all directors of circles, all imperial towns, and the noblesse of the empire, to transmit to Vienna an exact list of all those who had disobeyed the avocatoria of the empire, and supported the rebellion raised by the elector of Brandenburg; that their revenues might be sequestered, and themselves punished in their honours, persons, and effects. As the king of Great Britain, in quality of elector of Hanover, was plainly pointed at, and indeed expressly mentioned in this decree, that prince, by the hands of baron Gemmegen, his electoral minister, presented a memorial to the dyet of the empire in the month of November, enumerating the instances in which he had exerted himself, and even exposed his life, for the preservation and aggrandizement of the house of Austria.

In return for these important services, he affirmed that the empress-queen had refused him the assistance stipulated in treaties, against an invasion planned by France, whose hatred he had drawn upon himself by his friendship to that princess; and his Imperial majesty even denied him the dictatorial letters which he solicited: that the court of Vienna had signed a treaty with the crown of France, in which it was stipulated, that the French troops should pass the Weser, and invade the electorate of Hanover, where they were joined by the troops of the empress-queen, who ravaged his Britannic majesty's dominions, with greater cruelty than even the French had practised; and the same duke of Cumberland who had been wounded at Dettingen, in defence of her Imperial majesty, was obliged to fight at Hastenbeck against the troops of that very princess, in defence of his father's dominions: that she had sent commissaries to Hanover, who shared with the crown of France the contributions extorted from that electorate; rejected all proposals of peace, and dismissed from her court the minister of Brunswic Lunenburg: that his Imperial majesty, who had sworn to protect the empire, and oppose the entrance of foreign troops destined to oppress any of the states of Germany, afterwards required the king of England to withdraw his troops from the countries which they occupied, that a French army might again have free passage into his German dominions: that the emperor had recalled these troops, released them from their allegiance to their sovereign, enjoined them to abandon their posts, their colours, and the service in which they were embarked, on pain of being punished in body and estate; and that the king of England himself was threatened with the ban of the empire.

He observed, that in quality of elector, he had been accused of refusing to concur with the resolutions of the diet taken in the preceding year, of entering into alliance with the king of Prussia, joining his troops to the armies of that prince, employing auxiliaries belonging to the states of the empire, sending English forces into Germany, where they had taken possession of Embden, and exacting contributions in different parts of Germany.

In answer to these allegations, he declared that he could not, consistent with his own safety, or the dictates of common sense, concur with a majority, in joining his troops, which were immediately necessary for his own defence, to those which, from the arbitrary views of the court of Vienna, were led against his friend and ally the king of Prussia, by a prince who did not belong to the generality of the empire, and on whom the command had been conferred, without a previous conclusum of the Germanic body: that, with respect to his alliance with the king of Prussia, he had a right, when deserted by his former allies, to seek assistance where-soever it could be procured; and surely no just grounds of complaint could be offered against that which his Prussian majesty lent, to deliver the electoral states of Brunswic, as well as those of Brunswic Wolfenbuttle, Hesse, and Buckbourg, from the oppressions of their common enemy. Posterity, he said, would hardly believe, that at a time when the troops of Austria, the Palatinate, and Wirtemberg, were engaged to invade the counties of the empire, other members of the Germanic body, who employed auxiliaries in their defence, should be threatened with outlawry and sequestration.

He owned that, in quality of king, he had sent over English troops to Germany, and taken possession of Embden; steps for which he was accountable to no power on earth, although the constitutions of the empire permit the co-estates to make use of foreign troops, not indeed for the purpose of invasion or conquest in Germany, but for their defence and preservation. He also acknowledged that he had resented the conduct, and punished the injustice, of those co-estates who had assisted his enemies, and helped to ravage his dominions; inferring, that if the crown of France was free to pillage the estates of the duke of Brunswic, and the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, because they had supplied the king of England with auxiliaries; if the empress-queen had a right to appropriate to herself half of the contributions raised by the French king in these countries, surely his Britannic majesty had an equal right to make those feel the burden of the war who had favoured the unjust enterprizes of his enemies.

He expressed his hope that the dyet, after having duly considered these circumstances, would, by way of advice, propose to his Imperial majesty, that he should annul his most inconsistent mandates, and not only take effectual measures to protect the electorate and its allies, but also give orders for commencing against the empress-queen, as archduchess of Austria, the elector Palatine, and the duke of Wirtemberg, such proceedings as she wanted to enforce against his Britannic majesty, elector of Brunswic Lunenbourg.

Such was the substance of this famous memorial which the Hanoverian minister presented to the dyet of the empire, and which made so strong an impression upon many of its members, that on the twenty-ninth of November the evangelic body published a conclusum, importing, that with respect to the ban of the empire, with which several princes were now threatened, they would never consent to any innovation that should be proposed, contrary to the twentieth article of the capitulation, which the emperor had confirmed by oath at his election; and that whatever should be done contrary to that agreement, should be looked upon by them as null and void, and should be treated accordingly.

Having thus particularized the most important events and transactions which attended the prosecution of the war on the continent of Germany and the northern parts of Europe, I shall now proceed to trace its progress, during the course of this year, in the other quarters of the globe, where we shall find the scenes as busy, interesting, and striking, as those already related.

I shall begin first with relating the success of some naval achievements performed by our fleets and cruizers at the beginning of the year, previous to the expedition against and descent made upon the coasts of France.

The British cruizers kept the sea during all the severity of winter, in order to protect the trade of the kingdom, and distress that of the enemy. They exerted themselves with such diligence and success, that a great number of prizes were taken, and the commerce of France almost entirely ruined. A very gallant exploit was performed by one captain Bray, commander of the Adventure, a small armed vessel in the government's service. Falling in with the Machault, a large privateer of Dunkirk, near Dungeness, he ran her aboard, fastened her boltsprit to his capstan, and after a warm engagement compelled her to submit. A French frigate of thirty-six guns was taken by captain Parker, in a new fir-ship of inferior force. Several privateers of the enemy were sunk, burned, or taken; and a great number of merchant ships fell into the hands of the English.

Nor were the English ships of war less successful in the American than in the European seas. About this time the board of admiralty received advice from admiral Cotes, in Jamaica, of an action which happened off the island of Hispaniola, in the month of October of the preceding year, between three English ships of war and a French squadron. Captain Forrest, an officer of distinguished abilities, had, in the ship Augusta, sailed from Port-Royal in Jamaica, accompanied by the Dreadnought and Edinburgh, under the command of the captains Suckling and Langdon. He was ordered to cruize off Cape François; and this service he punctually performed, in the face of a French squadron of much greater force, lately arrived at that place from the coast of Africa. The commander, piqued at seeing himself thus insulted by an inferior armament, resolved to give them battle; and that he might either take them, or at least drive them out of those seas, so as to afford a free passage to a great number of merchant ships then lying at the Cape, bound for Europe, he took every precaution which he thought necessary to insure success. With this view he strengthened his squadron with some store ships, mounted with guns and armed for the occasion, and supplied the deficiency in his complements by taking on board seamen from the merchant ships, and soldiers from the garrison.

Thus equipped, he weighed anchor and stood out to sea, having under his command four large ships of the line and three stout frigates. They were no sooner perceived advancing than captain Forrest held a short council with his two captains. "Gentlemen (said he) you know our own strength, and see that of the enemy: shall we give them battle?" They replying in the affirmative, he added, "Then fight them we will; there is no time to be lost: return to your ships, and get them ready for engaging."

After this laconic consultation among these three gallant officers, they bore down upon the French squadron without further hesitation, and between three and four in the afternoon the action began with incredible fury. The enemy exerted themselves with uncommon activity, conscious that their honour was peculiarly at stake, and that they fought in sight, as it were, of their own coast, which was lined with people, expecting to see them return in triumph. But notwithstanding their most vigorous efforts, their commodore, after having sustained a severe engagement that lasted two hours and a half, found his ship in such a shattered condition that he made signal for one of his frigates to come and tow him out of the line. His example was followed by the rest of his squadron, which by this means, with the favour of a land breeze and the approach of night, made shift to accomplish their escape from the three British ships, that were too much disabled in their masts and rigging to prosecute their victory.

One of the French squadron was rendered altogether unfit for service: their loss in men amounted to three hundred killed, and as many wounded; whereas that of the English did not exceed one third of this number. Nevertheless they were so damaged, that being unable to keep the sea, they returned to Jamaica; and the French commodore seized the opportunity of sailing with a great convoy for Europe.

Captain Forrest's bravery was not more remarkable in this engagement than his conduct and sagacity in a subsequent adventure near Port-au-Prince, a French harbour situated at the bottom of a bay on the western part of Hispaniola, behind the small island of Gonave. After Mr. de Kerfin had set sail from Cape François for Europe, admiral Cotes, beating up to windward from Port Royal in Jamaica with three ships of the line, received intelligence that there was a French fleet at Port-au-Prince ready to sail on their return to Europe. In consequence of this advice, he ordered captain Forrest to cruise off the island Gonave for two days only, enjoining him at the same time to return at the expiration of that period, and rejoin the squadron at Cape Nicholas.

Accordingly captain Forrest, in the Augusta, proceeded up the bay, between the island Gonave and Hispaniola, with a view to execute a plan which he had himself projected. Next day in the afternoon, though he perceived two sloops, he forbore chasing that he might not risque a discovery: for the same purpose he hoisted Dutch colours, and disguised his ship with tarpaulins. At five in the afternoon he discovered seven sail of ships steering to the westward, and hauled from them to avoid suspicion, but at the approach of night gave chase with all the sail he could carry. About ten he perceived two sail, one of which fired a gun, and the other made the best of her way for Leoganne, another harbour in the bay.

At this time captain Forrest reckoned eight sail to leeward, near another port called Petit Goave: coming up with the ship which had fired the gun, she submitted without opposition, after he had hailed and told her captain what he was, produced two of his largest cannon, and threatened to sink her if she should give the least alarm. He forthwith removed the prisoners from this prize, and placed on board of her five and thirty of his own crew, with orders to stand for Petit Goave, and intercept any of the fleet that might attempt to get into that harbour. Then he made sail after the rest, and in the dawn of the morning finding himself in the middle of their fleet, he began to fire at them all in their turns, as he could bring his guns to bear. They returned the fire for some time; at length the Marguerite, the Solide, and the Theodore, struck their colours. These being secured, were afterwards employed in taking the Maurice, Le Grand, and La Flore; the Brilliant also submitted, and the Mars made sail in hope of escaping; but the Augusta coming up with her about noon, she likewise fell into the hands of the victor.

Thus, by a well-conducted stratagem, a whole fleet of nine sail was taken by a single ship, in the neighbourhood of four or five harbours, in any one of which they would have found immediate shelter and protection. The prizes, which happened to be richly laden, were safely conveyed to Jamaica, and there sold at public auction for the benefit of the captors, who may safely challenge history to produce such another instance of success.

The ministry having resolved to make vigorous efforts against the enemy in North America, admiral Bolcawen was appointed to the command of the fleet destined for that service, and sailed from St. Helen's on the nineteenth day of February, when the Invincible, of seventy-four guns, one of the best ships that composed his squadron, ran aground and perished; but her men, stores, and artillery were saved.

In the course of the ensuing month sir Edward Hawke entered the Bay of Biscay with another squadron, in order to intercept any supplies from France designed for Cape Breton or Canada; and about the same time the town of Embden, belonging to his Prussian majesty, which had fallen into the hands of the enemy, was happily delivered by the conduct of commodore Holmes, stationed on that coast, who sent up two of his small ships to anchor in the river between Knok and the city. The garrison, consisting of three thousand seven hundred men, finding themselves thus cut off from all all communication with the country below, evacuated the place with great precipitation; and some of their baggage being sent off by water, was taken by the boats which the commodore detached for that purpose.

It was about the same time that the admiralty received information of another advantage by sea, which had been gained by admiral Osborne while he cruized between Cape de Gatt and Carthagea on the coast of Spain. On the twenty-eighth day of March he fell in with a French squadron, commanded by the marquis du Quesne, consisting of four ships, namely, the Foudroyant of eighty guns, the Orphée of sixty-four, the Oriflamme of fifty, and the Pleiade frigate of twenty-four, in their passage from Toulon to reinforce M. de la Clue, who had for some time been blocked up by admiral Osborne in the harbour of Carthagea.

The enemy no sooner descried the English squadron than they dispersed, and steered different courses; then Mr. Osborne detached several ships in pursuit of each, while he himself with the body of his fleet stood off for the bay of Carthagea, to observe the motions of the French squadron which lay there at anchor. About seven in the evening the Orphée, having on board five hundred men, struck to captain Stor in the Revenge, who lost the calf of one leg in the engagement, during which he was supported by the ships Berwick and Preston.

The Monmouth of sixty-four guns, commanded by captain Gardiner, attacked the Foudroyant, one of the largest ships in the French navy, mounted with four score cannon, and containing eight hundred men, under the conduct of the marquis du Quesne. This is the same Mr. Gardiner who, in the famous battle between the admirals Byng and Galissoniere in the Mediterranean, commanded the Ramillies, under the direction of the British admiral; and his courage having incurred some suspicion on account of his behaviour in that action, he was determined to wipe off the disgrace. He therefore maintained the engagement with incredible fury until he lost his life by a musket-ball: nevertheless the fight was continued with unabating vigour by his lieutenant Mr. Carkett, and the Foudroyant disabled in such a manner that her commander struck, as soon as the other English ships, the Swiftsure and the Hampton-Court, appeared.

This last step, however, he did not take until he saw his ship lie like a wreck upon the water, and the deck covered with dead carcasses. The Oriflamme was driven on shore under the castle of Aiglos by the ships Montagu and Monarque, commanded by the captains Rowley and Montague, who could not complete her destruction without violating the neutrality of Spain. As for the Pleiade frigate, she made her escape by being a prime sailer.

This was a severe blow to the enemy, who not only lost two of their capital ships, but had the misfortune to see them added to the navy of Great Britain; and the disaster was followed by another, which they could not help feeling with an equal degree of sensibility. In the beginning of April sir Edward Hawke steering with his squadron into Basque-road, on the coast of Poictou, descried off the isle of Aix a French fleet at anchor, consisting of five ships of the line, with six frigates and forty transports, having on board three thousand troops, and a large quantity of stores and provision, intended as a reinforcement for their settlements in North America.

They no sooner saw the English admiral advancing than they began to slip their cables and fly with the utmost precipitation. Some of them escaped to sea, but the greater number ran into shallow water, where they could not be pursued; and next morning they appeared aground lying on their broadsides. Sir Edward Hawke, who had rode all night at anchor abreast of the isle of Aix, furnished the ships Intrepid and Medway with trusty pilots, and sent them farther in when the flood began to make, with orders to sound a-head, that he might know whether there was any possibility of attacking the enemy; but the want of a sufficient depth of water rendered this scheme impracticable.

In the mean time the French threw over-board their cannon, stores, and ballast; and boats and launches from Rochefort were employed in carrying out warps to drag their ships through the soft mud, as soon as they should be floated by the tide. By these means their large ships of war and many of their transports were conveyed into the river Charente; but their loading was lost, and the end of their equipment totally defeated.

Another convoy of merchant ships, under the protection of three frigates, had a few days before been chased by sir Edward Hawke into the harbour of St. Martin's on the isle of Rhé, where they still remained, waiting an opportunity for hazard-ing a second departure: and a third, consisting of 12 sail, bound from Bourdeaux to Quebec, under convoy of a frigate and armed vessel, was encountered at sea by one British ship of the line and two fire-ships, which took the frigate and armed vessel, and two of the convoy afterwards met with the same fate; but this advantage was dearly purchased by the loss of captain James Hume, commander of the Pluto fire-ship, a brave accomplished officer, who, in an unequal combat with the enemy, refused to quit the deck even when he was disabled, and fell gloriously covered with wounds, exhorting the people with his latest breath to continue the engagement while the ship could swim, and acquit themselves with honour in the service of their country.

On the twenty-ninth day of May the Raisable, a French ship of the line, mounted with sixty-four cannon, having on board six hundred and thirty men, commanded by the prince de Mombazon chevalier de Rohan, was, in her passage from Port l'Orient to Brest, attacked by captain Dennis in the Dorsetshire of seventy guns, and taken, after an obstinate engagement, in which one hundred and sixty men of the prince's complement were killed or wounded, and the sails and rigging of his ship almost entirely destroyed.

The joy arising from these successes was considerably damped by a lamentable disaster that befel the ship prince George, of eighty guns, commanded by rear-admiral Broderick, in his passage to the Mediterranean. On the thirtieth day of April, between one and two in the afternoon, a dreadful fire broke out in the fore part of the ship, and raged with such violence, that notwithstanding all the efforts efforts of the officers and men for several hours, the flames increased; and the ship being consumed to the water-edge, the remnant sunk about six o'clock in the evening. The horror and consternation of such a scene are more easily conceived than described. When all endeavours proved ineffectual, and no hope of preserving the ship remained, the barge was hoisted out for the preservation of the admiral, who entered it accordingly; but all distinction of persons being now abolished, the seamen rushed into it in such crowds, that in a few moments it overset. The admiral foreseeing that this would be the case, stripped off his cloaths, and committing himself to the mercy of the waves, was saved by the boat of a merchant ship, after he had sustained himself in the sea a full hour by swimming.

Captain Payton, who was the second in command, remained upon the quarter-deck as long as it was possible to keep that station; and then descending by the stern-ladder, had the good fortune to be taken into a boat belonging to the sloop Alderney. The hull of the ship, masts, and rigging, were now in a blaze, bursting tremendous in several parts through horrid clouds of smoke: nothing was heard but the crackling of the flames, mingled with the dismal cries of terror and distraction; nothing was seen but acts of frenzy and desperation. The miserable wretches, affrighted at the horrors of such a conflagration, sought a fate less dreadful, by plunging into the sea; and about three hundred men were preserved by the boats belonging to some ships that accompanied the admiral in the his voyage, but five hundred perished in ocean.

The king of Great Britain being firmly resolved, notwithstanding the ill success, not to say disgrace, which attended the expedition sent the preceding year to annoy the coasts of France, to renew his attempts upon that kingdom, ordered a very formidable armament to be equipped for that purpose. Two powerful squadrons by sea were appointed for the service of this expedition: the first, consisting of eleven great ships, was commanded by lord Anson and sir Edward Hawke: the other, composed of four ships of the line, seven frigates, six sloops, two fireships, two bombs, ten cutters, twenty tenders, ten storeships, and one hundred transports, was put under the direction of commodore Howe, who had signalized himself by his gallantry and conduct in the course of the last fruitless expedition.

The plan of a descent upon France having been projected by the ministry, a body of troops, consisting of sixteen regiments, nine troops of light horse, and six thousand marines, was assembled for the execution of this design, and embarked under the command of the duke of Marlborough; a nobleman who, though he did not possess all the military genius of his grandfather, was yet confessedly a brave and gallant officer. On this occasion he was assisted by the counsels of lord George Sackville, second in command, son to the duke of Dorset.

The troops having for some time been encamped on the Isle of Wight, were embarked in the latter end of May, and the two fleets sailed in the beginning of June for the coast of Bretagne, leaving the people of England big with the expectations of the event of the enterprize.

The two fleets separated at sea: lord Anson with his squadron bent his course to the Bay of Biscay, in order to watch the motions of the enemy's ships, and interrupt their navigation; while commodore Howe with the land forces steered directly towards St. Malo, a strong place of considerable commerce, situated on the coast of Bretagne, against which the present invasion seemed to be chiefly levelled. The town, however, was so well fortified, both by art and nature, that no attempt by sea could be made upon it with any prospect of success; and therefore it was resolved to make a descent in the neighbourhood. After the fleet had been, by contrary winds, detained several days in sight of the French coast, it arrived in the bay of Cancele, about two leagues to the eastward of St. Malo; and Mr. Howe having silenced a small battery which the enemy had occasionally erected upon the beach, the troops were landed, without farther opposition, on the sixth day of June.

The duke of Marlborough immediately began his march towards St. Servan, with a view to destroy such shipping and magazines as might be in any accessible parts of the river; and this scheme was executed with equal spirit and success. A great quantity of naval stores, two ships of war, several privateers, and about fourscore vessels of different sorts, were set on fire, and reduced to ashes, almost under the cannon of the place, which however they could not pretend to besiege in form. His grace having received intelligence that the enemy were busily employed in collecting forces to cut off his retreat, returned to Cancele, where Mr. Howe had made such a masterly disposition of the boats and transports, that the reembarkation of the troops was accomplished with surprising ease and expedition. The forces, while they continued on shore, were restrained from all outrages by the most severe discipline; and the French houses, which their inhabitants had deserted, were left untouched.

Immediately after their landing, the duke of Marlborough, as commander in chief, published and distributed a manifesto, addressed to the people of Bretagne, importing, That his descent upon the coast was not effected with a design to make war on the inhabitants of the open country, except such as should be found in arms, or otherwise opposing the operations of the British forces: that all who were willing to remain in peaceable possession of their effects might stay unmolested in their respective dwellings, and follow their usual occupations: that, besides the customs and taxes they used to pay to their own king, nothing should be required of them but what was absolutely necessary for the subsistence of the army; and for all provisions brought in they should be paid in ready money: but that if, notwithstanding these assurances of protection, they should carry off their effects and provisions, and abandon the places of their habitation, he would treat them as enemies, and destroy their houses with fire and sword.

To the magistracy of St. Malo he likewise sent a letter, intimating, that as all the inhabitants of the town and villages between Dinant, Rennes, and Doll, now in his possession, had deserted their habitations, probably to avoid the payment of the usual contributions; and as he was informed that the magistrates had compelled the people of the country to retire into the town of St. Malo, he now gave gave them notice, that if they did not immediately send them back to their houses, and come themselves to his head-quarters to settle the contributions, he should think himself obliged to proceed to military execution. These threats, however, were not put in force, although the magistrates of St. Malo did not think proper to comply with his injunction.

But it was found altogether impossible to prevent irregularities among troops employed in such an expedition. Some houses were plundered, and not without acts of cruelty: but those offenders were brought to immediate justice; and it must be owned, as an incontestible proof of the general's humanity, that in destroying the magazines of the enemy at St. Servan, which may be termed the suburbs of St. Malo, he ordered one small storehouse to be spared, because it could not be set on fire without endangering the whole district.

The British forces being reembarked, with the loss of about thirty men missing, the fleet was detained by contrary winds in the bay of Cancele for several days; during which a design seems to have been formed for attacking Granville, which had been reconnoitred by some of the engineers: but, in consequence of their report, the scheme was laid aside, and the fleet stood out to sea, where it was exposed to some rough weather.
